Eighth Mo. 6th, 1835. Our Quarterly Meeting. Had the company of our aged friend John Letchworth; also Thomas and Mary Wistar. It was very strengthening to have the company of such dear friends. It will not be long ere the fathers and mothers will be removed: may the preparing hand be laid upon others for the work. Think I never felt our testimonies dearer than this day. May the beauty of this world be stained in our view yet more and more. E. Robson spoke very sweetly to the young people, respecting what are termed "little things." She desired we might be willing to take off and put on whatever was required of us, so that which was as a partition wall between us and our God might be removed. Until there is faithfulness in little things, there never can be an advancement in greater. J. Letchworth spoke to a state present, which was ready to exclaim, "O my leanness! my leanness!" Freshly to his remembrance had been brought the faith of the poor lame man who was waiting to be healed of his infirmity. When Jesus inquired of him, if he would be made whole, his answer was "I have no man, when the water is troubled, to put me into the pool:" but what was the reply; "Rise, take up thy bed and walk." He believed this language would be addressed to some present who were waiting for, and looking into their dear Master.

I have remembered the remarks of a dear mother in Israel, long since removed to her everlasting home, viz: She "had often been led to view an assembly such as our Quarterly Meeting, collected under the solemn profession of being spiritual worshippers; sitting in outward silence before the Lord, and apparently waiting only upon Him. Oh, the awfulness wherewith I have often beheld these meetings, while my eye has affected my heart; and the language forcibly arisen, let us be as we appear; let us gather to the Source of unfailing help; fully believing that if all were properly engaged in feeling their wants, and the only way of having them supplied, the united breathings would ascend as pure incense, and the lifting up of the heart be as an acceptable sacrifice."

Ninth Mo. 17th. Never more awakened to feel the necessity of true spiritual worship: may we "be as we appear!" We may deceive one another, but not that. Being who sees us just as we are.

from which all good seemingly was excluded; the heavens as brass, the earth as iron; the wintry season continuing long. These seasons were nothing new to the followers of the Lord; he desired patience might be abode in, and their change would come.

4th. First-day. Feel myself very much like one alone, my path seems so narrow. Nothing short of appearing as a fool in the eyes of the world, will do.

Eleventh Mo. 1st. One more week has been allotted me; during which sacrifices have been made. None knowest but Thon, O Heavenly Parent, how very costly the ointment has been! Can indeed say, I have washed thy feet with tears this day. Sweet peace has been dispensed.

29th. Our Monthly Meeting held at Gwynedd. I can but fear that this precious privilege of assembling for Divine worship is not prized and profited by us as it ought to be. I was made sensible of my own shortcomings; and can often wonder, with dear S. Grubb, "when better times will come to me." Had the company of our friends Joseph and Rebecca Battley, who are now members of this Monthly Meeting, though residing at Friendsville, one hundred and sixty miles off. R. has a precious little gift in the ministry. She is, I believe, endeavoring to occupy with the talent committed to her. I can enter into feeling with the little ones; according to their faithfulness will their reward be. Her communications were short and instructive respecting fulfilling the first and second commandments. She also revived the account of Naaman, the Syrian; hoping we might be willing to receive the dear Master in the way of his coming, not looking for something greater. She feared the language of some present was, "Are not Abana and Parpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel?" E. C. had a short communication respecting the benefit resulting from trial and affliction. If rightly abode under, they tended to draw us nearer to God. When all things pass on smoothly, we are too apt to forget that here we have no continuing city.

5th. Our Quarterly Meeting. We had the company of our friends David Cope and John Letchworth. D. C. was lengthy in communication, quoting the Scripture, "Strait is the gate and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it. Because wide is the gate and broad the way which leadeth to destruction, and many there be that go in thereat." Enlarging instructively. Among other things said, "we might lead good moral lives, and conduct our outward affairs with integrity, and yet be pursuing the broad way." He showed the danger of making to ourselves idols; some make them of silver and gold, and some even of their persons. His concern for the young people was great; persuading them to seek the Lord now in the morning of their days; to deny themselves, and take up the daily cross, and to part with all required; then would they be children of our Heavenly Father. What a comfort and consolation would it be to godly parents, to see their children walking in the Truth! such could give them no greater joy. It would sweeten for them many bitter cups, and it would also sweeten many for the children.

E. C. was greatly exercised for a state present, who had in days past been much favored, but that no longer experienced the tender visitations of Divine love, as in the morning of their day; and were querying why it was thus with them. He desired such a one to remember, that He was a covenant-keeping God, and his part of the covenant would never be broken. He believed a renewed visitation was gone forth; they were spared a little longer; but if no fruit appeared the sentence would go forth, "Cut it down." It was a solemn communication.

15th. A season of quietness. I am afresh encouraged to enter into covenants, and strength craved to keep them. None know of my secret struggles. The language seemed to be, "unbosom to no mortal."

17th. Our friend Hinchman Haines, from Evesham, had an appointed meeting. His visit has been acceptable. He arose with, "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High, shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." Querying, "Where are the secret places of the Most High?" "Was it not in the secret of the soul?" He believed there were those present who knew where it was to be found; and in times of trial these did witness an abiding under the shadow of the Almighty. To these his language was very sweet. Though seasons of darkness may be permitted, His covenant was with them; their prayer would be had in remembrance. The youth were not forgotten; especially those who had been led to look a little into the beauty of holiness, and whose minds were covered at times with a precious feeling, which they could not tell whence it came or whither it went. He had been comforted with believing there were those present who were endeavoring to own their dear Master in their lives and conversation, dress and address. Said the peace these would feel for every act of obedience, would more than compensate for all passed through. To parents he was excellent; first to the rightly concerned, then to those who were comparable to "The daughter of my people," who had "become cruel like the ostrich of the wilderness."

Twelfth Mo. 2nd. Monthly Meeting. Endeavored to be found in my place; but was afresh given to feel what poor things we are of ourselves. E. C. ministered to the poor in spirit—those that were hungering and thirsting after righteousness, and believed the promise to these would be realized: "They shall be filled." R. Scotton was concerned to set before us the circumstance of Judas betraying his Lord and Master. He had even been a follower of Him; but yielding to the enemy he could even do this. He said the subject had felt very awful to him since we had been sitting together; that we had the same unwearied enemy to contend with, who was ever busy: feared there were those present whom the love of the world would, if they were not careful, cause to do the same. We all, more or less, had our weaknesses to contend with, and as we knew what they were, we ought to set a double watch on that part, and intercede for strength to overcome. He dwelt upon the danger of pursuing lawful things in an unlawful manner; of the weakness that had overtaken us as a society; and hoped we would all seriously inquire how far we were contributing thereto.

5th. The forepart of our meeting this morning, was to me a heavy season; but towards the close, my hard heart seemed broken, and made to overflow under a sense of tender mercy yet extended. O may I be assisted rightly to hunger and thirst for that true bread, which cometh down out of Heaven.

12th. On taking my seat in meeting this morning, there seemed a sweet covering over the mind; but for want of dwelling close with it, I was left to feel, "how frail I am."

19th. Afresh given to feel the privilege of silent waiting.

For "The Friend."

Eastern Quarterly Meeting in North Carolina is composed of two Monthly Meetings—Rich Square, which is located to the west of the Chowan River, mainly in Northampton County, and Piney Woods, to the east of that river, the most of whose members live in Perquimans County. The two settlements are about 50 miles apart. In Rich Square Monthly Meeting, some of the more influential members early saw the inconsistency with our principles of the revival meetings and other proceedings of the "fast friends" who came among them; and through their faithfulness in opposing them, these departures from our ancient ways never obtained much foothold in that Monthly Meeting.

In Piney Woods Monthly Meeting more liberty was allowed to the operations and teachings of the modern school of so-called evangelists; and for some time there seemed little obstruction to the introduction of all those novelties which have greatly changed the character of our meetings in some parts of the country. Owing to the death and removal of some of the most prominent advocates of the new departure; and probably also to the fact that the eyes of others had become opened to see that the measures that had been pursued were not in harmony with the doctrines of Friends; there has been a decided change in that meeting on this subject. The testimony we received as to the effect which the "revival" meetings had had among them, corresponded closely with that we had previously received when in Indiana. One of the leading elders of the meeting informed us, that they had been followed by coldness and indifference as to religion, the interest of the young people in their meetings had been much destroyed, most of the new converts had left them, and their week-day meetings were now not more than one-half of the size they were before those sensational movements were introduced.

The conversations we had with other Friends, elicited nothing contrary to these statements; but I believe tended to confirm their substantial accuracy. Indeed, the memoranda I preserved of some of the teachings delivered by those we met with in the course of our journey, quite prepares me to believe that such would be the result of a superficial ministry. Thus, on one occasion we were told, that it was the work of the enemy to cause us to doubt that we were the children of God; and that if we had once had a belief that we were admitted into a filial relationship with God, we must hold fast to that belief so as to be always ready for work in the Church. And this was without reference to the danger of losing a good condition through unwatchfulness, and so becoming unfitted for the Lord's service; or to the need of passing through those baptisms which the experience of Christians has shown to be a needful preparation for their own growth in grace, and for the carrying on of the Lord's work.

The ministry of the early members of the Society of Friends was remarkable for its plain, practical character. They spoke of repentance, and a day of judgment to come. They dwelt upon the gracious promise of the Redeemer, that He would send to his disciples the Comforter, the Holy Spirit, which would lead them into all truth. They urged the indispensable need of walking in obedience to the manifestations of this Divine Light of Christ; for although life is promised to those who believe, yet obedience to Christ's commands is the test of true faith, and it is those only who do the will of God that shall enter into his kingdom. They continually brought to view the necessity of bearing the yoke of Christ, denying self, experiencing the new birth, and of waiting upon God for the arising of his Divine life in the soul.

Those who followed such teaching came to a practical acquaintance with the work of Divine Grace in themselves; and having their thoughts mainly turned to the heavenly anointing, had no further absolute need of the instructions of man. Thus they became rooted and grounded in Christ, and arrived at a settlement and stability in the Truth, which nothing else could give.

After finishing our visit in Rich Square settlement, we were indebted to the kindness of a friend for conveying us about 50 miles to the Piney Woods neighborhood. The Chowan River is crossed by a ferry at Winton. Here it is a wide stream, and like most of those which run through low flat countries has a deep channel. On its east bank it is bordered by a densely wooded swamp of about three miles in width. The road through this (called here a Pocoson), is mostly under water. It was a peculiar and very interesting experience thus to travel through the water, on a narrow road-bed, bordered on each side with trees, vines and shrubs, many of which were strange to the eyes of a northern botanist. Yet most of these, I afterwards met with in the flat swampy lands which form so large a proportion of the country east of the Chowan River, and lying south of Norfolk.

While a care was felt not to allow the mind to become absorbed with outward objects, which were not the primary object of our visit, and to keep every thing in its proper place, yet the peculiar and beautiful forms of vegetation which continually arrested the eye, imprinted themselves on the memory, and were recalled when the mind was more at leisure to contemplate them.

Perhaps the most striking of these was the Southern Pitcher plant (Sarracenia flava). Indeed we found both species—this, and the common Side-saddle flower (Sarracenia purpurea) of our New Jersey Cranberry bogs. The S. purpurea has a cluster of leaves at the base which curve upward. These are hollow, with broad wings, and their mouths arched over with a round, heart-shaped hood. They are generally found half-filled with a liquid which the leaf secretes, and which contains the bodies of numerous drowned insects, in different stages of digestion, on which the plant is supposed to feed, as well as on the material absorbed by its roots. If taken up with their roots and the adhering peat, and placed in a vessel where they can be kept well-moistened, they will live for a long time, and furnish most interesting objects to one who is desirous of studying their habits.

In the Pitcher plant of the South, or Trumpets, as they are sometimes called, the leaves grow erect, from one to three feet in height. They are hollow, as in the leaves of our side-saddle flower, but nearly round, and with but a slight winged margin. Over the open mouth at the top, a round hood projects. This species is said to have the same carnivorous tastes as its northern relative, but it was so early in the season when we saw it, that the leaves had not attained their full development, and were probably not yet ready to enter upon the business of entrapping and devouring their insect visitors. Yet they were most peculiar and interesting objects, and awakened an unexpected degree of enthusiasm in one of the company, who had before seemed rather insensible to many things which had strongly arrested my attention.

In the flat lands east of the Chowan, we met with rice-fields. This upland rice is probably a different variety from that grown in the swamps further south. The rice when we saw it (in the latter part of the Fifth Month) was about six inches high. The plant resembles oats, and the little clumps of green were arranged in rows, so as to allow of cultivating between them. In the more sandy parts of the land, sweet potatoes seemed to form an important part of the farm produce. They are used, not only for the table, but also to fatten hogs, who are turned into the field in the fall, and allowed to dig for themselves. This they are well able to do. Their snouts are long and pointed, and the apprenticeship they have served in rooting through the woods from their earliest days, must have rendered them expert in seeking for hidden food.

In bringing to a close this series of "Notes," I can scarcely omit to mention a species of Andromeda (A. speciosa) which grew in the woods near Belvidere, whose beauty impressed me strongly. It somewhat resembles our common New Jersey Stagger-Bush, (Andromeda mariana), but has a larger mass of flowers growing at the extremity of last year's branches. As I looked on the beautiful clusters of pure white bells, depending from the slender twigs, I thought it was well worthy of a place among our ornamental shrubbery.

For "The Friend."

A Dangerous Dislocation.

In the 36th number of "The Friend" is an account, which brought to my recollection the following occurrence:

A physician residing in Starksboro, Vt., left his home in the morning for a day's journey on horseback. After travelling a few miles he fell in company with a stranger, also on horseback, and going in the same direction. Finding that they would be travelling a number of miles on the same road, they concluded to keep each other's company. While pleasantly conversing and leisurely pacing along, his companion's horse, without any apparent cause, stumbled and fell, throwing his rider forward, who struck on his head and lay motionless. The physician found the man was stunned and apparently lifeless, with his head turned to one side, and that it could not be straightened. His neck was dislocated. Placing his knees against the man's shoulders, he drew his head forward in the same direction in which it lay, until he felt the spinal column slip back into its place; then carefully turned his head around to its proper position. The injured man soon became conscious, and being raised up they rested awhile; when he was assisted on to his horse and they continued their journey together. On parting, his companion expressed his thankfulness that he had providentially fallen in company with a physician, who knew what to do in such an emergency, and who had probably been instrumental in saving his life. For "The Friend."

"Judge Not" Wrongfully.

In speaking of the evils of the day, and of the adulterated religion which seems so insidiously mixed in with the pure, that the natural man cannot detect the difference, I have often met with the caution, "Judge not lest I should be judged." Christ says, "Judge not, that ye be not judged;" that is, "judge not in a way that will bring condemnation or judgment upon you." We find that He and the apostles and prophets, as well as all the holy men of old, were very bold in judging down the sins and evils of the world. But they were wonderfully persecuted for it.

In our days, so many of those professing to be Friends have assimilated themselves with the world, which loves its own, that a large portion of us can walk hand in hand with it in brotherly harmony, and thus avoid the cross and hope for the crown, although causing the way of truth to be evil spoken of; while such as oppose the innovations on our principles and ways, are lightly esteemed or judged down, as opposers of the work of God. But Paul says to the natural man, "Thou art inexcusable. O man, whoever thou art, that judgest; for wherein thou judgest another, thou condemnest thyself; for thou that judgest doest the same things." So such as are condemning the older and more experienced ones for judging righteous judgments, would do well to take heed to the caution of our Saviour, where he says, "Judge not that ye be not judged." For thou that judgest the righteous, who sees things in the true light, and who would willingly warn thee to flee from the wrath to come, mayest not escape the judgment of Him who sees not as man sees.

"The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness." So I believe there is great danger of our being satisfied with holding the truths of God in unrighteousness—holding them in the head, but not in the heart—holding them in the letter, but not in the spirit. And there is a danger also, of judging others who are more in the light, for doing good deeds, while we ourselves are doing evil in darkness. But Christ says to his disciples, "Blessed are your eyes for they see; and your ears for they hear."

While influential men, who are holding the truth in the head, and in an unrighteous heart, are going about to establish their own righteousness, it is no wonder that such should strive to silence all opposition, and say to us, "Judge not lest ye be judged, and found to be opposers of the work of religion." But how are we to know whether it is the work of God, or of the evil one, if the righteous are not permitted to judge by the spirit and power of the gospel; and by the living Word which is quick and powerful; and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. Yet we see that every attempt that is made to judge down the popular but sin-satisfying religion is repulsed with great determination, and with a cry of, "Judge not lest we be judged." "For the children of this world are, in their generation, wiser than the children of light." And in this wisdom they are ready to find fault, and judge down every thing that does not harmonize with the favorite dogmas which they almost idolize.

But in all ages of the world, there have been a true church and false one. Paul says, there "are false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ;" and that "there are many unruly and vain talkers and deceivers, especially they of the circumcision: whose mouths must be stopped." And if the living members of the true Church have no Divine authority over such, to judge down and to condemn them, of what use is our holy profession? Where is vital Christianity? where is the Church of God? and where is the beauty of holiness? Has not the gold in many places become dim, and the fine gold so changed that it has lost much of its weight and brightness? But amidst all the trying scenes which have been permitted to come upon us to try us, "verily there is a reward for the righteous: verily He is a God that judgeth in the earth." So ye who are ready to judge unrighteous judgments, cease to judge those who are mourning over the desolations of Zion, that ye be not judged in that great and notable day, when "God shall judge the world in righteousness by that man whom He hath ordained." For the time will come "when the sinners in Zion shall be afraid, and when fearfulness shall surprise the hypocrites." If we have not the Spirit of Christ, we are none of his, and are not qualified to conduct the affairs of his Church, for "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him. But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yea the deep things of God."

But if the Spirit of Christ is departed from in a church, and the spirit of man bears rule, then it ceases to be a Church of Christ, and He is no longer head over it; so the spirit of anarchy enters, and the beauty of holiness is lost; and the infallible judgment is gone. Then it is no longer prepared to give righteous judgments; neither is the living remnant, who have lost their control, but have still been kept in bondage under it, any longer bound by its decisions, while it remains in such an unhealthy condition. For the unrighteous are not to pass an availing judgment over the righteous, as their true light is gone, and the fellowship broken. An infallible judgment can only proceed from an infallible spirit; and such as have not that, had better judge not, lest they fall under condemnation.

But such as have the pure and infallible spirit and power of God, which the apostles were in, have a right while they remain in that spirit, to judge down wrong things which are defiling the churches, and leading the unwary and the unstable into the broad way of the world. They have a right to judge even of the conscience, whether it be a seared one, or a tender one. They have a right to judge of religion, whether it be pure and undefiled, and of God; or whether it is defiled by a mixture of the deceit and hypocrisy of man. They have a right to judge of worship; whether it is in spirit and in truth, or whether it is merely to keep up a fair show in the world. They have a right to judge of spirits, and to try them by the Spirit, to see whether they are of God; as many false prophets have gone out into the world. They have a right to judge of faith, whether it is a living faith that overcomes the world, or whether it is dead faith without living works, which is easily overcome by the world.

The same Spirit which led the apostles and holy men of old, would enable us, if we would in faith look to it, but more especially, the anointed elders, to judge of the ministry, and see whether it emanated from God, or from man; whether from the head, or from the heart; whether from the letter, or from the spirit. But without a portion of the union from the Holy One, the elders are but "shining expletives," filling the place in name, but not in life and power. Hence a large portion of the ministry in many places, is giving more reproach than edification. So it needs the true and righteous judgment upon it, to show us whether it is in the demonstration of the spirit and power, or from the enticing words of man's wisdom. And as like begets its like, so if the ministry is light and unsound, the hearers will be apt to be light and unsound also. Hence they are easily blown about by every wind of doctrine.

I dwell more on the subject of the ministry, because I believe that innovations in that line are destroying the Divine life more than any other one thing; and that, in the spurious ministry, where the true life is gone, a strong effort is made to substitute a human life and power, to supply the lack of the Divine. Hence the increasing demand and cry for an educated ministry, and a cultivated intellect; so as to keep up the form of godliness without the power. It may amuse the head, but not change the heart; nor save the soul: neither does it satisfy those who are hungering and thirsting after righteousness. But it does satisfy the unrenewed heart, because it has the enticing words of man's wisdom in it. And the world loves its own, so the world loves to hear it. And so far as a minister conforms to the world, and assimilates with it, so far he receives the applause of the world, and walks in the broad way with it. But if a more sedate and rightly concerned one should dare to raise a voice of warning against these things, he is often met with the repulsive answer of "Judge not, lest ye be judged." But the time is hastening upon us, "when God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil." And Christ says, "In that day, many will say to me, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works? And I will profess unto them, I never knew you."* So we see the great danger of being deceived. And of that great day, which we cannot evade, it may well be said, that the sinner in Zion shall be afraid and fearfulness surprise the hypocrite.

That most excellent doctrine which Jesus taught cannot be cramped into the language of a book. It is the Holy Comforter who will take of the things of Christ and show them unto us, not by the letter alone, but by the inward light communicated to the soul. Thus we have a living, permanent, continuous preaching of the Gospel by a divine Teacher.

Written words, had even Christ himself penned them, would have wanted the capacity to contain the full meaning of the glorious Gospel of the blessed God. That which is truest and deepest in the apprehension of the soul that grows in grace and in the knowledge of divine things is beyond the reach of words. As the divinely enlightened heart lingers over the sacred page it discovers that something beyond the letter embraces the spirit of the words and applies it to the spiritual perception. The factual is flooded with the light of a divine tuition. It also apprehends why Christ did not write out the complete text of a system of theology. The things necessary to salvation are lighted up from above, and are received into the soul, not so much from letter, creed, or ritual, as from the mysterious work of the Spirit on the heart made capable of understanding them.—*E. Reminiscences of Hannah Battery.

On her first visit to North Carolina, she was at North Berwick, both in the prosecution of her religious concern, and to visit her brothers and sisters then residing there, Joseph D. and Dorcas Hoag, John and Elizabeth Meader. Attending their Monthly Meeting, she was earnestly engaged in testimony. She also addressed a person who, she said, had passed through trials known only to the Searcher of hearts, and who, as Joseph was, had been partly separated from his brethren. But if that individual would endeavor to endure the turnings of the hand of the Lord upon him, and patiently to wait all the appointed time, still trusting in his neverfailing arm of power, he would yet be taken up as out of the prison-house, be called and chosen to be an ambassador for Christ, and to declare to others the messages of the King of kings. A young man then present was much broken, tendered and comforted in spirit, accepting it as a renewed favor, another loving message from our gracious Heavenly parent.

This instance is given, as one among many, in which she was enabled to speak to the states and conditions of meetings and individuals. "Her speech and her preaching being not in the enticing words of man's wisdom, but in the demonstration of the Spirit and of power."

Although discouraged by some from going much farther, as she would have to pass amongst those more highly educated, who might not appreciate her services; she decided to go forward. Her Blessed Master had always made a way for her, and she would not now be forsaken by Him. She finished her visit to the satisfaction of her friends in North Carolina, returning home with the sheaves of peace.

A Little Thing.

Not so very long ago happened the following little incident:

A friend of ours had a very nice field which some boys wished to secure on a certain day as a ball ground, upon which they could meet some others in contest. They asked and very readily obtained the desired privilege; but this young friend, who controlled the farm, reserved to himself the right to withdraw the grant, if the playing proved an injury to the field, or otherwise objectionable. The day arrived, and the players and many dozens of spectators gathered, and the game commenced. After awhile our friend came out among them and found, much to his sorrow, that many of those gathered and taking part in the sport were such as seemed to think the English language too narrow to express their ideas, without the use of profanity occasionally. He called their attention a moment, and requested them all as a personal favor to himself to refrain from all profane words, as he could not see that they were at all essential to the enjoyment of the game. He had the satisfaction of knowing that his open but kindly rebuke was effectual; and some of those to whom it was addressed, came to him afterward and thanked him for thus checking them in sinfulness.

Now this was a very little thing, but was it not one step in the road of faithfulness? For it is true, that "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver."

If all who own the divine headship of Christ would take all suitable opportunities to check the evil word and deed in the thoughtless, would it not make our influence more felt for good, if done under His direction?

If the members of the church everywhere were faithful in things little and great, would they not be more truly servants of our Lord and of his Christ, in the sense of our Saviour's words where he called some to be his disciples formerly, "Henceforth ye shall be fishers of men?"

How can I tell her?
By her cellar,
Cleanly shelves and whitened wall.
I can guess her
By her dresser;
By the back staircase and hall.
And with pleasure
Take her measure
By the way she keeps her brooms;
Or the peeping
At the "keeping"
Of her back and unseen rooms;
By her kitchen's air of neatness,
And its general completeness,
Where, in cleanliness and sweetness,
The rose of order blooms.

THE CROWDED STREET.

Selected.

Let me move slowly through the street,
Filled with an ever-shifting train,
Amid the sound of steps that beat
The murmuring walks like autumn rain.
Each where his tasks of pleasure call,
They pass, and heed each other not.
There is who heeds, who holds them all
In his large love and boundless thought.
These struggling tides of life, that seem
In wayward, aimless course to tend,
Are eddies of the mighty stream
That rolls to its appointed end.

THE SWALLOWS.

Selected.

"Where are the swallows gone, mamma?
I have missed them many a day!
And they were so many! what could it be
That has frightened them all away?
The robins and sparrows still come to our door,
But the beautiful swallows are seen no more."
"They are gone, my boy, to a warmer clime,
Over the deep, deep sea,
Where the summer in all its glorious prime Still smiles upon lake and tree;
Where the sunbeams dance 'mid the gushing springs,
They are there, my boy, with their glancing wings."
"But who told them, mamma, which way to go
In search of that sunny land?
Oh! how could such tiny creatures know
What I hardly understand?
Their eyes could not see that far off-sky,
Then how could they tell which way to fly?"
"God was their teacher, my wondering child,
And He watched over each tiny thing;
He led them aright o'er the watery wild,
And strengthened each weary wing;
That God, whose words in the scriptures tell
Of a cloudless land where we, too, may dwell."
"And He warns that here, in this changeful earth,
We must quit our dwelling soon!
But He points to a heaven where no pain has birth,
And He offers to guide us home.
But let this, my sweet one, a lesson be,
The fowls of the air have more faith than we!"

In the chronicles of this period is the following notice: "1696, Jan. 20th. The king caused Madame Guyon to be arrested a few days ago, and sent to the castle of Vincennes, where she will be strictly guarded, apparently for a long time. She is accused of having maintained, both by word of mouth and by her writings, a very dangerous doctrine, and one which nearly approaches to heresy. She has imposed on many persons of eminent virtue. A long search was made for her, before she could be taken. She was found in the Fauxbourg of St. Antoine in great concealment."

In referring to her feelings while thus imprisoned, we notice the following: "I passed my time in great peace, content to spend the remainder of my life there, if such should be the will of God. I employed part of my time in writing religious songs. I and my maid La Gautiere, who was with me in prison, committed them to heart as fast as I made them. Together we sang praises to thee, O our God!

"It sometimes seemed to me as if I were a little bird whom the Lord had placed in a cage and that I had nothing to do now but to sing. The joy of my heart gave a brightness to the objects around me. The stones of my prison looked, in my eyes, like rubies. I esteemed them more than all the gaudy brilliancies of a vain world. My heart was full of that joy which thou givest to them who love thee in the midst of their greatest crosses."

During this and the three following years, her imprisonment was almost forgotten by the gay and volatile French people, so absorbed had they become in a grand literary controversy which was at that time going on between Bossuet and Fenelon, in relation to the doctrines of the inner life, of which she was considered the prime mover. This antagonism between two of the greatest minds of the age, resulted in a display of literary knowledge and power of argument, to which theological history furnishes few parallels. Catholic France awaited almost breathlessly the publication of those rival works which will ever live as monuments of the skill of two master minds; of men, in whom the deep, holy simplicity of the little child of the one was triumphant over the dogmatic, dictatorial arguments and crafty insinuation of the other.

Jeanne Guyon was vindicated; the Pope of Rome refused to condemn the doctrines of Fenelon, though Louis, in his capacity as eldest son of the church, earnestly requested him to do so. After an imprisonment of nine months in Vincennes, she was removed to Vaugirard, in which prison she remained two years, until the Archbishop of Paris became alarmed at the influence she still exerted over those with whom she was yet able to communicate. Her enemies finally prevailed upon the over-zealous king to imprison her in the Bastille. In one of the dungeons of that historic abode, where man's inhumanity to man attained its most terrible exemplification, she was incarcerated four years.

Perhaps no one incident of her life more effectually brought her into the notice and sympathy of the world. Twelve feet of thick wall on every side sufficed not to prevent that exercise of faith which could remove mountains and set at naught the impotent designs of the most powerful monarch of earth. Of a truth, God made the wrath of her enemies to serve Him in this also.

How her life was passed in the Bastille, we know not of particulars. On pain of death were any disclosures made, and the oath of life-long secrecy was exacted from all who entered its dreaded precincts, bond or free.

Did not the remembrance of her unflinching trust in God remain with us, we could not cease to wonder how that she, a refined and delicate woman endured calamities under which stout-hearted men sank in sudden and terrible despair. "I being in the Bastille," she writes, "said to Thee, O my God! if thou art pleased to render me a spectacle to men and angels, thy holy will be done! All that I ask is, that thou wilt be with and save those who love thee; so that neither life nor death, nor principalities nor powers may ever separate them from the love of God which is in Jesus Christ. As for me, what matters it what men think of me, or what they make me suffer, since they cannot separate me from that Saviour whose name is engraven in the very bottom of my heart?"

"Father, forgive them, they know not what they do!" that crowning sentence of Christ's redemption found echo in the dungeons of France, of Italy and of Spain; and in the dying breath of Molinos and Fenelon, the Huguenot and the Port Royalist, a pure, unselfish love found utterance in sentiments no less divine.

Fifteen years were yet allotted to her, when, by order of the king, her imprisonment was changed to banishment to the city of Blois; years of exile and great bodily infirmity resulting from her abode in the Bastille; yet these never interrupted the continuance of her efforts in the cause of Christianity. A great number of persons visited her here to receive her instructions and pay their respects to her character.

In 1717 she died at Blois, aged sixty-nine years. "No clouds rested upon her vision; no doubts perplexed the fulness of her joy."

The Archbishop of Cambrai two years before had passed to a peaceful and enduring reward; Father La Combe was numbered with him, and now the spirit of their greatest earthly friend ascended to share with them in heaven the joys which were her assurance through life.

In closing thus the narrative of Jeanne Guyon's life, the writer would repeat the desire, already expressed, that it may prove an incentive to further inquiry.

Thankfully does he remember the circumstances of his first acquaintance with it, and those first impressions which rendered Upham's labors so dear, are but deepened by the perusal necessitated in preparing the foregoing synopsis.

In conclusion, if we look with sadness on the degeneracy of that Christianity which found expression in the Roman Catholic creed as it was defended by Bossuet, it were well that modern Quakerism, before she begins to throw stones at that, should duly consider the fragile nature of her own dwelling. Let him that is without sin among us cast the first stone.

The present condition of the Society of Friends when compared with its status during the last half of the seventeenth century, is not wholly dissimilar to the state of Romanism in the time of Fenelon, as contrasted with the Christianity of the second century.

As with the cotemporaries of Guyon, so it is with the Friends of to-day. But, where are our Fenelons, our Guyons?

The life-blood of those former principles which made open ears and willing hands to tingle in the time of Fox and Penn, courses slowly now through an apathetic frame. Deprived of the individual earnestness of its members, the body ecclesiastic is lapsing into premature old age; a fresh infusion of the zeal of its youthful days, is needed to revive it, to refill the shrunken veins and restore the hale and hearty prime of manhood. Although we may clothe the living principle in ceremony, or hide reality in formal observance, or rest upon the laurels of our ancestors, and not upon the exercise of their Faith; yet the pure Christianity of George Fox remains forever the legacy of mankind; though creeds and opinions change, it standeth sure, though to-day's Quakerism becomes the grave of its members, its first principles will never lack expounders nor cease to spread themselves abroad. Not Quaker principles, but the Friends need reformation. Our mission, our charities, may well begin at home. The field is wide; the harvest, over-ripe; the laborers, few indeed. Well-meaning men and women may rise to such aspiring heights as to overlook the fairest opportunities, which they are tramping under foot.

Jeanne Guyon went not to India or Africa or Japan; she heard the crying need of her people; though despised and rejected of her brethren, she labored more abundantly than they all: her charity began at home and it was blessed. May those, then, whose youth gives them the fuller hope, the wider scope for future usefulness, take the more earnest heed, and more fully appreciate that the need of slumbering Quakerism to-day is an awakening from the dormant repose on inherited merit; in short, a going on unto perfection in the footsteps of Fox and Luther and Guyon.

How Dr. Guthrie became a Tee-Totaler.—In a journey in Ireland, in 1840, in an open car, the weather was cold, with a lashing rain. By the time we reached a small inn we were soaked with water outside, and as those were days, not of tea and toast, but of toddy drinking, we thought the best way was to soak ourselves with whiskey inside. Accordingly we rushed into the inn, ordered warm water, and got our tumblers of toddy. Out of kindness to our car driver we called him in. He was not very well clothed—indeed, he rather belonged in that respect to the order of my ragged school in Edinburgh. He was soaking with wet, and we offered him a good rummer of toddy. We thought that what was "sauce for the goose was sauce for the gander," but our car driver was not such a gander as we, like geese, took him for. He would not taste it.

"Why?" we asked; "what objection have you?"

"Said he, 'Plase, your riv'rence, I am a tee-totaler, and won't taste a drop of it.'"

Well, that stuck in my throat, and went to my heart and (in another sense than drink, though,) to my head. Here was an humble, uncultivated, uneducated carman; and I said: "If this man can deny himself this indulgence, why should not I, a Christian minister?" I remembered that; and I have remembered it to the honor of Ireland. I have often told the story, and thought of the example set by the poor Irishman for our people to follow. I carried home the remembrance of it with me to Edinburgh. That circumstance, along with the scenes in which I was called to labor daily for years, made me a tee-totaler.—Pleasant Hours.

"Who did Sin, this Man or his Parents?"—It was an accepted doctrine among the rabbins that blindness, lameness, spinal weakness, and other bodily defects, descended to the children, not only on account of the real wickedness of the parents, but also on account of their failure to perform the ceremonies prescribed by rabbinic ritualism.—*S. Abner Eldridge.

In connection with the character of Abner Eldridge, mention of whose death was made in No. 51 of "The Friend," vol. 59, there seems to arise the expressive language, "Behold an Israelite indeed in whom is no guile." Also the blessing and hope attending the possession "of a meek and quiet spirit." W. P. T.

Couple Heaven With It.—An aged Christian had paused to rest himself as he trudged along under a heavy load on a warm summer day. An acquaintance had just accosted him, when a splendid carriage rolled past, in which a haughty man rode, whose whole appearance bespoke a life of luxurious ease. "What do you think of the Providence of which you sometimes speak?" said the acquaintance. "You know that that is a wicked man; yet he spreads himself like a green bay-tree. His eyes stand out with fatness; he is not plagued as other men; while you, believing that all the silver and gold is the Lord's, serving Him and trusting in His providence, and toiling and sweating in your old age, get little more than bread and water. How can you reconcile this with Providence?"

The aged saint looked at the questioner in amazement, and, with the greatest earnestness, replied: "Couple Heaven with it! couple Heaven with it and then!" Yes, that addition sweetens many a bitter cup, and enriches many a poor lot. "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; while we look not at the things which are seen; for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things that are not seen are eternal."—Times of Refreshing.

After breakfast and the scripture reading I was constrained to express something, by way of stimulating to good order in sitting down to meals; that we may be favored in our short pauses at such times, to participate also in renewed refreshment of spirit. Paying but a slight regard to those moments allowed in a family for individual, secret breathing to the Fountain of all our right supplies, temporal and spiritual, is attended with great loss. There is a danger of the lamp of life, in a spiritual sense becoming dim, and even being extinguished, by the carcs of this life. The deep work of regeneration, redemption, and entire sanctification, is not sufficiently the object of Christian professors.—Mary Capper.

"Many of the Jews had Come . . . to Console them."—According to the ancient Jewish ritual, those who came to condole with the mourners had to return with them from the grave to the house, there to station themselves in a circle around the mourners, repeating prayers, and offering consolation. The rule was that this circle of consolers should consist of not less than ten persons; but it usually consisted of many more. In token of grief, the couches upon which the mourners and the consolers sat were lowered so as to come nearer to the ground, or else all sat upon the ground. The consolers remained with the mourners during the days of mourning; but there was a certain defense from this publicity in the fact that the consoler had no right to speak until the mourner spoke; and the mourner had the privilege further of indicating, by nodding, that he was now comforted and that the consolers need not continue to sit around him any longer.

Crossing the Potato.—An English firm of seedsmen, have been experimenting on the common garden potato, by fertilizing the plant with the pollen of other species of the same genus, Solanum. The pollens of the Tomato, of the climbing Bitter-sweet (Solanum dulcamara), and of the Night-shade, (Solanum nigrum), all enabled the Potato to perfect its fruit. Considerable interest is felt to notice the result of this cross fertilization on the plants that grow from it another year.

Tiles made from Paper.—Another one of the constantly multiplying uses to which paper is being applied is the manufacture of tiles for roofing. The tiles are pressed into designs before the pulp hardens, and are then partially dried previous to being subjected to a water-proof solution. Thoroughly impregnated with the preparation to resist moisture, they are baked to harden in them the water-proof mixture. After the baking the tiles are treated to a mixture imparting an enameled surface; to this is added a coating of sand, whereby the pulp is rendered proof against the action of heat or flame. By the use of different-colored sands, a variety of tints may be imparted to the tiles, which, after the application of the enameling mixture and sands, are baked a second time, after which they are ready for use. Besides the inherent lightness of the pulp tiles, which obviates the necessity of a heavy frame to support a weighty roof, the pulp tile, being tough, and not brittle like slate, is far less liable to be broken from blows, stones thrown upon them, or human footsteps. Again, slate tiles cannot be laid compactly together on a roof on account of their brittleness, which prevents their being drawn tightly together by nails. Through the fibrous pulp nails may be driven as close home as in shingles, thereby binding them closely to the bed and without any possibility of lateral movement, or together, being blown away in a high wind, as slates loosely fastened on roofs so frequently are. Nails penetrate the pulp tiles more easily than shingles, and the tiles lie closer together, being more elastic than wood.—American.

Flooding the Sahara.—The extensive projects for the flooding of the Sahara desert which have been rumored from time to time as being contemplated by the French authorities in Algeria, are reduced to their proper dimensions by G. W. Plympton in an article in Science, in which he concisely explains and illustrates with maps the true proportions of the undertaking. The regions which it is proposed to flood are about 250 miles southwest of Tunis, and consist of barren, flat surfaces full of small basin-like depressions filled with salt water or deposits of gypsum. The more extensive of these areas are known as "chotts" by the natives, and two of them called Chott Melghigh and Chott Gharsa are from 35 to 100 feet below sea-level. These it is proposed to flood by cutting a canal to the gulf of Gabes, some one hundred miles distant. If this were successfully accomplished it would make an inland sea of some 3000 square miles in extent, or about half the area of Lake Ontario. The actual execution of the work is by no means assured as yet, but should it ever be carried out as at present proposed it is safe to say that none of the dangers which have been dilated on by certain imaginative persons,—such as lowering the ocean to the extent of making the principal harbors of the world useless, or seriously lowering the temperature of France,—need be anticipated.—American.

Russian Iron.—The iron deposits of the Crivog Rog district in the South of Russia, long reputed among the richest in the world, are about to be developed, and, if the plans relating to them are carried out, will cut a considerable figure in the iron markets of Europe. A company, with a capital of ten million dollars has been formed to work them, and the Ekaterinen railway, recently built by the government, connects with the rich coal fields of the Donetz valley. Since 1883 this district has yielded about 3000 tons of ore yearly, at a cost on board cars of 64 cents per ton. An outlet to Poland from this district was opened last year, and the ore began to make its appearance at the works of the Vistula region, and was worked with great satisfaction. The Russian government offers, by way of encouragement to the company, an order for 100,000 tons of rails and materials, and offers a bounty for steel rails made in the district. An arsenal and gun factory will also probably be established in this region.

New Petroleum Field.—The recently discovered oil fields in the region of the Red Sea promise to be of considerable importance. The entire peninsula of Gimsah, where the oil has been found, is of volcanic structure, and devoid of the slightest trace of vegetation or fresh water. The first oil borings were made at a distance of 400 feet from the sea. At a depth of 156 feet a copious flow of oil was obtained. It is estimated that 3,500 barrels were discharged in 24 hours, and the flow has since been maintained at the same rate. The petroleum is of a dark greenish color, limpid. It is mixed with salt water, and discharges carbonic acid gas. By allowing it to stand for some time, the salt water settles to the bottom, and may be drawn off. The surrounding country is quite uninhabited, on account of the absence of drinking water and vegetation. All provisions are supplied from Suez. The climate, however, is healthful, and the otherwise intense heat is moderated by frequent winds.

The Flora of Palestine.—In a recent contribution of the Palestine Exploration Fund, the flora of the Holy Land is shown to be made up of exceedingly diverse sections. The flora of the coast is simply a reproduction of that of Sicily, Greece, Asia Minor and northern Syria; while those of the Lebanon mountains, of the region of Jerusalem, the depression of the Jordan valley, and the Eastern table-land, are to a great extent distinct and characteristic. The section to the south of the Dead Sea is a striking example, where in the one little wadi of Zuweirah more than one hundred and sixty plants were collected, out of which only twenty-seven were forms common to Europe, while the great mass—one hundred and thirty-five species—are African, scarcely any of them ever entering Europe at all, and many of them altogether local. Thirty-seven of the Ethiopian forms are also Indian plants. Two are worthy of mention: one, the papyrus plant, now covers many acres in the marshes of Lake Hulch, afar in the north of the land! But it has long since ceased to exist in the borders of the Nile, being unknown further north than latitude seven degrees north on the White Nile,—i. e., in Ethiopia. The other is the Ausher of the Arabs, a species of gigantic asclepias, occurring on the north, west, and south of the Dead Sea, but not again till the borders of Nubia—a specially tropical plant. These facts raise the interesting question, How was this isolated region of the basin of the Dead sea and the Jordan peopled by plants so peculiar and tropical? It lies nearly thirteen hundred feet below the level of the ocean, is hemmed in by two parallel mountain-ranges, rising between three and five thousand feet above the ocean, and is isolated from Nubia or Ethiopia by a sea and a desert, each of which would stand as an impassable barrier to migrating species of plants. And, between the two, it is the Sahara rather than the Mediterranean that interposes the greater obstacle. There can be only one explanation. The plants now found in this profound chasm are survivals from geologic times, ages when the temperature in all this part of the world was tropical, and one and the same flora prevailed over the whole area from Ethiopia to Palestine.—The Independent.

Lanoline.—Fat from Wool.—Sheep's wool, in its natural state, contains, besides a number of impurities, a considerable amount of fat. Indeed, in certain kinds of wool—Australian, for instance—the amount of fat is so great that its presence may be noticed by simply squeezing the wool in the hand. Formerly it was the custom to wash the sheep before clipping the wool; but this practice resulted in considerable loss of life among the animals, and has hence been given up. The wool is now washed after clipping. The fats, have heretofore been wasted, or, at least, in certain cases, used as a source for heat, or gas. By means of centrifugal machinery the fats may now be extracted very completely from the waste waters, and already have found a number of very valuable applications. The crude wool-fat is a soft, disagreeable substance of a brown color, and with a disgusting goaty odor. It contains about one-quarter of its weight of free fat acids, the presence of which has heretofore much impeded efforts to utilize the fat. The fat would not saponify with either water or alkali, and hence could not be used for soap-making; a fact which also was discouraging to investigators. It has been found lately, however, that wool-fat can be saponified if it is treated with fusing potash, so that an important field is opened at once for it. It has been found that when in a pure state this fat acts as a most admirable base for ointments, and it has already achieved a reputation in pharmaceutical practice. The purified wool-fat is called Lanoline.

"He . . . Anointed his Eyes."—The belief in the healing power of saliva was universal in the ancient Oriental world, as it still is wherever primitive customs survive. The "fasting spittle" (the saliva of one who has not broken his fast for the day) forms to-day one of the most trusted remedies of the folk-doctor, the village "wise woman," as it did thousands of years ago. In diseases of the eyes, the "fasting spittle" is believed to be peculiarly efficacious all over the East; and the same popular remedy is found as far west as Scotland. The prevalence of this belief in ancient times is witnessed to by Pliny, who mentions saliva as a remedy for ophthalmia.

—The Late London Yearly Meeting.—The British Friend says: "Probably in no previous Yearly Meeting has a more generous and expansive feeling of goodwill towards the American Friends, of all bodies, gone forth than in the late assembly. It was both felt and admitted that the extent of practical recognition and sympathy towards these had been very unduly circumscribed by the technical and the actual limitations imposed by the mode of correspondence with American Yearly Meetings as hitherto adopted. And notwithstanding the recommendation of the Conference, held in the earlier part of the year, that no change should be made, it was now evident that a sounder and better-informed judgment could be arrived at, and that the various smaller bodies of well-concerned Friends in America have solid claims upon the justice as well as the love of their English brethren, which have been, at any rate, in some real degree, ignored by the system hitherto adopted. Hence the whole question was now referred to a second conference, for more matured and more comprehensive recommendation as to future action."

—French Deputies and Arbitration.—A memorial, signed by 50 members of the Chamber of Deputies, was presented in the Fourth Month last to de Freycinet, representing the Government of France, by Frederick Passy, President of the French Peace Society, in favor of settling by arbitration the difficulties between the Turks and Greeks. The British Friend states that de Freycinet, in his official reply, expressed his absolute accord with F. Passy and his supporters in declaring that the system of arbitration ought more and more to prevail, instead of a recourse to arms; and declared that "this is the tendency of civilization." He further observed, "that the concert of the Great Powers, through their representatives, is a real form of arbitration, and I will add that the action of France in such intervention is always exercised, and will continue to be exercised, in a sense as pacific as M. Passy himself could desire."

—Music at Ackworth School.—This Boarding School is under the care of London Yearly Meeting, and holds there a position somewhat corresponding to Westtown School in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. At the last "General Meeting" of the School it was stated that 69 of the girls were studying music, considerably more than one-half of the whole number, 107. We suppose this institution professes to train those educated in it in a belief in the doctrines of Friends, and in a respect for the teachings of the founders of the Society. If so, we think its teachers might wish for an expurgated edition of George Fox's Journal, to place in the hands of their pupils, which should omit all such expressions as the following: "I was moved to cry against all sorts of music."

—International Congress of the Salvation Army.—This body of people now has 1,552 corps, and 3,700 officers. A correspondent of the S. S. Times, says that a few months since "General" Booth conceived the idea of taking advantage of the opportunity afforded by the Indian and Colonial Exhibition at South Kensington, and of bringing together his "officers and soldiers" from the Colonies, India, the United States, France, Switzerland, Italy, Sweden, and many other parts of the world, for a ten days' council for prayer and deliberation. Such an order was sent forth, and over fifteen thousand men and women, representing the above nationalities, gathered at "headquarters," and there divided into religious bands, which filled Exeter Hall, Congress Hall, the Great Western Hall, and the Grecian Theatre. From four to six services were daily held at these places. The proceedings were initiated by a "grand procession" through the principal streets of London, in which these delegates paraded, with banners flying and bands playing. These corps had different names, among which were the "Household Troops," "The Training Home Staff," "The Prisoner Brigade." There was one large corps which was called "The Entertainment Corps," and these men and women performed the duty of entertaining the Red Indian, the Chinese, the Hindoo, the Cinese, and a dozen other foreign "soldiers" who had come up to meet the "Tribes."

The rapid growth of the Salvation Army is a remarkable fact. It seems to find less favor in the United States than in many other countries—perhaps because it finds a smaller proportion of the ignorant and uncultivated who are most likely to be influenced by its peculiar methods. As it is controlled by one man, William Booth, it is scarcely probable that the organization will long survive his decease.

—Fidelity to Conviction.—The president of a temperance organization in London has recently given striking proof of the strength of his convictions. He possessed a cellar of very rare wines, stored in 500 bottles, and valued at upward of £600 sterling, one of his friends advised him to present the whole of this stock to various hospitals, to be used for medicinal purposes. But being firmly convinced that alcohol has no curative value, and suspecting that such of the wine which is presented to hospitals finds its way rather into the stomachs of the staff than of the patients, he poured the flood of alcoholic wealth into the public sewer!

We have received from the J. B. Lippincott Company, publishers, a book containing "Incidents in the Life and Experiences of Joshua Maule;" in which the author unbosoms to the public with great freedom, his own inner feelings, and the records of his private life, as well as his comments on the controversies in the Society of Friends for the past sixty years.

The book indicates that the writer is sincerely attached to those doctrines and testimonies which have ever characterized the consistent members of the Society of Friends; but it shows also, that he has not exercised that toleration towards differences of judgment in the manner of meeting the difficulties which have arisen, which is necessary to enable people to act together as societies. He has assumed, as it seems to us, on very insufficient grounds, that many of his fellow members, who had been equally concerned with himself for the support of the same principles, had lost their attachment to them, because they were not prepared to adopt the course of action which seemed right to him.

The consequence was, that he and some other worthy Friends, severed their connection with Ohio Yearly Meeting, of which they were members; and a similar course was pursued by a corresponding class in the limits of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting—yet both of those Yearly Meetings had borne open testimony against the doctrinal errors to which these persons were opposed; and have never retracted that testimony, but have continued to labor for the maintenance of the original principles of our Society.

In course of time a difference of judgment arose among the members of these smaller groups of Friends, a difference which, so far as the book shows, did not involve any question of doctrine, but was rather personal in its character. This led to further disintegration, and left Joshua Maule without any church fellowship, unless it were with a few isolated individuals.

While giving the author credit for sound principles, sincerity of character and upright intentions, we think the book is a mournful illustration of the manner in which these good qualities may be prevented from fully producing their legitimate fruits.

The British Friend, for the Seventh Month, publishes a communication which says, that a young English Friend, who had gone to reside near New York, mentions "that he is painfully impressed with the un-Friendly mode of conducting some of the meetings in that Yearly Meeting." For instance, at Brooklyn, a woman "conducts" the meeting on First-days. "She sits at the head of the meeting with a Bible in her hands, from which she expounds for about half-an-hour, after which other 'Friends' fill up the time with singing and speaking. There is scarcely any, if any, silence. Further, with the sanction of a committee of the meeting, circulars are sent round to the members of the meeting as follows: 'Mrs. Weaver, who has for some time been laboring faithfully amongst us, is dependent upon the meeting for her support, and as subscriptions do not come in very fast, the Monthly Meeting's committee have authorized her to send round a general request to all their members to assist in her maintenance.'" Such statements are humiliating to those who love the Society of Friends and its principles and testimonies; and we do not doubt that there are a number of such in the limits of New York Yearly Meeting. We desire their encouragement, in bearing a faithful testimony against such departures, and in laboring for the removal of these blemishes upon our profession. It would be a great mistake for the attention and labors of the body to be so much directed to outside objects as to neglect the building up and preservation of its own members in a faithful adherence to the doctrines and the spirit of our profession; and thus to be compelled to make the mournful acknowledgement, "Mine own vineyard I have not kept."

According to the New York Commercial News, the human family living to-day on earth consists of about 1,450,000,000 individuals: not less, probably more. These are distributed over the earth's surface, so that now there is no considerable part where man is not found. In Asia, where he was first planted, there are now approximately about 800,000,000, densely crowded; on an average, 120 to the square mile. In Europe there are 320,000,000, averaging 100 to the square mile; not so crowded, but everywhere dense, and at points over-populated. In Africa there are 210,000,000. In America, North and South, there are 110,000,000, relatively thinly scattered and recent. In the islands, large and small, probably 10,000,000. The extremes of white and black are as five to three; the remaining 700,000,000 intermediate brown and tawny. Of the race 500,000,000 are well clothed—that is, wear garments of some kind to cover their nakedness; 700,000,000 are semi-clothed, covering inferior parts of the body; 250,000,000 are practically naked. Of the race 500,000,000 live in houses partly furnished with the appointments of civilization; 700,000,000 in huts or caves with no furnishings; 260,000,000 have nothing that can be called a home, are barbarous and savage. The range is from the topmost road—the Anglo-Saxon civilization, which is the highest known—down to naked savagery. The portion of the race lying below the line of human condition is, at the very least, three-fifths of the whole, or 900,000,000.

DIED, on the 17th of Second Mo., 1886, MARIA COPE, wife of Thomas C. Cope, in the 39th year of her age, a member of Guernsey Particular, and Flushing Monthly Meeting, Guernsey Co., Ohio. Through a long and suffering illness she often experienced much poverty of spirit, yet at times was made partaker of those seasons of refreshment which the world cannot give, or take away, saying at one time, "The presence of the dear Father, how sweet to my heart, yet we can not expect it all the time." As the close drew near frequent were her petitions that her Heavenly Father would be pleased soon to take her home; and when told "These are the damps of death," she replied "Sweet, how sweet." She retained her faculties, and was able to give directions in regard to waiting upon her until within a few minutes of the close.

—Seventh Mo. 4th, 1886, at the residence of her husband, in Newfane, Niagara Co., N. Y., HANNAH N. BRECKON, wife of William Breckon, aged 71 years. For a number of years she had been prevented from attending meeting on account of poor health.

JOSEPH WALTON,

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

Twelfth Mo. 23rd, 1835. Tried and discouraged. E. C. was concerned to revive the account of the prophet when he thought he was left alone, the Lord's prophets slain, and the altars thrown down; but he was shown there were those yet left in Israel who had not bowed the knee to Baal. So, he believed there was still a living remnant preserved, however tried these might at times feel, and almost ready to cast away their faith. He spoke encouragingly to the children. Setting before them how much more true enjoyment there was resulting from a life of dedication, than in following the vain gratifications of this life! quoting the Saviour's words, "My peace I give unto you, not as the world giveth," &c.

First Mo. 3rd, 1836. Another year has passed away. O, that I could say it has been one of improvement in best things. That there has not been that advancement there ought to have been, I am sensible of. "O, for a closer walk with God!" Being in the city, I attended three of their meetings. In the morning at Orange Street; afternoon and evening at Arch Street. The two former held in silence, or nearly so. In the evening, Thomas Kite and John Letchworth appeared in testimony, and Othniel Alsop in solemn supplication. Thomas compared our situation with that of the children of Israel; setting forth the many remarkable preservations they experienced. He thought that if ever there was a people that had cause to commemorate the gracious dealings of our Heavenly Father, we had; with further enlargement. Then, in a very impressive manner, he addressed the younger part of the meeting; believing there were those present who were not ashamed to own their dear Master, and show on whose side they were. He reverted feelingly to the removal of fathers and mothers from amongst us, who were now gathered to their everlasting homes; and according to the course of nature, others must soon follow. Notwithstanding, he believed our precious testimonies would not be suffered to fall; but that the command of the Lord would go forth as formerly when Aaron was about to be gathered to his fathers: "Strip Aaron of his garments and put them on Eleazar his son." Instead of the fathers there would be the sons, and instead of the mothers the daughters. He believed there were those present who had been striven with as at the waters of Meribah; dear children, to whom his language was very sweet. J. L. followed, he did not wish to multiply words, but the very great love that Peter felt for his dear Master, when he endeavored to meet him on the water, the remarkable preservation he experienced when about sinking, he believed applicable to some individual present, whose life had been spared in a remarkable manner. He feared the kindness of the dear Master had been forgotten, and the command to "feed my lambs."

14th. During our silent sitting together this morning, my feelings were afresh awakened on taking a view of the uncertainty of our stay here in mutability. I fear there is too much indifference with me, to this all-important subject. When led to look seriously at it, O what feelings does it produce! to think there is a part within me that is to live through all the boundless ages of eternity, either in a happy or a miserable state; and according as I conduct myself here, will my portion be.

17th. What were my feelings at meeting this morning, when seeking to be gathered into stillness, to find myself divested of all good; felt as though I never had possessed one good thought, or done a good act. All my endeavors after inward stillness seemed to avail nought; an outward stillness was all I could come at. While thus bemoaning my situation, I was led to remember the expression of a dear ancient Friend, "Be not cast down because the Lord sometimes seemeth to hide his face from you, and that you feel not always that joy and refreshment that you sometimes are permitted to. Wonder not that temptations attend you, or that the Lord trieth and proveth you. It is the way of all that are gone to God; for even Jesus was tempted and tried, and is therefore become your captain, because he overcame."

28th. Our Monthly Meeting. How can I be sufficiently thankful for the favors of this day! Our meeting was held in silence; but the dear Master was very near, and there was that felt which spoke louder than words, making it a time of refreshment to my poor soul. After a desertion of all good, it is then we can appreciate such a favor, and strength is given to enter into covenant. It seemed as though I could hear the language, "Who is he that can harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good?" And afresh was I made to feel the preciousness of being a friend of the Lord Jesus—more in value than all this world can give.

Second Mo. 26th. Completed my twenty-fourth year. How rapidly time is passing away! Should another year be granted, may it be a year of improvement in best things. I feel sensibly the uncertainty of life.

28th. E. C. engaged in testimony in our meeting to-day. He rehearsed the account we have of Moses, who "chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season." He believed there were of this description present, for whom encouragement flowed. I was instructed and encouraged this afternoon in reading letters and memorandums of our dear father. It seemed to be his chief joy to be found doing the will of his Heavenly Father: may we his children follow his footsteps.*

Third Mo. 3rd. Our Monthly Meeting, held at Gwynedd. How attached to that little spot where our meeting is held, do I feel! I taught a little school, nine months, in that house; and some of the best hours of my life were spent there. It often was made a little Bethel to me; a silent witness to seasons never to be forgotten. E. C. acceptably engaged in testimony from, "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God," &c. He believed there were present those to whom this language was to go forth; deeply tried ones, surrounded with many doubts and fears. Such were under the Lord's peculiar care; for the help of these He would arise.

6th. Stripped of all that's good. I have kept much in the quiet this afternoon, which has conquered a little to my strength.

14th. Humbled under a sense of the kindness of my Heavenly Father towards me.

24th. During the past week I attended all the sittings of our Yearly Meeting; a favor unmerited. It has been to me a season of instruction.

Fifth Mo. 5th. Have just returned from our Quarterly Meeting. We had the company and labors of our friends W. and E. Evans, and S. Hillman; all had much and good service. Under a sense of the favors of to-day, renewed desires have been raised to be found more faithfully walking with my God. W. E. was excellent, particularly to the younger part of the meeting, encouraging us to be willing to deny ourselves, and follow faithfully our dear Master, &c. E. followed in supplication; especially on behalf of some who were in a land of drought, receiving neither dew nor rain. She seemed to think the dear Master was very near them, and would ere long arise for their help; and seemed earnest for

* To have had religiously concerned parents, as above alluded to, is surely to be numbered among the invaluable blessings of this life. Their counsel, their example, their watchful care, and above all their earnest breathings to the Father of mercies and God of all comfort for our preservation from the evils that are in the world, who can calculate such a favor and blessing? A Christian Poet has written:—

"My boast is not, that I deduce my birth
From loins enthroned, and rulers of the earth;
But higher far my proud pretensions rise—
The child of parents past into the skies."

Many young persons who have such parental guardianship, prize their privilege; and seek to give comfort and help to such by loving obedience, by following in their footsteps, and walking in the way they would have them to go; thus rising up to honor them and to call them blessed. And may such parents who do not fully feel the grave responsibility resting upon them, being not duly awake and concerned for the religious help and growth of their precious offspring as in the sight of the Omniscient, be aroused to a true sense thereof, so as to ask wisdom of Him who giveth liberally and upbraideth not, for that all-sufficient grace and strength which will enable them to train the tender lambs committed to their care, in the Lord's nurture and admonition. That so the promise may be verified, the hearts of the fathers shall be turned to the children, and the hearts of the children to the fathers: and "that both he that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together."

the encouragement of these. And then her prayers were put up for the young people; especially for some who were seeking to come to Christ, and whose prayer often was "reject me not." These would be cared for, and led gently along in the green pastures, and if faint, He would carry them in his arms. In the last meeting she was earnest for the support of our Christian testimonies, and pressed it upon us to be more careful and more watchful. She believed there were better days ahead for this people, though there might be further sufferings to be passed through first. She seemed to feel much for small meetings; and set forth the good effect even a few individuals in a neighborhood might have by an upright walking with their God. Dear S. Hillman revived the text, "I will pardon them whom I reserve," also, "I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by thy name, thou art mine." She believed it had been a day of renewed visitation to some present, and craved there might be a closing in.

16th. Our week-day meeting. I feel almost afraid to speak of the favors of this day, I am so undeserving! My heart was made to overflow, and secretly to return thanks. How is it I am thus cared for? The prayer hath again and again arisen, "Let not thy hand spare."

A Visit to a Country Monthly Meeting.

Sixth Mo. 12th, 1886. Feeling a desire to attend a neighboring Monthly Meeting, during the summer, I had renewed occasion to notice with gratitude the many sources of instruction opened to the attentive observer, through the goodness of our heavenly Father.

The meeting itself was one in which those present were livingly reminded of the great duty of watching unto prayer against the temptations of the evil one; for while it is a blessed truth, that "there remaineth a rest for the people of God;" yet we must not forget that this life is a scene of warfare, in which it is necessary to put on the whole armor of God, so that we may be able to withstand the wiles of the devil. Our blessed Redeemer enjoined his disciples to watch and pray; and although his divine grace visits all for their redemption, yet, if it is not heeded, we may be of that number who frustrate his gracious purposes.

It was an instructive and refreshing opportunity, in which there is reason to believe renewed desires were awakened to tread with patience the holy path of self-denial, in which the ransomed of the Lord must walk toward Zion, the heavenly city.

Several calls were made on Friends in the neighborhood, in which the feelings of interest and affection were afresh quickened; and additions made to one's stock of information by the sensible conversation of those who were visited.

As I approached the primitive station at which I was to take the cars on my return, I picked up one of the largest varieties of the Spring-beetle, often called by our countrymen "Blacksmiths," or "blacks." The bodies of these beetles are long in proportion to their width, and somewhat convex; the legs are short, so that if one accidentally falls on its back, it cannot reach the ground with its feet so as to turn itself over. But it effects this object in another and peculiar manner: on the under side, between the bases of the first pair of legs, it has a short, hard, blunt spine, the point of which is usually concealed in a cavity behind it. When it finds itself on its back, it bends back the head and breast, so as to unsheath this spine, and then suddenly and forcibly straightens itself. Either the point of the spine strikes on the sheath, or the back against the place on which it rests, with such force as to throw the body several inches into the air. If it does not alight upon its feet the first time, it repeats the operation.

The sight of this interesting insect reminded me of the pleasure with which I experimented with it in my younger years; and the interest with which I then watched it throwing itself into the air. As I picked it up for closer examination, it endeavored to escape from my fingers by the same convulsive performance, but finding this unavailing, soon lay motionless as if dead: a common stratagem with this genus of insects.

These spring-beetles, which in England are called "Click-beetles," from the noise they make in performing their peculiar jerking operation, are known to entomologists as Elaters, a name derived from a Latin word which means to raise or elevate, and probably given to them from their springing power. The one which I found is the Elaters oculatus, or Eyed Elater. It is a black color, sprinkled apparently with a white powder which gives it a mealy look. On each side of the thorax (or middle division of the insect), is a large oval black spot, like a patch of velvet, from which it derives its name of oculatus, or eyed. When examined with the microscope, these spots are seen to be densely covered with fine, soft black hairs, like the nap of velvet; and the white powder is found to be composed of minute feathery hairs, reminding one of the scales on the wing of a butterfly.

There are many species of the genus Elaters: more than sixty in Massachusetts alone. The grubs of some of them feed on wood, and others on the roots of grass or other plants. The species I found is one of the wood-eating kinds. Harris says he has found them in old apple trees. Some of the smaller root-eating species are at times so abundant as to be injurious to the crops of the farmer, especially in Europe. There the farmers and gardeners sometimes entrap the larvae, by strewing sliced turnips or potatoes in the field, and every morning gathering and destroying the grubs which have assembled to eat the bait.

One of the most interesting species of Elaters, is the fire-beetle of the West Indies, Elaters noctivivus. It is an inch or more in length, and gives out a strong light from two transparent eye-like spots on the thorax, as well as from the segments of the body beneath. The light is so powerful that it is said the smallest print may be read by its assistance.

On entering the station-house (a mere shed), to wait for the coming of the cars, I noticed the rough board seat was partially covered with sawdust. This was soon seen to be the chips of the Carpenter Bee, or borer, which had pierced several holes on the under side of the timbers which formed the framing of the building. This large bee has a broad open forehead, with a white spot on it, and has no sting; whereas the common humble bee, which is about the same size, has a more pointed head, which is black, and is armed with a sting, which it often uses on children who attempt to rob its nests of the delicious honey stored therein. The flavor of the honey and the pain of the sting are youthful reminiscences, neither of which have faded from memory.

I did not at this time cut my way into the timber that the bee had bored, but I had done so before, and knew how nicely rounded are the tubes they make; and how they store at its extremity a supply of bee-bread for the support of the larvae that emerges from the egg laid with it; and how artistically they build wooden partitions across the tube: thus dividing it into cells, in each of which an egg is laid, with its supply of food.

To reach my home it was requisite to change from one railroad to another, and to wait for an hour or more before the train I was to take arrived at the point of junction. A little examination of the vicinity of the station furnished several interesting plants. Among them were the Loosestrife (Systimachia stricta), with its long terminal raceme of bright yellow flowers; the long-leaved Starwort, or Chickweed (Stellaria longifolia), a peculiarly neat-looking species of this genus; and the Pellandra virginica, or Arrow-Arum, a water plant with leaves resembling those of the cultivated Calla, or Egyptian Lily, and having, like it, the stamens and pistils wrapped in a sheath, only that it is green instead of white, and more closely enfolds the incipient germs. In the Arrow-Arum this sheath, (or spathe, as botanists term such floral envelopes as those of the Calla, Indian Turnip, Skunk Cabbage, &c.) is quite long, extending much beyond the pistils and stamens. As the seed matures, the upper part of the spathe dies off, and the lower part closely invests the globular mass of seeds. The stem, which has been the flower, now gradually curves downward until it fairly plants the mass of seeds in the mud beneath.

Some Account of Joseph Hoag's Family,

TAKEN BY ELIZABETH ROBSON.

Charlotte, Chittenden County, Vt.

At Joseph Hoag's:—

His wife Huldah gave the following extraordinary account of their family:

"She and her husband were married in 1782, being each about 21 years of age. Both appeared in the ministry, and were afterwards acknowledged as ministers by their Monthly Meeting. They were in low circumstances, but industrious. After they had two children their house was burned at Nine Partners, where they then resided. They had two more children, and then removed to Charlotte, Vt., on uncleared land, not one tree having been cut down. They had only about seventy dollars worth of cattle. Her father died and left her some property, with which they had their clearing done; and paid the purchase money as they could spare it. She combed worsted, in addition to taking care of the family, which procured her a little money to buy bread, when her husband was too unwell to cultivate their land.

During this time they both occasionally travelled in the work of the ministry, and attended some Monthly Meetings. She carried her daughter Elizabeth on horseback and by water, about three hundred and fifty miles, before she was three months old. Huldah was the first Friend who held a meeting in Peru, N. Y., having both of their daughters (Hannah, a little more than a year old,) with her. She had to cross Lake Champlain with two young women Friends, without a man for a companion, and to lay out all night on an island in the lake, in the latter part of the year.

As the children grew up they evinced much seriousness. Their eldest daughter, Phebe, began to appear in the ministry when she was about twelve years of age. At the same meeting their son Nathan C. appeared in the same line, being ten years old. In about twenty months, Martha, being eleven years, and Hannah at seven years of age, began to appear in the ministry. The next was Elizabeth, at about twenty years, then Jemima, when about nineteen. Joseph D. appeared when in his seventeenth year, Lindley Murray, their youngest son, in his sixteenth year. The three last were not yet recommended, the other five had been acknowledged. Phebe, their eldest daughter, is deceased; she had seven children, and left five. Her sorrowing husband is an acknowledged minister, and two others appearing as such.

Joseph and his wife have travelled a good deal in the cause of Truth. Joseph has, as much as nine, ten, fifteen, or twenty months together, been from home. Huldah's journeys have not been so long, not more than nine or ten months at a time.

After coming to Charlotte there was no meeting, but they sat in their family; some neighbors coming and sitting with them. Some joined by conviction and others moved into the settlement. Two meetings are settled there; the first was held at Ferrisburg. They had to walk there for a time. She was appointed representative to the Monthly Meeting, seventy-five miles distant, when she had no shoes to wear. A friend lent her a pair.

They are now on a nice cleared farm, and live comfortably. The situation is beautiful. They have been blessed every way, and have been a blessing to their friends.

"O would some power the giftie gie us,
To see ourselves as others see us!"

The following article from the Pall Mall Gazette (London), in which the writer imagines George Fox revisiting the scene of his labors, and lamenting over the degeneracy of his successors in religious profession, may tend to awaken in some minds a sense of the inconsistency which marks too many of those who honor the memory of the early members of our Society, but refuse to walk in their footsteps in the path of self-denial and bearing the cross. It is taken from the British Friend.

GEORGE FOX AND THE QUAKERS OF TO-DAY.

"Membership in the Society of Friends this year shows a decrease of one."—Newspaper paragraph.

He stood at the gateway of a court in Bishops-gate street, London, a stout built, portly presence, "succulent" man. His garb was of an olden type; his breeches were of leather; his coat was collarless, of dark hue, with buttons not of silver but of ochimiy; his linen was faultlessly clean; his hat was broad-brimmed; his hair was long, his eyes bright and piercing, and his whole appearance staid, sober, solemn, and quaint. He looked like some portrait which had been embodied, and no greater contrast could be presented than his and that of the policeman he addressed:

"Constable," said he, "is this the meeting of the Children of the Light?"

"Never heard of them," was the reply. "This is a Quaker's meeting; stand aside, please."

"Nay" was the reply; "for I think that is where I should be. Thou art quiet in disposition; let me wait till I see."

And just then a stream of the successors of the "shining ones" Lamb speaks of set in. Cabs drew up, carriages set down, while from station and 'bus there came briskly groups, who looked wonderingly at the representative of the "suit of perennial leather," and passed in at the other side of the archway. For these were men well-to-do; spruce and dapper, without a spot on the broadcloth; and ladies whose finery and feathers and flowers seemed offensive to the old man.

"A briary, brambly nature," quoth he, "as I wrote to Robert Barclay, in 1675."

"Hush," said the policeman, "that gentleman's a member of Parliament."

"Ah!" he said sadly, "is it so? Did I not warn them when Oliver was lying in state, to keep 'out of the powers of the earth,' and to take heed of joining with this or the other, or meddling with any, or being busy with other men's matters?"

"But this is a wise and a learned man," was the reply of the official who guarded the entrance.

"I reasoned with such years ago. I told them that languages began at Babel; and that to teach me Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, and the seven arts, was not the way to make Christian ministers; being bred at Oxford or Cambridge, is not the fitness needed. It leads to the growth of the light chafy nature."

Here another rush of visitors, light-hued in the texture of their dresses, frilled and furbelowed, passes on, and the old man said, "That alderman of Newcastle who called Friends 'butterflies,' was not so far wrong, if these be followers of Truth." Another passing out raised his hat to these fair ladies, and provoked the audible comment, "The hat is not the honor that comes from above." Many were our sufferings because we would not remove our hats."

"I've heard so," said the policeman, "but the Quakers have changed in many things now. They act as mayors and magistrates, give splendid parties, and some of them go to church."

"Church! Dost thou call a steeple-house a church? or a mixed multitude a church? The Church is the pillar and ground of Truth, made up of living stones, living members: a spiritual household, not an old house made up of lime, stones and wood. I have been beaten and bruised and buffeted in many a steeple-house, but no such naughtiness could take place in the church. And do any Friends go to hear deceivers who take three hundred pounds a year for preaching the Scriptures? My coming was to bring them from temples, priests, and tithes." And here the bright paint of the passage-way offended the old man, who said, "I told the people on the Yorkshire moors that the painted beast had a painted house, and now a meeting-house is as unsavory. They are departing from my ways now."

Here two passers in the street stopped near the gateway, and one asked the other, "What news?" and the old man in a loud voice immediately said, "The news is, 'Repent, and fear the Lord.'"

"Be quiet," said the policeman, "all's well."

"How can all be well," was the reply, "if they are chafy, peevish, and crabbed? They are of that jangling crew who brought drums and kettles into our meetings, so that the truth might not be heard."

"Then there is sometimes speaking in the meetings, is there?"

"Speak? Of course; we proclaim the light in the houses and on the hill-tops, in the steeple-houses and on the sea-sands, so that thousands are convinced; and there is great turning to the Truth. Even the soldiers and constables who come to disturb our meetings are reached—"

"What," said the policeman, "constables disturb your meetings? That cannot be. What was that for?"

"What was that for? Because we said 'thou,' as the grammar did; because we married without the priest; because we would not swear, or pay tithes, or go to church."

"Then it seems to have cured you of most of these: for your Friends say 'you,' like other folks; some of them are married by priests, and pay tithes and go to church."

"Is it so?" said the old man, sadly. "Then their silent meeting, their fewness of numbers and their decrease, the dissensions in America, and the return to beggarly elements of singing and pre-arrangements: they are all accounted for now. If they will return to man's worship and man's ways, then they will die out."

And slowly he faded from Devonshire House court.

For "The Friend."

While reading the communication of "D. H.," in "The Friend," for 5th of Sixth Month, my spirit was brought under deep exercise, until I was willing to cry aloud, "spare oh God, thy chosen people, and suffer not the enemy that dwells in the heart of poor fallen man, to arise and reign over thy whole heritage! Suffer that a remnant be left to pay their vows unto thee; that prayer and praise may continually arise like sweet incense before thee! Spare the tender lambs; bind up the broken-hearted; bind about them thy holy banner of love; and may all the weary and depressed find a solace in Thy presence.

In the Lord is true rest for the fainting soul, and for those who have no might nor strength of their own. Oh, that all might come unto Him, bowing low at His feet in reverence; that his blessing may again rest upon his people, and the bitter cup be removed from the weary burdened souls that have been long oppressed. May the faithful servants flee quickly into the fold of Christ, the holy enclosure, where there is safety; for there the spirit of the Lord fills the space. Without his heavenly life in our hearts, what are we? what else will keep or sustain us? Naught but his holy life-giving presence will support us, when we are summoned to appear before the Judge of the quick and the dead. Unless we have been washed by the Spirit of the Lord, and a new name written on the tablets of our hearts by his finger, we cannot be admitted into the life without end, where all the raptures of heavenly bliss are in store for the faithful servants of the Lord.

Oh let us be willing to be anything or nothing, that we may be the servants of the great King Immanuel! Who would turn a deaf ear to the tender entreaties of the Spirit of truth within his heart; that spirit which comforts the tried soul, and teaches it the way of life? Whoever is taught in the school of Christ, may become wise unto salvation; and accepted of the Lord even if despised and rejected by the worldly-wise. Let us not depart, nor step aside from the way that is cast up for the faithful to walk in. He who is the light of this pathway, hidden from the world, will lead us as He did formerly the children of Israel; for their bread was sure and their garments waxed not old. True it is, "Seek first the Kingdom of Heaven, and all else will be added."

Be not discouraged; many precious promises have been given us. God, our Saviour overcame Satan, and cast him out of heaven, so is He able to cast him out of our hearts, and restore peace, a heavenly peace that nothing can remove. May the will of the Lord be done in us, as his chosen people, and may we earnestly seek that nothing obstruct our progress Zionward. Again I entreat you to flee quickly to the rock from which we were hewn.

The Care and Disposal of the Dead.

The Sanitary Engineer after speaking of the subject of Cremation and of a Law on this subject discussed in the French Chamber of Deputies and passed on the 30th of Third month 1886—proceeds to say—"While no restriction on the liberty of individuals in this respect is desirable, it is quite another matter to urge that cremation should be substituted for burial in all cases. The great argument used by the advocates of this last idea is that earth burial is dangerous to the public health because of the air and water pollution which it produces, and especially because it may thus be the means of the transmission of the germs of contagious disease. The effects of cemeteries upon the health of those living in their vicinity has been extensively and carefully investigated by competent inquirers in recent years, and the result is that there is no evidence as to the production or spread of disease from such a source. Of these investigations, one of the most interesting was that made in Saxony to determine the changes which occur in bodies buried in the ordinary way, and the results of which were reported by Dr. V. Rheinhard in 1882. A number of bodies which had been buried for different lengths of time were disinterred and their condition carefully noted. This was done for various kinds of sepulchres, and for the rich as well as the poor. It was found that in all soils the soft parts of the adult human body are completely destroyed in seven years, and that, as a rule, fetor disappears in three months unless the body has been placed in an air and water tight burial-case. The clothing resists changes longer than the corpses. No proof was found that the health of those dwelling near churchyards was thereby injured.

The chief danger to health from suburban cemeteries is from the pollution of subsoil water which they may occasion. The amount of this danger depends in part on the geological structure and surface topography of the ground and the direction of flow of the subsoil water, and in part on the distance of wells or springs from the cemetery.

In attempts to protect or promote the public health it is wise, as a rule, to deal first with those dangers which are the greatest, the most obvious, and the easiest remedied, and not to run the risk of wasting force for want of concentration of effort. The dangers to health which are connected with the dead are chiefly connected with the mode of caring for the body prior to its interment; in comparison with these the dangers due to cemeteries are comparatively insignificant. The spread of contagion by funerals, the keeping of a dead body for several days in the house, and, in the case of the poorer classes, in the living rooms of the family—these are the first things to be guarded against.

The most urgent need in our large cities is for small mortuary houses located in or near the centres of the tenement-house and poorer population, to which houses the body can be taken immediately after death and be properly cared for, instead of being left in the bedroom of the family.

None but those who have themselves seen what occurs when a death takes place in a family occupying two rooms in a tenement-house can appreciate the diminution of suffering and of danger to the public health which a few well-located and properly managed houses for the reception and care of the dead would cause in a crowded city.

We are not opposed to cremation. It does not seem to us to be a matter of much importance whether a man's dead body be burned or buried; but we do think that the first efforts of sanitary reformers should be directed toward securing more decency, less cost, and less danger of contagion in the way in which the majority of the dead in our great cities are now cared for before they are at last committed to the keeping of Mother Earth."

THE FAITHFUL FRIEND.

In a very humble cot,
In a rather quiet spot,
In the suds and in the soap,
Worked a woman full of hope,
Working, singing all alone,
In a sort of undertone:
"With a Saviour for a Friend,
He will keep me till the end."

Sometimes, happening along,
I had heard the semi-song,
And I often used to smile,
More in sympathy than grieve,
But I never said a word

In regard to what I heard,
As she sang about her Friend,
Who would keep her to the end.

Not in sorrow, nor in glee,
Working all day long was she,
As her children, three or four,
Played around her on the floor,
But, in monotone, the song,
She was humming all day long:
"With a Saviour for a Friend,
He will keep me to the end."

Just a trifle lonely she,
Just as poor as poor could be,
But her spirits always rose
Like the bubbles in her clothes;
And, though widowed and alone,
Cheered her with the monotone
Of a Saviour and a Friend,
Who would keep her to the end.

I have seen her rub and scrub
On the wash-board in the tub,
While the baby sopped in suds,
Rolled and tumbled in the duds,
Or was paddling in the pools
With old scissors stuck in spoons,
She still humming of her Friend,
Who would keep her to the end.

Human hopes and human needs
Have their root in human creeds,
And I would not wish to strip
From that washerwoman's lip
Any song that she can sing,
Any hope that song may bring,
For the woman has a Friend,
Who will keep her to the end.

A GRACIOUS WORD.

(John xv. 15. Revised Version.)

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

No longer I call you servants,
Yours is a dearer place,
Nearer and sweeter and higher,
In the light of my Father's face.
No longer I call you servants;
Henceforth, till the world shall end,
To every one who obeys me
Be the right to call me Friend,—

With a friend's dear right to follow
Wherever my footsteps lead,
And a friend's full right to counsel,
Whatever the care and need,
For oft in the summer twilight,
And oft in the early day,
My friend shall come to my presence,
And I will not answer Nay

To the prayer his lips shall offer,—
His least half-uttered sigh,
Shall wing, through the songs of heaven,
To the ear of the Lord most high.
And oh! my called, my chosen,
Be not afraid to claim.
Large gifts and gracious gerdons
When you plead your Saviour's name.

Selected.

For you never need fear to ask me
Aught that your heart may crave;
Think of me, dear disciple,
As the Friend who came to save.
From anxions thought of the morrow,
And strife with sorrow cease;
Remember the word I left you,
The gift of my perfect peace.

It is not an empty title
That I bid you freely claim,
Now that I write upon you
The pure and hidden name.
No longer I call you servants,
Henceforth, till time shall end,
To each who in love obeys me,
I have given the name of friend.

The Converted Afghan Brigand.

BY THOMAS PATRICK HUGHES, FORMERLY MISSIONARY AMONG THE AFGHANS.

Dilawar the "Brave," (for that is the meaning of the name) was born in a little village on the right bank of the Cabul River, and not far from its confluence with the Indus. He belonged to one of the most renowned Afghan tribes. When a youth he received the usual theological instruction of a village mosque, and in course of time became the favorite pupil of a celebrated teacher, the Gamaliel of his day. He attained great eminence as a student of religion; but as the sedentary life of the mosque did not suit the physical energies of Dilawar, he, in due time, exchanged the life of the sanctuary for that of the highway, and commenced to earn his living by plunder and robbery.

The occupation of a highway robber was amongst the Afghans of those days (as indeed it is in the present) esteemed an honorable profession, and the danger and risk attending it were great attractions to Dilawar. Moreover, the modus operandi of Dilawar's maraudings were both curious and novel. For example, hearing that a wealthy Hindu shopkeeper was about to be married, Dilawar, in company with others of his tribe, would lie in ambush on the east bank of the Indus and await the arrival of the expectant bridegroom, the Afghan brigands would attack the party and seize the bridegroom (bedizened with wristlets and chains of pure gold), and, dragging the unfortunate man to the river bank, put him inside an inflated cowhide, upon which Dilawar would mount himself and paddle across the river into Afghan territory. The operation seems incredible; but the writer has seen it done himself. The inflated hide is porous to air, but not to water as long as it remains in the river, and so life is sustained. Safely landed on the other side, and secure in an Afghan village, Dilawar would send his compliments to the sorrowing friends, and inform them that their missing relative could be restored to the disconsolate bride for the very moderate sum of a hundred dollars.

The successes of Dilawar's brigand life were soon curtailed by the British occupation of the Peshawar Valley, which is Afghan territory. Having heard of Dilawar's daring character, Major Lumsden, a brother of the Sir Peter Lumsden, of Herat, sent for the brigand and offered him a position in his newly formed corps of guides. Dilawar enlisted, and soon after his regiment was marched to Delhi to recapture the city from the Mutineers. At Delhi his bravery was conspicuous. He became a great favorite with the English officers of his regiment.

One day, when he was strolling along the streets of Peshawar, he saw an English officer seated on his horse and preaching to the people. Dilawar understood very little of the officer's sermon, but he was much impressed with the sincerity of the religion which would prompt an officer of the army to preach to a bigoted and fanatical crowd. He begged for instruction, Colonel Wheeler (for that was the officer's name) said: "I cannot discuss with you; for I am a poor, ignorant soldier, like yourself. If you want to discuss, you must go to the missionaries." Dilawar went to the missionaries in Peshawar, and was after some instruction baptized, at the close of the year 1858.

Upon my arrival at Peshawar, in the spring of 1865, I became acquainted with Dilawar. He was then a man about fifty-five years of age; a tall, spare man, with clear, sharp eyes and a thin, aquiline nose. He gave me a warm welcome to his native land, and I soon found that his love of argument and discussion was almost a mania. His brigand life of past years and his soldier life of the present had not, it appeared, made the impression on his mind which the early education of the mosque and the fanatical spirit of his former teachers had effected. I remember in one of our first interviews he raised the difficult question of the existence of evil, and maintained that the prevalence of evil proved that the Creator must be himself evil. I was shocked at such a suggestion, coming as it did from one of our native converts, and took considerable trouble to controvert his arguments, when he surprised me by saying:

"Ah! those are just my views."

"Then why did you trouble me with this discussion?" I inquired, somewhat irritated.

"Ah!" he replied, "it is important you should know how to meet an argument; for, sir, don't think, as so many of your countrymen do, that the conversion of the people of the East is an easy matter."

He was a perfect scourge to the Mohammedan priests. Well acquainted with their religion, and with their methods of argument, he knew exactly when to uncover and to assume the aggressive, and how to throw a bomb shell of discord into the enemies' camp. Sometimes he would go to a place where he knew there would be an assembly of learned priests, and present himself as an anxious inquirer. The learned men would stroke their beards complacently, and one of their number would proceed to solve his doubts and difficulties. Then Dilawar would raise some point of orthodoxy upon which he knew they were not agreed, and thus create a spirit of discord in the midst of his opponents. "How can you guide a poor soul to Heaven when you are not agreed among yourselves?" he would say with a smile, as he rose and left the company.

On one occasion, he obtained three days' leave from his regiment. The officer in command inquired why he wanted it. He replied:

"When we were at Delhi there was a very learned Moulvie there, who was said to be the most acute reasoner in all matters of religion. Those were days of fighting, and I had no time to see the learned man; but I now find he is in a mosque about twenty miles away, and I must go to see him."

Dilawar went, and returned in due time, much satisfied with the result. "The Moulvie had never even read our Christian Scriptures," he said, "and how could he meet my arguments?"

I once took him out with me on a preaching tour. We encamped close to a well-known shrine where there was a mosque and a school of divinity. We were soon visited by the Moslem priest and his students. Dilawar was quietly seated in the corner of my tent as I commenced an exposition of Christian truth. To my great annoyance, he interrupted my discourse and engaged me in a religious discussion. The people were intensely interested, while I was somewhat pained at the spirit of opposition which seemed to characterize his conversation. When the crowd became thoroughly interested he threw off the mask of an inquirer and vigorously attacked Mohammed and his religion, quoting passage after passage from the Koran and the traditions in the original Arabic, to the astonishment and the complete discomfiture of the moulvies of the place. "Who is he?" "Who is he?" said one after another in suppressed whispers, when an old man of the company exclaimed! "It must be Dilawar." I was often distressed at his polemical spirit. "Every man to his work," he would say. "It is mine to cast down, and it is yours to build up."

He had a great horror of anything like priestly assumption, having seen so much of it among the Mohammedans in his mosque life, and he would often attack the clerical element of his new faith.

"You are a set of tyrants," he would say. "You want to lead us by our noses like a row of camels through the desert."

The superstitions of the people always came in for his condemnation, especially their saint worship. He was crossing the River Indus when the overlaid boat showed symptoms of collapse. The boatmen and the other passengers appealed to their respective saints. Dilawar cried out: "O Colonel! O Colonel, help!" When they were safely landed on the other side, the people said: "Why did you call to the Colonel to help you?" "Why," he replied, "I prefer a live colonel to a dead saint. Your saints have been dead ages ago; but the Colonel is only twenty miles distant."

In 1869 Earl Mayo, the viceroy of India, wished to send a trustworthy native on a secret mission through Central Asia, to ascertain to what extent the people of those regions sympathized with the advance of Russia. Dilawar was selected. He was then getting an old man, and somewhat feeble; but he was flattered by the selection; and so well did he keep his state secret that he started on his perilous mission without saying a single word to any of his friends. In the city of Chitral it was discovered that he was a Christian, and the King of Chitral, who at first decided to heed him, upon the advice of his ministers, sent Dilawar and his little party on a road which was known to be impassable at that time of year. In the middle of the night the guides mounted their mules and returned to Chitral, leaving Dilawar and his four companions alone in the snow. While the little party struggled on their journey, they were overtaken by a heavy snow-storm. Four out of a party of five perished from the cold. Only one of the company knew the nature of Dilawar's mission, for the other three were travelers. Dilawar's companion was the first to succumb. Then two others died, and Dilawar and a solitary traveler were alone left. Two nights were spent under a barren rock, almost covered in a snow-drift, when poor old Dilawar died. Just before he died he told the stranger who he was. The stranger after an eventful journey returned to Peshawar, and related to me the sad story of my dear old Afghan friend's death.—The Independent.

Many are the vacant seats of those who have been eminently useful in their day; but with humble hopes and confidence in redeeming, sanctifying Power, we look towards a rising generation; many of whom appear to have given up their names, and to be advancing in dedication and usefulness.—Mary Copper.

The Covenanters and the Mist.—A party of Scottish Covenanters were once gathered together on the hill-side to worship God in their own way, which was not then permitted by the law of the land, when the alarm was given that the soldiers were approaching. They knew that they could expect no mercy from the troopers, but would probably be ridden over, or shot, or cut down in cold blood, just where they were. Some of them were stout and strong men, but they were unarmed, whilst the greater number consisted of weak and helpless women and children, besides an infirm and aged minister. Defence and flight were alike impossible. What should they do? They gave themselves unto prayer, and cried unto God, that He would save and deliver them, that He would hide them under the covering of His wings. And their cry was heard. Whilst the dragons were yet at a little distance, there came rolling over the hills, and along the hollows, a thick, white, blinding mist, which shrouded and concealed everything, and enfolded the little company in its embrace, and hid them. They themselves kept silent, and soon discovered from the noise and shouting, the oaths and curses of the troopers, that they had lost their way. The commander of the troopers now thought only of the safety of his men and horses; and when, after casting about for some time, they at length found the track, the word was given, and they rode off at a quick trot. No sooner were they all out of sight than the mist rolled off again, the sun shone forth, and those who had been kept by God, and hidden, as it were, under the shadow of His hand, sang praises unto Him for their great deliverance.

Old Roman Lead.—At the excavation of a gas-holder tank at Chester, Eng., a pig of Roman Lead was discovered 23 feet below the ground. It weighed 192 lbs., and bore an inscription importing that it was a tribute to Rome from a tribe in North Wales, known as the Ceanigi, and was cast during the reign of the Roman Emperor Vespasian—about A. D. 74.

The Salt Mines of Nevada.—In Lincoln County, on the Rio Virgin, there is a deposit of pure rock salt, which is exposed for a length of two miles, a width of half a mile, and is of unknown depth. In places cañons are cut through it to a depth of 60 feet. It is of ancient formation, being covered in some places by basaltic rock. The deposit has been traced on the surface for a distance of 9 miles. It is so solid that it must be blasted like rock, and so pure and transparent that print can be read through blocks a foot thick. At Sand Springs, Churchill County, there is a deposit of rock salt 14 feet in depth. The great Humboldt salt field is about 15 miles long by 6 wide.—San Francisco Bulletin.

Expansive Power of Heat.—In the Brooklyn Bridge there are overlapping slides at the middle of each span which allow the bridge to lengthen or shorten with the change of temperature. The marks thereon indicate a distance of several feet between the extremes. The bridge expands sideways also from the heat of the sun, but the amount is so small as to be scarcely noticeable. From the same cause, the Washington monument leans to the east in the morning, and to the west in the afternoon. A plummet line suspended in the interior of the dome of the Capitol at Washington, was found by actual measurement (says the Scientific American) to swing over a space of 44 inches, caused by the action of the sun's rays on the building.

Saccharine.—This new sugar made from coal-tar, was an accidental discovery of Dr. Constantine Fahlberg, a German-American, who had been working for a long time on the products of coal-tar. He said to a representative of the American Analyst: "One evening I was so interested in my laboratory that I forgot about supper until quite late, and then rushed off for a meal without stopping to wash my hands. I sat down, broke a piece of bread and put it to my lips. It tasted unspeakably sweet. I did not ask why it was so, probably because I thought it some cake or sweetmeat. I rinsed my mouth with water, and dried my moustache with my napkin, when, to my surprise, the napkin tasted sweeter than the bread. Then I was puzzled. I again raised my goblet, and, as fortune would have it, applied my mouth where my fingers had touched it before. The water seemed syrup. It flashed upon me that I was the cause of the singular universal sweetness, and I accordingly tasted the end of my thumb, and found that it surpassed any confectionary that I had ever eaten. I saw the whole thing at a glance, I had discovered or made some coal-tar substance which out-sugared sugar. I dropped my dinner and ran back to the laboratory. There, in my excitement I tasted the contents of every dish on the table. One of them contained an impure solution of saccharine. On this I worked there for weeks and months, until I had determined its chemical composition, its characteristics and reactions, and the best modes of making it scientifically and commercially."

Dr. Fahlberg further stated that a company, with a capital of 2,000,000 marks, had been formed in Germany, and was now manufacturing the article, which was sold at $10 to $12 per pound. The duty on the fine chemicals used in its manufacture, and the higher price of labor in America, had caused him to select Germany as the place for making it.

Habits of the Opossum.—C. C. Abbott, in his Rambles about Home, details some observations made on the habit attributed to the common opossum of feigning death when in danger. On one occasion a large opossum was captured in an ordinary box-trap, set for rabbits. "On lifting the lid of the trap, the animal was found curled up into a form as nearly globular as it was possible to assume. Being disturbed, it slowly raised its head, opened its mouth wide, but did not offer to bite, and in this position it quietly awaited coming events. After some five minutes of mutual staring, the opossum closed its mouth and slowly restored its head to a more easy position, and even closed one eye, as though the other was all that was necessary to note what might occur. On being roughly handled and given several pushes with a stick, it again opened wide its mouth and protested against disturbance by a low, hissing sound, but did not uncoil its body.

"After waiting an hour, and seeing no sign of feigning unconsciousness, but instead of it, a most provoking indifference, I walked off some distance to a point where I could see the trap, but was myself hidden from the opossum. Fully ten minutes elapsed before I saw any movement on the part of the opossum, and then it was a very gradual uncoiling of the body, a protracted yawn, a stretching of the limbs, and then standing up he looked about and very deliberately walked off. I ran toward him, when he quickened his pace, but was soon overtaken. On seizing him by the tail, he crouched down, partially coiled his body, and spread his jaws to the utmost. When I threatened violent blows about his head (although careful not to strike him), the animal's head slowly sank down, and the eyes closed, but this was not a feigned act. The breathing was affected but not suppressed, the surface temperature of the body was lowered; I judged, and it was, I believe, a faint, and not a faint; a temporary paralysis of the whole body through fear, and for the time being absolute unconsciousness. Furthermore, as in fainting, the application of cold water had the effect of restoring the animal to consciousness.

"I have made scores of experiments of this kind, and in no one have I seen anything to suggest intentional feigning of death. As this animal is superlatively lazy, and positively timid, and by no means intelligent, when compared with the mink or raccoon, I believe this supposed habit of feigning death is attributable to fear and not cunning; and certainly it is a merciful provision that thus destroys, without pain, all sensation in animals about to be torn to pieces."

—Restraining a Congregation in their Worship.—A colored congregation in Texas were in the habit of giving way to so much excitement when met for worship, and making so much noise, that the neighbors applied to the court for an injunction to restrain them. This was granted by the court, which laid down the law in the case as follows:

"The Constitution guarantees perfect freedom of conscience. No court of law can dictate how a man shall worship; but the exercise of that right must not interfere with the rights of another. Shouting in religious worship may be a matter of conscience; but it does not get beyond State regulations by reason of that. I do not think that noise is a part of religion; but I may not be a good judge of that. It seems to me to be only the result of emotional excitement, such as may be found at conventions or theaters. It may, or may not, be necessary in religion; but it can also be a nuisance. A man has a right to shout as long and as loudly as he pleases, provided he does it where he will not disturb others. Sleep is essential, and to rob a man of sleep is as much an infringement of his rights as if he were robbed of his chattels."

—Helping the Overworked.—A correspondent of the Ledger, who had often felt herself burdened with the necessary sewing for a family, makes the following suggestion to those who are taking their summer holidays: "Instead of taking from home such an amount of 'fancy work' to while away the time at summer resorts, why not borrow some of the necessary plain sewing of some overworked neighbor or dependent and return it finished? I once knew of two good elderly women who used to bring home and finish many pieces of plain sewing for the mother of a family whose means were as narrow as her hands were full, and who appreciated fully the lift given her by these good Samaritans. Much of the popular fancy work is such pure waste of time and money that one longs to see the energy and means expended upon it directed into channels of usefulness, since the world's need is great."

—New England Yearly Meeting (Larger Body).—From the printed Minutes of this meeting the following additional information has been gathered. The Statistical Table gives the number of members as 4412. The number of births during the year were 20, and of deaths 106.

The rates for admission to the Boarding School at Providence were fixed at $150 for members of their own Yearly Meeting; $250 for members of other Yearly Meetings, or for those not members, one or both of whose parents are members in New England; and $300 for others—with extra charges for languages, drawing, &c. We notice with regret, that the Report of the School Committee mentions the receipt, and placing in one of the halls of the school, of a bust of Elizabeth Fry, and the hanging on the walls of the same room of a portrait of the late Sybil Jones, in addition to previous ornaments of the same kind,—although at the expense of private individuals.

The report on the distribution of the income of the Mosher fund, which was left for the circulation of writings upholding the principles of early Friends, gives as one item of expenditure, the purchase of 60 copies of Barclay's "Inner Life of the Commonwealth," a work which contradicts the statements of George Fox and his co-laborers as to the ground of their religious convictions. The Committee had also used part of the funds in buying 250 copies of "Proceedings at the unveiling of the bust of Elizabeth Fry." We think that such applications of these trust funds can not receive the cool and deliberate approval of those members of the Yearly Meeting who fully retain their attachment to the principles held by Friends in the beginning, and to the spirit which actuated them.

The subject of Divorce having claimed the attention of the Representative Meeting, was referred to a joint committee of men and women Friends, to be reported upon next year.

A minute was adopted advising against the use of tobacco in every form.

It was concluded to hold the next Yearly Meeting at Portland, Maine, on the 2d Sixth-day in Sixth Month, of next year.

Ultra Radical.—The following paragraph indicates that in endeavoring to avoid the evils of a connection between the Church and State, some of the French legislators are in danger of opposing those fundamental principles which lie at the root of stability in government, and of happiness in the community.

"The municipal council of Paris has recently prescribed the use of a child's book of instruction because of its references to the existence of a God. Opposition has been developed to the most elementary instruction in morals as well as in religion; and one member of the municipal council, its chairman at the time, is reported to have said: 'Since immorality varies according to the age, place, and degree of civilization, it is not possible to conceive of one universal and eternal system of morals. The teaching of morals, therefore, as a positive science, must be banished from the school curriculum.'

—Tolerance of Jews.—It is about 100 years since the Hebrews began to be relieved from the oppression of centuries. In 1783, Joseph II., of Austria, in an edict of toleration, freed them from many vexatious restrictions. In 1784, Louis XVI., of France, abolished the tax on the Jew, which was specially designed to degrade him. In 1787, Emperor Frederick William, of Prussia, repealed many oppressive laws. In 1805, Alexander I., of Russia, revoked the edict by which the Jews had been excluded from the empire. In 1806, the Jews were made citizens in Italy; in 1813 they were granted civil liberty in Prussia and Denmark, and it was not until 1853, that in England they were made eligible to election to Parliament. At the present time in Russia and Rumania there is persecution, but in most countries there is complete toleration.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 14, 1886.

Of latter times there has developed in many places in the Society of Friends a feeling, that, while systematic Biblical instruction, and a course of training similar to that which students for the ministry receive in the theological schools of other denominations, are not essential to the exercise of the ministry; yet that they are so important as adjuncts, that the Society of Friends is suffering loss from not furnishing its ministers with the same helps to their preaching.

Series of articles advocating this opinion have appeared in Journals, professedly published in the interests of our Society. One of these (in The Christian Worker of First Mo. 7th, 1886) takes the ground, that "the minister of God is ordained of God not only to preach the simpler truths of the Gospel, but also to expound other, deeper, divine things in the mystery of godliness;" and that to do this he must so understand God's dealings with men of other days as to be able to interpret his "revelation of himself in history, i. e., in life, Christian life in Church history, life in general in universal history." As the natural conclusion from these views, the same article speaks of the desire felt by many "to have a chair of Biblical literature and exegesis founded at Earlham College, in order that Biblical instruction may be put upon a substantial basis. On this foundation the original languages of Scripture should be taught, together with methods of interpretation and the history of the Canon of Scripture," &c. We believe a provision of this kind has since been made at that school.

The continuation of the same article in the next issue of the paper, while freely admitting that one may preach the Gospel without a knowledge of Greek or Hebrew, says that this knowledge is indispensable to every one that "will expound the Scriptures with authority."

Another number of The Christian Worker contains a course of study for Ministers, published by authority of the Executive Committee of Western Yearly Meeting (the Larger Body). An editorial article of more recent date in the same paper, declares it to be the duty of ministers "to study with reference to preaching, and then to wait upon God to know what portion of truth to deliver on each special occasion."

The views and feelings, which are expressed in the preceding extracts, seem to us to show a dangerous departure from the spiritual ground of all true religion, and especially of those vital points of worship and ministry, which Friends in the beginning were concerned to testify of to the world. Are they not the natural outgrowth of an undue dependence on man's own abilities and efforts in the work of salvation, and an undervaluing of the work of that Divine Power through whose visitations and help all spiritual good is effected?

The Gospel is the power of God, as the Scriptures assert, "and he that ministers of the Gospel must do it under the influence of that Power; he must (through Divine help) baptize his hearers with a measure of that heavenly influence which has been poured out upon him. This influence will be to the living minister, mouth and wisdom, tongue and utterance; and his attention will be turned to the revelations and help of this Divine Light and Spirit in his own heart, as the source of all ability to preach the word. Like the Apostle Paul, they will be concerned that their speech and their preaching should not be 'with cutting words of man's wisdom, but in the demonstration of the Spirit and of power.'"

We do not undervalue the intellectual culture to be derived from such courses of study as are advocated by those who favor the radical changes in the doctrines and practices of Friends that are now attempted to be introduced among us; but to regard them as a part of the preparation for the work of the ministry, we believe will inevitably tend to lower the standard of the ministry among those who adopt such a view, to prepare the way for the full adoption of such a system as prevails among other professors, and to lead its advocates so entirely away from the fundamental principles of our Society, that they will no longer have a right to be considered as belonging to the same body. The ministry that flows from such a root will be liable to the same criticism that William Penn made upon it in his day,—that it exercised the minds of the hearers "with a sort of unexperienced, unauthorized preachings, leading from the secret strivings, discoveries and conduct of that Spiritual Minister of the everlasting covenant, which is able to bring man into that way of holiness, without which no soul shall ever see the Lord."

We believe its testimony on this subject is essential to the preservation of our Society as a Church of Christ, built upon Him a spiritual house unto God; and that any falling short in this matter is an evidence of apostasy from our most holy faith. The doctrine is as true to-day, and the experience of it as needful as in any former age of the world—"If any man speak let him speak as the oracle of God; if any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth; that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ, to whom be praise and dominion for ever and ever." Under the Old Dispensation, those who spoke in the name of the Lord, whom He had not commissioned or sent, were accounted as false prophets that spoke a divination of their own brain; and such a ministry under the Gospel, however learned and eloquent, yet not coming with divine authority, and from the freshly extended command of Christ, is a mark of declension in the Church.

A tract has been sent to us, entitled "Christianity and War," written by a Friend, Thomas C. Battey, of Iowa. We are informed that some friends in Iowa have procured the printing of an edition of 2000 copies, and that the pamphlets are ready for distribution.

The object of the author has been to show that the kingdom of the Messiah is one of peace on earth and good will to men; that His teachings are opposed to all war; that those who embrace as their rule of life His commands to love their enemies and to do good to them that hate them, must necessarily cease from outward warfare; and that such was the belief of the early Christians.

For the settlement of disputes among nations, he advocates the establishment of a form of International Congress, to whose decision such cases could be referred.

The pamphlet seems to us to present correct views on the important subject of which it treats, and we hope its circulation will do good.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The session of Congress was adjourned on the 5th inst., at four o'clock P. M., both Houses having adopted a concurrent resolution to that effect, and all the important measures which were sent to the President during the last two days having been signed by him.

Bills to the number of 13,202 were introduced in the Senate and House at the recent session of Congress; 1101 passed both houses (241 Senate and 860 House bills); 814 were approved and 115 vetoed by the President, and 157 became laws without his signature. These are the New York Herold's figures. The World correspondent figures up 1087 bills passed and 110 vetoed.

It is stated that "the record of the present Congress fills eight thousand six hundred and thirty printed pages, not including the indexes and the appendix. This exceeds by about five hundred pages the record of any preceding session of Congress."

There is great dissatisfaction at Panama, according to a telegram from that place, on account of the defective mail service with New York. "The mails are from fourteen to twenty days going from New York to Panama, and merchants on the coast complain of shipments arriving before the custom house papers, causing heavy expenses. Merchants, to avoid these losses, prefer buying in the European markets until a satisfactory mail service with the United States can be secured."

The Acting Secretary of the Treasury has amended instructions, heretofore issued, in regard to minor coins, so as to provide that one cent bronze pieces and five cent nickels will be forwarded from the Mint of the United States at Philadelphia, in sums of $20 or multiples thereof free of transportation charge, on the receipt and collection by the Superintendent of the Mint of a draft on New York or Philadelphia, payable to his order.

Dr. Kimball, Director of the Mint, has completed his report on the production of gold and silver in the United States during 1885. The production of gold is estimated at $31,800,000, an increase of $1,000,000 on the estimate for the calendar year 1884. The production of silver for the calendar year 1885, calculated at the coinage rate in silver dollars, is estimated at $51,600,000 against $48,800,000 in 1884. The coinage executed during the calendar year at the coinage mints consisted of 47,544,521 pieces, of the face value of $56,926,810. Of this amount, 3,002,313 pieces, valued at $27,773,012, consisted of gold coin, and 31,925,544 pieces, valued at $28,962,176, of silver coin, the remainder minor coin. The number of silver dollars coined during the calendar year 1885 was 28,697,767. The Director estimates the amount of gold coin in the United States on First Month 1st, 1886, to have been $323,485,453; of silver dollars, $218,259,761; subsidiary silver, $75,034,111; or a total stock of coin of $826,779,325.

Samuel J. Tilden died on the 4th instant at his residence, Greystone, near Yonkers, New York, in the seventy-third year of his age. The news of his death created a profound feeling throughout the country, and especially in New York and Washington. His will is said to be very lengthy. The actual value of the estate is about $5,000,000, and of this an amount not exceeding one-third is consumed in legacies and incomes to the relatives of deceased. Provision is made for the establishing of free libraries in New Lebanon and Yonkers, "and if in the discretion of the trustees they choose to establish a free library in New York City, they may do so, and if not, they are at liberty to use the funds that a free library would cost, in the promotion of any charitable or educational cause."

On the 8th instant, William Potts and George Hazlitt, coopers, passed through the whirlpool rapids of Niagara, in emulation of Graham's feat about three weeks previously. Both men occupied the same cask, and they landed at Queenstown, on the Canadian side of the river, five miles below the whirlpool. The time occupied by the passage from Maid of the Mist landing to Queenstown was fifty-five minutes.

The State Board of Equalization of Kansas has completed its labors. The total amount of taxable property in the State is $272,110,683, an increase of $28,265,406 since last year.

Forest fires are raging in Marathon and Clark counties, Wisconsin, doing great damage. The greater portion of the village of Spencer was destroyed on the 8th, and the loss is estimated at nearly $400,000, leaving several hundred families homeless. It is estimated that in the entire district covered by the fires nearly 100,000,000 feet of pine timber has been destroyed.

Another ostrich farm—making the fourth—has been opened at Los Angeles, Cal.

The great glacier of Alaska is said to be moving at the rate of a quarter of a mile per annum toward the sea. The front presents a wall of ice some five hundred feet in thickness, its breadth varies from three to ten miles, and it is about one hundred and fifty miles long. Almost every quarter of an hour hundreds of tons of ice, in large blocks, fall into the sea, which they agitate in the most violent manner, the waves being such as to toss about the largest vessels that approach the glacier as if they were small boats. The ice is extremely pure and dazzling to the eye, and has tints of the lightest blue as well as of the deepest indigo. The top is very rough and broken, forming small hills, and even chains of mountains in miniature.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 409, which was 20 more than during the previous week and 5 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing 220 were males and 189 females; 151 were under one year of age; 48 died of consumption; 46 of cholera infantum; 33 of marasmus; 24 of diseases of the heart; 21 of convulsions; 19 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 16 of inflammation, and 14 of congestion of the brain.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s reg. 110½; coupons, 112; 4's, 127; 3's, 102; currency 6's, 126 a 136.

Cotton moved slowly at 9½ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum was quiet at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Feed was dull and favored buyers. Sales of one car fair western winter bran, at $14; two cars good do. do. at $14.25; and two cars fancy southern bran, at $14.75 per ton.

Flour and Meal.—The general situation of the flour market presented nothing new of importance. Trade was quiet, but prices ruled steady. Sales of 125 barrels Penna. Family at $3.90; 125 Ohio, clear, at $4.25; 375 barrels Winter straight, at $4.50; 375 barrels do. Patent, at $4.75 a $4.90; 250 barrels Minnesota clear, at $4, and 500 barrels do. Patent, at $4.85 a $5. Rye Flour moved slowly at $3.50 a $3.50 per barrel.

Gain.—Wheat closed steady at 83¢ cts. bid, and 84¢ cts. asked for No. 2. Corn was dull and nominally unchanged, closing at 48½¢ cts. bid, and 49¼¢ cts. asked. Oats were quiet but firm, with 36¼¢ cts. bid, and 36¾¢ cts. asked for No. 2 white.

Beef Cattle were 3 cts. higher, at 3¾¢ cts. a 6 cts. Sheep were unchanged, at 4 cts. a 5 cts. Lambs were fair, at 3¼¢ cts. a 7 cts. Hogs were unchanged, at 7 cts. a 7¼¢ cts.

The receipts were: Beeves, 2000; sheep, 12,000; hogs, 4500.

FOREIGN.—Parliament reassembled in London on the afternoon of the 8th inst. Gladstone, when he went into the House of Commons, took a seat on the front Opposition bench. His advent was unnoticed, Chamberlain soon afterwards walked by Lord Hartington and John Morley, Gladstone's Chief Secretary for Ireland, Lord Hartington sitting between Morley and Chamberlain. When Gladstone saw Chamberlain the ex-Primer arose and went over to the Radical dissentient leader, shook hands with him cordially and held a conversation with him and with Lord Hartington.

Terrible rioting has been going on in Belfast for several days, which the police not being able to suppress, the military of Dublin have been called on to take in hand. A considerable number have been killed. The city, owing to the wreck and ruin of houses, presents a deplorable aspect. Its appearance is similar to that of Paris after the Commune. It is feared that numerous deaths resulting from the riots have taken place which will never be heard of. The hospitals are taxed to the utmost to accommodate the great number of wounded persons in need of attendance. A painful feature of the riots is the number of children wounded.

The Paris announces that a meeting of all the Bonaparte family, except Prince Victor, will be held on the 15th inst. at Frangings. The object of the meeting is to unite the Royalist party. Prince Victor declines to attend, on the ground that he alone represents the Empire.

Pasteur says that men who habitually use intoxicating spirits are more difficult to cure if bitten by a mad dog than temperate men.

The cholera still continues to ravage various parts of Italy. The returns are irregular, but on the 7th inst. showed a total of 257 new cases and 83 deaths.

Advices from Yokohama to Seventh Month 22d, received in San Francisco, report the cholera raging in that place and Tokio. In Yokohama the type of the disease was the worst ever known there. Between the 15th and 20th inst. the cases averaged over 100 daily, the deaths 50. The better classes, native as well as foreign, were comparatively exempted from the disease.

The Commercio del Valle, published in St. Louis, prints a letter from its correspondent in the City of Mexico, saying that the Presidents and ex-Presidents of the Central American republics of Salvador, Nicaragua, Honduras, Costa Rica and Guatemala are now in that city arranging a plan for the union of those States in one confederation, with the ultimate view to annexation to the Mexican republic.

The trial of Editor Cutting at El Paso, Mexico, took place on 5th inst., and resulted in his conviction, sentence to one year's imprisonment at hard labor, and payment of a fine of $600. Should he be unable to pay the fine, he must serve one hundred days longer. Medina, whom Cutting libelled, has leave to bring a civil suit for damages, on the ground that the offence of Cutting was committed in Texas, and therefore not within the jurisdiction of Mexico. The U. S. Government has demanded his unconditional release.

CORRECTION.—We have been requested to state that a poetical piece published in "The Friend" of First Mo. 23d, entitled "Little Foxes"; and also one under date of First Mo. 2nd; and both attributed to Mary Crane, were written by Mary Cram, wife of General Cram. The last name in both cases having been misspelled.

During the summer the stage will connect on week days with the 7.7, 9.3, 2.47 and 4.55 trains from Broad St. Station to convey passengers to the school. Telegrams should be sent to West Chester via Western Union Telegraph Company, whence they will be sent to the school by telephone.

DIED, the 6th of Fifth Mo., 1886, at his residence in Crosswicks, N. J., WILSON PARRY, in the 72d year of his age, an esteemed member of Chesterfield Monthly and Preparative Meetings, of which he was a diligent attendant. He was firmly attached to the doctrines and principles of Friends in their original purity. With a heart overflowing with the milk of human kindness, his hand was ever open to relieve the needs and alleviate the sufferings of others; and his kindly influence was felt and appreciated by the community at large. Although the call was sudden and unlooked for, his friends have the consoling belief, that it found him with his lamp trimmed and burning, and that he has entered into that rest prepared for the righteous of all generations.

—, in West Marlborough, Chester Co., Pa., at the residence of her brother-in-law, Richard Darlington, Sr., on Seventh Month 27th, 1886, ELIZABETH GRAY, in the 94th year of her age. She was the daughter of Thomas and Abigail Smedley, of Willistown, Pa. Born a member of the religious Society of Friends, her long life was an example of consistent conformity to its principles and testimonies. Bearing the crosses that came into her life, (and they were many) in a spirit that purified and ennobled her character, she taught many a quiet lesson of simplicity and contentment. Hers was the happiness that comes from a tranquil trust in the Lord. She was blessed with remarkable freedom from physical suffering, great clearness of mind, and resignation of spirit; and the end was sweet peace, and hopeful assurance of happiness hereafter.

Sixth Mo. 19th, 1836. Another precious season. Almost immediately on taking my seat in meeting, I was made to feel that the dear Master was very near, and would be found of those who sought Him aright. A renewed visitation was extended to us young people through our friend E. C. "Obedience" seemed to be the burden of the word given. "Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man." He believed there were those present, who did indeed love their dear Lord, and at times were almost ready to enter into covenant with Him; but when shown what He requires, they have let in the reasoner, and reasoned away that which at the time appeared so plain. A spirit of unbelief has followed, and they stumbled at the cross; thus casting away their shield as though it had not been anointed. How did he plead with this class! representing that nothing would be required of any but what there would be strength given to perform. He dwelt much upon the "little sacrifices called for." May the word not return void.

23rd. A silent good meeting. Was afresh given to feel what precious meetings we should have, did we dwell deep enough in them! Am alive to my own shortcomings; so that my knees are often ready to smite together.

30th. Our Monthly Meeting. I could not come at that stillness I should have liked, though was sensible our meeting was a good one. E. C. had a word of encouragement for tried ones present. He spoke of the necessary purification which the followers of the Lamb had to go through, ere the inscription of "Holiness unto the Lord" could be borne. To some on whom the hand of the Lord was heavily laid, and who had many fears lest they should not meet with acceptance, his language was very encouraging. "Trust in the Lord; O, it is a good thing to trust in the Lord."

Seventh Mo. 14th. A day of sorrow; having been afresh made to feel that sacrifices that have long been required must be made, ere I can advance in my good journey heavenward. Strengthen me, O Heavenly Father, to make a full surrender, that the peace thou hast promised may be mine; and O increase the little grain of faith, that Thy grace may be found sufficient.

17th. First-day. At our meeting we had the company and labors of our friend E. Pitfield, it was unexpected to be thus remembered; and a fresh cause for thankfulness. She seemed led to visit each class amongst us; setting forth the many ways in which we are proved. Sometimes in the school of affliction; sometimes the little grain of faith is assailed in order to prove our love and allegiance to the dear Master; and the plaintive language would arise, "Will the Lord cast off forever. Will He be favorable no more?" She had remembered the situation of the poor mariners, when tossed with a tempest: it was not till they were sufficiently humbled to apply unto their dear Master, that He arose for their help and rebuked the winds and the waves. He still remains to be the same helper He ever was, and as able to arise and set bounds to the waves; and she believed He was waiting to do it for some present—some tried ones, to whom the language was addressed, "I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not." In addressing the children she said the Lord often visits them in very young years, and believed there were those present who, if they were careful, would be made as way-marks. E. C. had a word for the careless and indifferent; some who could not see why the way to the kingdom should be such a tribulated one. Elizabeth followed in solemn supplication, interceding that we might receive each day granted us, as a new blessing given us to prepare for a never-ending eternity; and that we might all feel and know that we have precious immortal souls to be saved or lost.

22nd. Attended the funeral of our young friend, Anna Kinsey. Do not know when a death has taken such hold of my feelings! It seems such a little while since she was in the enjoyment of health, but now numbered with the silent dead. Time was allowed her to prepare to meet the solemn messenger; while many are called hence as in a moment's warning. Often have I to admire the goodness of a kind Providence in allowing opportunity sometimes, even at the eleventh hour, to prepare to meet Him, when perhaps days without number have been spent in forgetfulness of Him, and regardless of our soul's peace and salvation. Since the death of dear Anna, and very often before, has a communication of our friend E. C., at a Quarterly Meeting in Germantown, been brought to remembrance. Just at the close of the first meeting, he arose with saying, that soon after taking his seat this language had impressed his mind very forcibly, and it had dwelt with him, and from the feeling attendant he believed it extended to some then present in the younger walks of life. "Prepare to meet thy God." He was short, but very earnest that all might be ready. I have remarked that two young persons then in attendance, have since been called hence; how awakening!

24th. Think I hardly ever assembled with my friends under feelings of more poverty than I did this day. But what cause for thankfulness! on sitting down and gathering into silence, the dear Master was found to be very near. What is there more precious than a good meeting? wherein communion is permitted with Him, who allows us at times to sup with Him. There is nothing here below that I enjoy more. E. C. had considerable to say. His concern was,— "watchfulness unto prayer." If ever we were followers of the dear Master this must be our condition. He seemed deeply exercised for a state present, which, for want of this watchfulness, the enemy had led far away, even into a disbelieving state as regards future rewards and punishments. He warned in a most solemn manner against such a state.

Eighth Mo. 7th. Our little meeting, held in silence. To me a precious silence. May I learn more and more what true silent worship is; believe it hath been given me in measure so to see into the beauty of it, as to cause a secret rejoicing when meeting day comes; but believe I would feel the preciousness of it in a greater degree if I were more obedient. But the fear of running before my Guide, and of making a profession and not living up to it, hath prevented making sacrifices which in moments of favor have been shown were required. O, the seasons of sorrow passed through on this account!

Tenth Mo. 1st. O for more willingness to walk in the straight and narrow way! denying self, and not my Lord and Master; which I fear is too much the case.

A Visit to Chester County.

An approaching thunder-storm is a grand and impressive sight. The rapid rolling of the dense masses of cloud, the lighter line of which often precedes the darker portions; the fringed edges of the cloud where the rain appears to be already falling; the distant lightning's flash, and the mutterings of the thunder, all add to the sublimity; and this is increased by the feeling of awe which naturally accompanies such an exhibition. I enjoyed such an experience on the afternoon of the 25th of Sixth Month, as I rode in the cars from Philadelphia to West Chester. The rain-fall was but light where we were travelling; but, as we proceeded, the deep muddiness which Chester creek and its branches had suddenly gained, showed that a heavy outpour of water had fallen on the earth, and that it had washed into the streams a large amount of the soil and clay of the country along their banks.

This denuding process is ever going on, and is gradually changing the form of the country. The lands are being worn down, the material is being carried by the rivers and deposited in the ocean, whose shore-line is thus being pushed out; and as the pressure on some parts of the earth's crust is lessened and on others increased, by this removal of solid matter, the time comes when the difference is so great that a balance must be restored by depressions, and upheavals, such as have greatly modified the earth's surface in former ages, and which are not unfrequently experienced in our own time.

Much of Chester County is underlaid with gneiss and hornblende rock, which, as it is decomposed by the weather, furnishes chemical materials favorable to the growth of vegetable life; and thus forms the basis for a very fertile soil. Seasonable rains had aided the efforts of the farmers, so that not only were the trees beautiful in the freshness and luxuriance of their foliage, but the grass and grain showed promise of an abundant yield. Perhaps no class of people have more cause than those who till the ground, to acknowledge their dependence on the Divine blessing for the success of their efforts. Unless their own part of the work is faithfully performed; unless the ground is prepared, the seed sown, and the needful cultivation given, they cannot hope to succeed; but after all these things have been done, unless the rains of heaven water their crops, and the sun in its turn smile on their land, there will be but little to reward their toil.

During the few days we were in Chester county, I saw enough to remind me afresh of how helpless man is when the elements contend against him. The wheat was still green, but commencing to show the change of color which betokens the ripening of the grain. On some of the wheat fields a decided brown hue was rather suddenly developed, which was caused, I believe, by a slight growth of rust affecting the plant, favored by the damp weather which had preceded. This often greatly injures the crop, but in the present instance it did not appear to be sufficient to affect it very seriously. Yet it was enough to remind a thoughtful observer of the consequences which might have resulted from a few days longer continuance of the damp and foggy weather, which favors the growth of this form of fungus: a source of danger against which human effort is helpless. Do not such warnings remind one of the need of constant reference, in the affairs of life, to both the human and the Divine elements of success? and also call up the exhortation of the apostle, "not slothful in business, fervent in spirit?"

This visit took me back to the vicinity of my first botanical studies, and gave me an opportunity of revisiting some floral friends, with whom I had become acquainted many years before. Among these were the Pyrola elliptica, or Shin-leaf, a member of the Heath family; two species of Loose-strife, Lysimachia quadrifolia, and L. ciliata; the Enchanter's Night-Shadow, Circaea Lutetiana, a common and widely diffused plant; a large-leaved species of Galium, G. circearans, called Wild Liquorice, from the taste of the leaves; the Rich Weed, Collinsonia Canadensis, a smooth, strong-growing woodland herb, whose yellow flowers have the fragrance of the lemon; the Alum Root, Heuchera Americana, with large, round, heart-shaped leaves at the root, from which springs up a slender stem, two or three feet high, bearing a long spike of whitish flowers tinged with purple; and many others.

It was interesting to notice, as I had often done before, when travelling in Chester county, the abundance and beauty of the ferns which clothed some of the roadside banks. One spot, near the foot of a hill, where the bank was probably supplied with moisture which drained from the strata above, was almost covered with them. In the space of a few yards in diameter, I observed at least five species, and of several of these there were many specimens. Among them were the large Osmunda interrupta, which has a few of the leaflets in the middle of the frond converted into fruit capsules; the Ebony fern (Asplenium ebeneum), a little species, with a smooth, shining, dark-purple, slender stem, of from six to twelve inches in height, along which the short leaflets are closely arranged; and the Aspidium acrostichoides, whose general appearance is quite unlike the most of our ferns. The other species I could not distinguish without the aid of a "Botany," which I had not with me.

On one of the days of our pleasant sojourn in that favored section of country, we visited the Serpentine ridge which lies a short distance north of West Chester, at the very spot which I had rambled over when a school-boy at Westtown. Serpentine is a rock that is very interesting to the geologist and mineralogist. Detached ridges of it appear in several parts of Chester county. It is composed mainly of silica and magnesia. and it furnishes a number of interesting minerals, and several kinds of plants which are seldom seen in other localities. On this occasion, I found growing in the crevices and among the crumbled debris of the exposed rock, the same species which I had gathered in the days of my childhood. Among these was a Chick-weed (Cerastium oblongifolium), with white, star-like flowers, larger and more conspicuous than on most kinds of these humble plants, and with oblong leaves thickly clustered on the stems. Still more graceful and beautiful was a species of Sandwort (Arenaria stricta), growing in dense masses. Each slender stem has its lower part well covered with narrow leaves, in whose axils many others are clustered, so as to give it much the appearance of a moss. Above this the naked stem projects, and is crowned with a lovely white star. Another still more curious plant, which grows on the bare serpentine rock, and like those just described, is seldom or never found elsewhere in this section of country, was the Talinum teretifolium, for which I know no common name. It belongs to the same natural family as the Purslane and Spring-Beauty (Claytonia), all of which have fleshy leaves. In the Talinum these are cylindrical. The plant sends up long and naked flower-stems, which bear clusters of beautiful pink flowers, that open in succession. Gathering a few of the plants, which bear transplanting very well, I brought them home in a small flower-pot, and they are now (17 days later) blooming freely, and will probably continue to do so for some time to come.

For "The Friend."

A Singular Dream.

Thomas Taber, of whom a brief account was given in "The Friend," if questioned and answered, would occasionally converse with propriety when he was sleeping.

One night his daughter-in-law heard his voice much louder than usual. She went to his bedroom door to learn the cause. He appeared to be engaged in supplication, with as much fervency and as appropriately as in his public appearances in that manner. The following morning she inquired of him how he rested the night previously. He said about as usual; but he had a very singular dream.

He dreamed he was attending a religious meeting, where there was a large gathering. He was clothed with the spirit of supplication; but for some cause he was lying on the floor and could not rise to his knees. As the audience rose to their feet around him, he had to raise his voice as loud as he well could, in order that he might be heard.

Instructive counsel was given, relative to the care which should be exercised over servants of every denomination! that nothing may exist in our families that can in any way harm them, and that as much as in us lies, we may encourage them in that which is good.—Mary Copper.

Grace for Grace.

The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ. And in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. And of his fulness we have all received by measure, and grace for grace. For unto every one of us is given a manifestation of his Spirit for us to profit by, if we will receive it and use it. And whatsoever doth make manifest, is the light from the grace of God, which hath appeared to all. And as the light is believed in and followed, it will shine more and more unto the perfect day. So grace, as it is received and used, will advance us on from grace to grace, as we need it, and from glory to glory, until we are changed into the likeness of our Saviour; into the same divine image that was lost in the fall. For "of the increase of His government and peace, there shall be no end," until we come, in the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto perfect men; unto "the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

But this great change must be wrought by the Spirit of the Lord, and not by the spirit or power of man. For no man can redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him.

Christ came into the world outwardly, but is now in our hearts by his light and grace, that He might redeem us from all iniquity. But are we redeemed? If not, whose fault is it? He came outwardly to his own, but they as a nation received Him not. He now comes to his own spiritually; that is, to us all; for we are all his own by purchase; we have all been bought with a price, even the price of his death and sufferings. But do we receive Him? It was said, "as many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God." But of what benefit is the power, unless we use it so as to experience the new birth? For we are not truly and fully his sons, unless we are begotten of Him, by the overshadowing of his grace, and born again: not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible; "not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man," like the first birth; but of Him who was made flesh and dwelt amongst us, full of grace and truth. An earthly birth fits us for earth; but we must have a heavenly birth to fit and qualify us for heaven and heavenly things.

Christ's dwelling amongst us outwardly was of short duration, and his bodily appearance was limited to comparatively but a few. So it was expedient that He should go away; but He went with a promise, that He would come again in Spirit, as a comforter to his disciples, and abide with such as received Him, forever, even unto the end of the world. He also told them before He left, that He had many things to say to them, "but ye cannot bear them now." They had first to receive a greater growth in grace. But He says, "when He, the Spirit of Truth, is come, He will guide you into all truth, and show you things to come." And of the increase of His government and peace there is to be no end. But the Stone that was cut out of the mountain without hands will fill the whole earth, and will bring into subjection the earthly part within us.

While Christ's bodily presence here on earth was limited, his Spirit, or the light and grace of God that brings salvation, is unbounded. For it extends as far as the effects of sin have ever reached. And we are told, that all have sinned and come short of the glory of God. Upon whom hath not his light shined, in order to show them their sinfulness? and also to show them that the kingdom of God does "not stand in outward meats and drinks, but in righteousness and in peace and joy in the Holy Ghost?"

The life and immortality that are hid from the wise and prudent of this world, are revealed unto the babes in Christ, as they grow in grace, and through obedience increase in capacity to receive the knowledge of God, till they attain to their measure of the fulness and stature of Christ. It is as we advance from grace to grace that we grow strong in the Lord and in the power of His might, and become enabled, through the abounding of his grace, to pull down the strongholds of sin and Satan in our own hearts.

Then, and only then, we shall be successful in carrying on the warfare against the sensual of the world; and in casting down imaginations, and every high thing that is so remarkably inclined to exalt itself above the true knowledge of God.

It is from the fulness of God that we receive grace as we need it. And his grace is sufficient for us, if we will use it. For it is grace that saves us by enabling us to overcome the enemy, and to destroy his works in our hearts. But if it is by grace that we are saved, it is through faith in Him that saves us, and that gives us of his grace: for without a living faith it is impossible to please God. And if our faith is more in the wisdom and eloquence and the cultivated intellect of man than it is in the power of God, how can we expect it to please Him "who sees not as man sees?" If we abuse or neglect the grace we have received, how can we expect to receive more? If we have not a living faith, how can we worship or serve the living God? For the living God dwells in living temples only. And if our faith, when we assemble to worship Him, is more in the creature than in the Creator, more in the poor minister than in the great Minister of ministers, more in the gift than in the Giver, more in the letter of the Scriptures than in the Spirit that gave them, more in the musical sounds which only please the outward ear than in the silent melody of the heart: what is our worship better than idolatry?

Is it strange that in such a meeting an outward life and activity should be substituted and encouraged, in order to keep up the appearance of religion, after the divine life has departed? Then, a head religion takes the place of the heart-felt grace of God. Is it strange that the life and light and power of God does not arise in our meetings, nor in our ministry, when it is not waited for, or hardly believed in? If we forsake the Spirit, and turn our expectations and our faith outward, the Spirit will forsake us; our houses will be left desolate, and the things which belong to our peace will be hid from our eyes. But if we walk in the light, and in the living faith of our Redeemer, it will be as the path of the just, which will lead us from grace to grace, from glory to glory, even to the perfect day. Then we shall have "boldness, or confidence to enter into the holiest (even this side the grave), by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way, which He hath consecrated for us." For we shall then be no longer under the law of Moses, but under the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, which has set us free from the law of sin and death.

As the outward Jews had their outward light, or pillar of fire, to guide them in their outward journey from Egyptian bondage, so the inward and spiritual Israel in his journey towards his spiritual inheritance, has an inward light to guide him outward from the bondage of sin and death, to a spiritual inheritance, which is far beyond the boundary line of sin and sorrow. But we have to be led, like Israel of old, through much tribulation and many conflicts with the enemy, until we reach Jordan, and witness the final overthrow of our enemies. And this advance, although it may be through many meanderings and trials, has to be made step by step, from grace to grace, from faith to faith, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord, before we are permitted to enter the Holy land.

Let us remember that this great deliverance, granted to Israel of old, was wrought by the miraculous power of God, through Moses. And if we are saved from the bondage of sin, it must be by the power of the mighty God of Israel, through Christ, who is like unto Moses. "For Moses truly said unto the fathers, a prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you, like unto me; Him shall ye hear in all things, whatsoever He shall say unto you." So it is by grace that we are saved from the bondage of sin, through faith in the same Almighty power that saved Israel from bondage under Pharaoh. It is not of ourselves, or our own works, lest we should boast of the strength or ability of man. For the whole plan and work of salvation is the gift of God. Yet we must "work out our own salvation with fear and trembling; for it is God which worketh in us both to will and to do of his own good pleasure." And we must, by his assisting grace, carry out the work which he wills us to do, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God; and trust that He will do for us that which we cannot do for ourselves; but nothing more. For man went into sin and transgression of his own free will; and the will is still left free for us to receive or reject the terms of salvation from sin. But there is no salvation in sin. While "sin lieth at the door," it will forever bar our entrance into the heavenly kingdom, either here or hereafter; for I believe the Lord's kingdom may come, and His will may be done, here on earth as it is in heaven.

The Koh-I-Noor Lost.

At one of the early meetings of the board the jewel was formally made over to the Punjab Government, and by it committed to the care of John Lawrence. Perhaps the other members of the board thought him the most practical and business-like—as no doubt in most matters he was—of the three; or they deemed that his splendid physique and the gnarled and knotted stick which (fit emblem of himself) he always carried with him would be the best practical security for its safe keeping. But in this instance they misjudged their man.

Half unconsciously he thrust it, wrapped up in numerous folds of cloth, into his waistcoat pocket, the whole being contained in an insignificant little box, which could be thus easily put away. He went on working hard, as usual, and thought no more of his precious treasure. He changed his clothes for dinner, and threw his waistcoat aside, still forgetting all about the box contained in it. About six weeks afterward a message came from Lord Dalhousie saying that the Queen had ordered the jewel to be at once transmitted to her. The subject was mentioned by Sir Henry at the board, when John said, quietly: "Send for it at once."

"Why you've got it!" said Sir Henry. In a moment the fact of his carelessness flashed across him. He was horror-stricken, and, as he used to describe his feelings afterward when telling the story, he said to himself: "Well, this is the worst trouble I have ever yet got into."

But such was his command over his countenance that he gave no external sign of trepidation. "O, yes of course; I forgot about it," he said, and went on with the business of the meeting as if nothing had happened. He soon, however, found an opportunity of slipping away to his private room, and, with his heart in his mouth, sent for his old bearer, and said to him: "Have you got a small box which was in my waistcoat pocket some time ago?"

"Yes, sahib," the man replied; "Dibbia (the native word for it), I found it and put it in one of your boxes."

"Bring it here," said the sahib.

Upon this the old native went to a broken down tin box, and produced the little one from it.

"Open it," said John Lawrence, "and see what is inside."

He watched the man anxiously enough as fold after fold of the small rags was taken off, and great was his relief when the precious gem appeared. The bearer seemed perfectly unconscious of the treasure which he had had in his keeping. "There is nothing here, sahib," he said, "but a bit of glass!" The Koh-i-noor was then quickly presented to the board, that it might be forwarded to the Queen; and when John Lawrence told his story great was the amusement it caused. The jewel passed, I am told on good authority, through one or two other striking vicissitudes before it was safely lodged in the English crown. But never, I feel sure, whether flashing in the diadem of Turk or Mogul, or in the uplifted sword of Persian, or Afghan, or Sikh conqueror, did it pass through so strange a crisis, or run a greater risk of being lost forever than when it lay forgotten in the waistcoat pocket of John Lawrence, or in the broken down tin box of his aged bearer.—"Life of Lord Lawrence," by R. Bosworth Smith.

The Parsis of India.

My first view of the Parsis was on the steamer Sutlej. A number of them took passage at Aden for Bombay. A portion of the forward deck was assigned to them, where they spread out their bedding every night, and gathered it up in the morning. They were of fine features, intelligent, affable and communicative. They wore excellent clothing. I observed that their more prominent buttons were of solid gold. I had several conversations with them, when our subject was generally their religious opinions. The more I saw of them, the more favorably I was impressed by them. This contact with only a few members of this strange community made me fully prepared for a larger view of the great Parsi population of Bombay; and every day I spent in the city, the stronger became my admiration for this people, save only their false religion.

Throughout India there are nearly two hundred thousand Parsis, and of these one half live in and about the Presidency of Bombay alone. They form a class by themselves, separated socially from both the Christian and Hindu populations, and as thoroughly independent of all other classes as if they were the sole people inhabiting Western India. They are the descendants of the Persians who were driven out of their own country, in the eighth century, by the Mohammedan conquerors of that kingdom. Some of the fugitives took shelter on the little island of Ormuz, at the entrance of the Persian Gulf. But there was no peace in this retired place. They succeeded in getting a few boats, and, embarking on them, set sail for the Indian coast. They could have remained in Persia had they been willing to adopt the Mohammedan faith. But the religion of Zoroaster had too strong a hold on them. They would not sacrifice any one of its tenets. They preferred exile to another faith. In India, they were cautiously received by the Hindu prince, Jaji Rana.

This was in the year 716. The prince was afterwards favorably impressed by their appearance, and gave them full liberty to reside, and practice their religion, in his province of Sanjan. They enjoyed three centuries of quiet, during which time they were re-enforced by other migrations of their countrymen. When the Mohammedans from Persia, in their march of conquest, finally reached India, and set up the great Mogul Empire in the valleys of the Ganges and the Indus, the Parsis were again in great danger. They feared the cruelty of the same hand which had conquered them at home, and made them exiles forever from their native country. They allied themselves with the Hindu chiefs, and yet both Hindu and Parsi were conquered, and, as a political and military force, went down beneath the all-powerful Mogul chiefs. But they scattered, led quiet lives, engaged in commerce, and were permitted to preserve their faith. So soon as the English came to Western India, the Parsis hailed them as the hope of the country. From that day to this they have admired the English rule in India, and have been its warmest supporters in all the dangers which have threatened the hold of Britain on her Indian possessions.

The large settlements of Parsis in Bombay occurred just before the king of Portugal gave the island to the English, as a marriage dowry to Catharine, Princess of Braganza, in 1688, when she married Charles II. of England. From this time they enjoyed a new and broader life. They now had their first open field in India, on a perfect equality with the people of all other nations. While loyal to the country as an English possession, the future depended less upon any political relations than upon their capacity in commerce. Here has been the department to which they have steadily adhered for two centuries; and to-day they stand at the head of the business of Bombay, and have the profound respect of every class.

One can easily recognize the Parsi wherever he meets him. He uses a dress different from his ancestors in Persia. It is a half-way costume between the Hindu and the European. He wears a loose garment of cotton, flannel or silk, extending from his neck to a few inches below his knees. Many are now wearing light trousers—a late innovation. The round, dark skull hat, rising like a small cylinder, but without brim, is the head-covering of the men. The ladies dress very becomingly, and are distinguished for their jewels and rich robes. They differ entirely from the Mohammedan and Hindu women in the high and honorable estimate which the Parsi men place upon them. They, with their children, often accompany their husbands in afternoon drives on the Malabar Hill, and in other directions. Their equipages are richly appointed. There is an air of happiness and comfort as one sees the Parsis in public, which those who know them well say prevails in their homes as well. I saw many of the ladies driving out on afternoons, along the Queen's Road, with as much style as though their spirited horses were whirling them around the broad road in Hyde Park. The ladies wear a loose robe, but with uncovered head and with becoming shoes. With them, not less than with the men, the tendency is constantly toward the adoption of European dress. They are getting to take their meals sitting in chairs, instead of, as formerly, squat upon the floor. The household usages are gradually conforming to the English methods. They are very fond of many lights at home, and their rooms are hung with so many lamps, that, at night, one can always distinguish the Parsi house.

The most notable features of the Parsi population of Bombay are, their rise to great wealth, their present control of the internal commerce of the country, and their vast trade with China and Japan. It has frequently been the case that when a Parsi has risen to eminence and wealth his son has continued his business with equal success, and entered upon all the official dignities of the father. Many prominent families, have become synonyms for commercial success and probity. Many of them trace their origin far back to their first days in India, when their fathers were fugitives from Mohammedan oppressors; and some of them make a leap still farther back, into Persia, their original home.

Their benevolence has been commensurate with their growth in wealth. There is nothing which a Parsi more enjoys than in giving freely to a needy cause. His heart is in his hand. He is touched by an appeal to his sympathy, and rich and poor alike give freely, according to their ability. Some of the largest and most beautiful charities and educational institutions of Bombay have been established by them as direct gifts to the country. The Benevolent Institution, founded by Sir Jamshidji Jijibhai, consists of a group of male and female schools. This gentleman was the first Parsi baronet created by England, in recognition of his many benevolences and his sterling character. The Alexandra College, for Parsi ladies, was established by Manikji Khurshidji. Many of the studies pursued in European schools are in the curriculum. When one sees such an institution as this, with all the appliances of an English educational establishment, it cannot be surprising that the higher Parsi classes should be rapidly adopting European ideas and usages.

The present Parsi faith is the system of Zoroaster. Monotheism lies at its base. Haug says: "The leading idea of his theology was Monotheism; that is, there are not many gods, but only One. The present Parsis, basing their doctrines on the most ancient writings of their ancestors, believe in the resurrection of the body, future life, immortality of the soul, and rewards and punishments. They reverence the sun, fire, water and air. They pay such devotion to fire, that, to a stranger, they seem to regard it as a proper object of adoration. But their scholars repudiate the supposition, saying that they only regard fire as a manifestation of Diety. Karaka, speaking for his co-religionists, says: "God, according to the Parsi faith, is the emblem of glory, refugeance and light; and in this view a Parsi, while engaged in prayer, is directed to stand before the fire, or to turn his face toward the sun, because they appear to be the most proper symbols of the Almighty." My Parsi fellow-voyagers, in the steamer for Bombay, performed their morning devotions at sunrise, and always took care to turn their faces to the East when making them. One cannot see the minute attention of any Parsi to fire, and his keeping the sacred flame always burning in his temples and home, without firmly believing that, at least among the common people of the community, there is such a regard paid to fire as to be more a devotion than simple respect. It seems to be, in their sense, an original divinity rather than a simple emanation.

There is nothing of which the typical Parsi is prouder, next to the creed he gets from Zoroaster, than of his historical traditions. He loves to think of his old kings, Cyrus, Cambyses, Darius and all the rest, when the world quaked beneath their armies. He remembers with peculiar joy the time when Persia's eye dared to look upon even Europe as a fit field for conquest, and that his own Xerxes fought the Greeks in the Bay of Salamis, and within sight of Athens.

We cannot but believe that the Parsi, as he studies more closely the differences between his own faith and the Christian, will, in due time, come to accept the latter. His community is sure to be reached by the all-pervading gospel. Mitchell, who studied the prevailing tendencies among these people during his residence in Bombay, thus expresses his belief in their Christian future:

"The immense disparity between Christ and Zoroaster is dawning, we believe, on that interesting people, the Parsis of India. They have been clinging to their ancient faith from a feeling of nationality rather than of religion—from tradition more than conviction; but immense changes are certainly at hand. But we believe that, as the Magi from the East, who probably were Zoroastrians, hastened to lay their gold, frankincense, and myrrh at the feet of the new-born Redeemer, so, ere long, the Parsis will, in all probability, be the first of Eastern races to take upon them, as a race, the easy yoke of Christ."—Bishop John F. Hurst in the Methodist Review.

For "The Friend."

Reminiscences of Phebe Taber.

After she was confined to her room by the severity of her disorder, a person residing in Starksboro, Vt., who had been severely ill and was in a low and desponding state of mind, paid her a visit. She said: "I have been very anxious for a long time to see thee, but have been unable to come. I felt sure that if I could only see thee, thou would tell me something that would help me, and I would be better."

Phebe looked earnestly at her, and remained awhile silent; then said: "Poor child! How can I help thee? What can I do for thee? Thou sees how I am afflicted, and that I have enough to do to bear my own sufferings; though I desire neither to murmur nor complain. How can I help another to bear theirs! Thou will have to do as I have done, look to thy dear Saviour for help and support, and entreat Him to give thee strength to bear and patience to endure, all the chastenings that may be laid upon thee. He alone can help thee. 'Cast thy burthens upon the Lord,' and he will sustain thee."

Her visitor seemed disappointed, but thoughtfully, though not then satisfied. A few days after her return home, she said to her family and friends, "I so much wanted to see Phebe Taber, for I believed she could help me; and she has helped me; but not in the way I expected; and I am better. I have looked to my Saviour for strength and support, and He has had compassion upon me." In a few weeks she regained her health, and with it her usual equanimity.

An aged Friend and former neighbor of theirs, after the death of his wife, having been taken by his son from his old home and away from friends, became indisposed, and came to their house for medical treatment and entertainment. His health soon materially improved, and for a time he was content and apparently happy. But at length he became sad and sorrowful. Phebe inquired the cause, and if he was more unwell, or again suffering. He said he had so much enjoyed being with them, it seemed almost like his old home; but now he must return again to his son's, away from his old Friends and meetings; and finish the remainder of his life alone. Phebe told him, if that was all, to give himself no further trouble; their house should be his home while he needed one. He was thankful; and in a few months his health became so much impaired that he was confined to his room. His brother, Nathan Meader, came to see him, and said, "I have allowed Levi to live with you, because it was his choice. But I cannot let him remain longer. He is my brother. I must take him home with me to die." Levi deceased in a short time after his removal. It was his funeral at which Valentine Meader, in his last communication at Friends' meeting-house, in Lincoln, stood for nearly two hours.

THE CLAY CHERUB.

BY ELIZABETH AKERS.

What is immortal? Dreamers speak of love
Outliving mortal breath,
And conquering fate and circumstance and death;
And wise men preach, and poets sing in rhyme
Of faith and fame which years cannot disprove,
And hope which laughs at time.
And yet, the veriest trifles oft outlast
All these, and leave them in the misty past,
Proving how empty is their boast above
A silken shred, a flower, or faded glove.

He took a piece of potter's earth one day—
My friend, remembered still—
And, with an artist's ready craft and skill, Fashioned for me a little cherub-face.
"Alas!" I said, "Why make of brittle clay
A thing of so much grace,
So beautiful and sweet and dainty fair?
Its lines will yield to the effacing air.
Their delicate carving, shield it as I may,
And dry and crumbling, gain by grain, away."

The brows were bent as in a wondering dream,
Half joy and half surprise;
The gentle lids closed over sleeping eyes;
The tender lips just parted in a smile
So sweet and life-like, it would almost seem
That, in a little while,
It would awaken, laughing, from its rest;
And quietly across the baby breast,
Which slumber's lightest breathing seemed to thrill,
Two angel wings were folded, soft and still.

He smiled, and touched the rounded cheek of clay,
And gravely said to me:
"This little face you prize so tenderly
Holds in itself no element of change,
No germ of dissolution or decay;
And it would not be strange
If, in so kind and loving hands as yours,
It lasts for years, and even still endures
When much that you and I, dear child, to-day Believe immortal, shall have passed away."

How truly did he speak! Death's seal was set
Even then upon his face,
Though love refused to see its fatal trace;
And, though the world was fair with light and bloom,
Still in his eyes, where mirth and feeling met,
There lay a shade of doom.
Long since their earnest depths forgot the light;
But, wrapped in happy sleep and visions bright,
Unchanged by time, unshadowed by regret,
The little cherub-face is perfect yet.

The hand which dowered with life a marble bust,
And caught a marvellous ray
Of beauty in this bit of worthless clay;
That wrought out power and passion from a stone;
Called smiles from cold Carrara's prisoning crust,
By skillful touch alone;
Awakened loveliest dimples in a cheek
Rock-hewn, and made the carved lip almost speak—
Has now, oblivious of its lofty trust,
Forgot its canning, and returned to dust.

In the true heart that loved him, even yet
The wild and frantic grief,
Which long rejected solace and relief,
Has only changed to fixed and silent pain;
And every spring-time, when the violet
Wakes to the moving rain—

While the glad birds build, and the new leaves grow,
And the brooks sing—its blossom sweet and low
Keeps vigil by his rest, with blue eye wet,
Like one who waits and never will forget.

What has it not outlived and put to shame,
Outlasting their decay,
This little fragment of untempered clay?
Youth, love, and all that makes existence dear;
Life's brightest dreams—an artist's dawning fame,
A woman's hope and fear,
A child's sweet life, that promised to atone
For years of toil and we endured alone—
Faith's strong reliance, friendship's steadiest flame—
And yet the clay-wrought face remains the same.

Wherefore it seems these trifles, which we call
Mere nothings of a day,
Last when our son's best treasures pass away;
Beside the life-time of a book-pressed flower,
Love's fond forever dwindles brief and small,
And fame is for an hour;
Joy's promise fades before a rose's red,
And clay endures when youth and hope are dead;
Shadows outlast our trust, as years betfall,
But human sorrow long outlives them all.

Lace-making at Nottingham, England.—Joachim Miller in The Independent, says:—"There is or was originally a long, high bank of very soft sandstone on the north bank of the river Trent, pointing to the sun. In this soft sandstone the early Britons dug caves. They dug them deep and wide, and wonderful in construction. It is said that even now the city of caves under the ground is almost as large as the broad and populous city on top of ground. In cases of invasion or conquest, these cave dwellers would retreat underground and defy pursuit. It is the boast of the people of Nottingham that their ancestors were never really conquered by any one. It is said that William the Conqueror even diverted the Trent and threw it against the mouths of these caves, trying to drown them out like rats. But they remained in their caves, all the time secure. And whether the story is true or not, the Trent still flows in an old and artificial channel, when its waters are high, close along the base of the great sandstone mountain, which, to this day is pierced with holes that are said to be endless.

The weaving of laces came about here in this way: The half or wholly savage women sitting at the mouths of these caves and holding their threads against the sun with the darkness behind them could see the fine threads better and so could do finer and better work than any other women in Western Europe. And then their immunity from conquest and consequent uninterrupted in their peculiar industry fastened it here and kept it well forward.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Sea Water as a Preservative.—The Vigo Bay Treasure Company, of London, lately received a collection of articles taken from the treasure galleons sunk in the harbor of Vigo, Spain, in 1702. There are specimens of logwood and mahogany that, in spite of their 184 years submersion, are in a perfect state of preservation. Dyers who have experimented with the logwood state, that it is even better for dyeing purposes than the wood now imported. The mahogany, too, is very fine and solid. One log, 12 feet long and 22 by 32 inches square, is being sawed up to be used in the manufacture of furniture and walking-sticks for mementoes. The chief curiosity, however, is an ancient pulley-block, 4 feet high by three feet broad, with four solid copper sheaves, 18 inches in diameter. It is of solid oak, and was probably used in hoisting heavy articles. The wood is perfectly preserved, but an iron band is completely corroded away, while the copper wheels are only slightly oxidized.—Scientific American.

The Sleeping Disease.—This is a singular and invariably fatal malady peculiar to the negroes of certain districts on the Western Coast of Africa. The patient, usually a male adult, is seized with a sensation of drowsiness, which continues rapidly to increase in spite of all efforts to throw it off, until he sinks into a profound and seemingly natural sleep. This continues for about twenty-one days, when death takes place.

Throughout the course of the disease, the patient preserves a quiet and peaceful countenance, may be easily aroused for a short time, will take nourishment, and generally answer a few questions in a perfectly rational manner. With the exception of the abnormal tendency to sleep, nothing exists to denote disease. Every remedy that could possibly be of any avail has been used without any apparent beneficial effect. They sleep on, and quietly glide into eternity in spite of professional skill.—Scientific American.

The Tip of the Tongue.—Strictly speaking, with the tip of the tongue one cannot really taste at all. If you put a small drop of honey or of oil of bitter almonds on that part of the mouth, you will find, no doubt to your great surprise, that it produces no effect of any sort; you only taste it when it begins slowly to diffuse itself and reaches the true tasting region in the middle distance. But if you put a little cayenne or mustard on the same part, you will find that it bites you immediately; the experiment should be tried sparingly; while if you put it lower down in the mouth, you will swallow it almost without noticing the pungency of the stimulant. The reason is, that the tip of the tongue is supplied only with nerves which are really nerves of touch, not nerves of taste, proper; they belong to a totally different main branch, and they go to a different centre in the brain, together with the very similar threads which supply the nerves of smell for mustard and pepper. That is why the smell and taste of these pungent substances are so much alike, as everybody must have noticed: a good snuff at a mustard-pot producing almost the same irritating effects as an incautious mouthful. As a rule, we do not accurately distinguish, it is true, between these different regions of taste in the mouth in ordinary life; but that is because we usually roll our food about instinctively, without paying much attention to the particular part affected by it. Indeed, when one is trying deliberate experiments on the subject, in order to test the varying sensitiveness of the different parts to different substances, it is necessary to keep the tongue quite dry in order to isolate the thing you are experimenting with and prevent its spreading to all parts of the mouth together. In actual practice this result is obtained in rather a ludicrous manner: by blowing upon the tongue between each experiment with a pair of bellows. To such undignified expedients does the pursuit of science lead the ardent modern psychologist. Those domestic rivals of Dr. Forbes Winslow—the servants—who behold the enthusiastic investigator alternately drying his tongue in this ridiculous fashion, as if he were a blacksmith's fire, and then squeezing out a single drop of essence of pepper, vinegar, or beef tea from a glass syringe upon the dry surface, not unnaturally arrive at the conclusion that the master has gone stark mad, and that, in their private opinion, "it is the microscope and the skeleton as has done it."—Cornhill Magazine.

Wrens and the English Sparrow.—Something had gone wrong with the birds, and the occupants of two neighboring wren-boxes were discussing the situation. They were in great earnest, as their chattering and the energetic bobbing of heads and tails plainly indicated. After some five minutes or more of most animated discussion, a plan of action was decided upon. They returned, as I supposed they would, to the house of one of the pair of wrens, and settled upon its roof and upon the little perch at its entrance. An English sparrow had taken possession of the box, and could not be dislodged.

The wrens took their stands near by, and quietly waited for the sparrow to appear. This it did not do immediately, and one of the wrens became quite uneasy. It chirped and twittered in a restless manner, and finally flew to the wren-box near by and entered it. I suppose it was a parent bird anxious about its eggs or young. Some ten long minutes passed, and still no signs of the sparrow. The three wrens that remained never quit their posts. Finally the sparrow thrust out its head, and emerged from its retreat. In an instant the three wrens darted upon the usurper and drove him from the bird-house. Vainly he endeavored to escape the sharp thrusts of their bills. The wrens were as active as swallows, and eluded every attempt on the part of the sparrow to attack them. The moment he essayed to close with one, the others were upon him; and so successfully did they manage the fight that they cut off his final effort to regain the bird-box. They pursued the sparrow in whatever direction he took, and so wearied him with their ceaseless assaults that he finally yielded to sheer exhaustion and fell to the ground. At this point I interfered, and, picking him up, found upon examination that he was so sorely wounded, that he soon died. As to the wrens: seeing that victory had crowned their efforts, they united in singing such a song of rejoicing as wrens never sang before.—C. C. Abbott's Rambles about Home.

—Romanism in Canada.—An article on this subject in the Presbyterian Review, states that there is no part of North America in which the Roman Church possesses so much political, social and ecclesiastical influence as in the Province of Quebec. It is there established by law, and may collect tithes by process of law, and also assessments for the building of places of worship, parsonages, &c., the amount of which is to be determined by the ecclesiastical authorities. Immense sums of money and large sections of land have passed into the hands of the "Church." The educational institutions of the Province are controlled by its clergy.

Ecclesiastical Finances.—Several cases of embezzlement or improper use of trust-funds held for religious uses, have latterly appeared. They give force to the recommendation of the Finance Committee of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, who advised "not to take for granted that the honesty of any man is so unquestionable as to dispense with watchfulness;" and that all the accounts be faithfully examined at least once in every three months.

A "Gospel Wagon."—A substantial road wagon, says the Episcopal Recorder, has been constructed for Ferdinand Schiverea, a well-known street preacher, whose ministrations have been interfered with by the police. It is covered over, except about two feet in front, where it is protected by a hood. The back part is filled with bibles and tracts. He purposes to drive about the city until he reaches a likely spot, where he will stop, distribute tracts, offer his bibles for sale at a nominal sum, and preach to the people who may collect around him. As peddlers are allowed by the city laws to declaim as much as they choose in selling their wares, he may hope to be able to preach as a peddler without molestation.

—New England Yearly Meeting (Smaller Body).—We learn from the Western Friend that this meeting convened at Westery, R. I., on the 12th of Sixth Month, Edward K. Hobson and his companion Newby Hodson, from Kansas, were present with credentials. John W. Foster was appointed Clerk. "The usual routine of business was transacted in harmony and love. In the appointment of members of the Meeting for Sufferings, a departure from the former custom was made by the appointment of women Friends as members of this body."

—The Western Friend on The Christian Worker.—The Western Friend, in commenting on the charges of unsoundness published by the Christian Worker, and which were noticed in "The Friend" of Seventh Mo. 31st, denies their correctness, and calls on that paper either to retract its charges, or to produce proof that those against whom the charges were made differ from George Fox, Robert Barclay and the other early Friends, in their views of the Atonement, the State of Man in the Fall, the doctrine of the Light of Christ in man, the Blood of Christ, Justification by faith, and the Resurrection of the dead.

—A Newspaper Evil.—A New York journalist says:—"A few weeks ago about 1,500 people assembled in one of the largest halls we have, to listen to addresses by Bishop Potter, by Red Cloud, by General Armstrong, Principal of the Hampton Institute, and by several well-educated Indians. The hall was packed, the meeting was spirited, the addresses were entertainingly instructive, and a movement in the direction of Indian rights was initiated which bids fair to have great wide-spread national results. The same evening a little foul-mouthed tailor addressed perhaps a hundred socialist agitators—men who were not citizens, a majority of whom are not engaged in any occupation whatever except that of agitation—in a hall back of a lager beer saloon on Third avenue. In the papers of the city the following morning appeared from one-half a column to a column of this tirade, and in one or two papers appeared a paragraphic allusion to the meeting addressed by the bishop and his associates. That is a fair illustration, not a strained one, a perfectly fair illustration of the way in which the newspapers of the city treat the two classes of thought and action. Anything that is dirty, mean, wrong, contrary to the public good, is written up, described at full length, made piquant and interesting; but matters which tend toward the elevation of the race, which look to the cleansing of our city, which take hold of the solid substantialities of the people, are passed by, either in absolute silence or with paragraphic attention.

"I remember many years ago, when I was city editor of the New York Times, and lived in Brooklyn, my mother wrote me from the country, where she was spending a few months, that a stranger who judged of Brooklyn by what appeared under the head of Brooklyn news, would imagine that there was nothing in the City of Churches except a city hall, a few criminal courts, police stations and a morgue. No city in the world surpasses New York in intelligence, in a love of all that is good and pure and noble and decent and humane, but with the exception of a few reports of sermons, with now and then a record of some English lecturer or Irish orator, all the upper realm is left untouched. Our reporters are instructed to scent the carrion. They never bring the rose with its perfume, or the lily with its grace, or the pansy with its drooping beauty before the public attention, but the dead dogs of agitation and the swollen carcasses of crime, and the offal of dirt and squalor, these are thrust before the disgusted eyes and under the offended nostrils of an amazed and outraged people."

There are sources enough of danger surrounding our nation to warn us that our liberties and peace will not be secure, except under the influence of a deep Christian principle pervading our people. There is no natural happiness except for "that people whose God is the Lord."

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 21, 1886.

In the last number of "The Friend" there were published some remarks on the pleas which have been put forth for an educated ministry. Closely connected with this subject are the allied ones of the maintenance of ministers, and of the supplying destitute congregations with preachers.

A writer from Oregon, in The Christian Worker, of Seventh Month, 1st, mentions as the first need of Friends at the place from which he wrote, "A good evangelist, sent here and supported by Eastern Friends. Some efficient workers have in the past, offered to come if Friends would support them."

The second need is like unto the other: "Our Missionary Board needs money to supply home workers." The writer adds: "Many Friends here see the great necessity of taking our ministers out of secular business, that they may give their time to the work of the ministry."

These expressions indicate a very marked departure from the doctrines of Friends, as to the motives which should regulate the movements of ministers, and as to the source of spiritual help on which dependence is placed.

A similar lesson is taught by the action of the "Committees on Evangelistic Work," or by whatever titles they may be called, which have been appointed in several Yearly Meetings. In the report of such a committee to the late New York Yearly Meeting, it is said: "Imperative appeals have continued to come from various parts of the Yearly Meeting, asking for a resident pastor who shall shepherd the flock of God, and whenever it was possible the demand has been met; yet there are many small meetings without the needful care." "We would urge upon the Yearly Meeting an earnest consideration of this need."

The Report further states, that the Committee had paid the expenses incurred in such cases; and that in most cases, "the time has been for a few weeks only, but in some it has continued throughout the year."

Although the Report thinks it would be unjust to such ministers to say that they preach for money or are salaried, yet it is difficult to see how a line of distinction is to be drawn between this system and that against which Friends have objected from their very rise, as "hiring ministry." We believe it flows from a loss of faith, perhaps scarcely perceived by its advocates, in the care of the Head of the Church over its welfare, as shown in the ordering and disposing of his ministers, and in his immediate workings on the hearts of the people. Not satisfied with endeavoring to live in communion with Him, and laboring in the services which He appoints, some in their zeal endeavor to supplement his work by arrangements of their own.

Where ministers are sent by a committee to labor in a particular locality, and supported there, it is unreasonable to expect anything else than that they will at least appear to earn their living by preaching at every gathering of the people, and that whether they are sensible of a fresh opening and motion, or not.

But in place of comments of our own, we prefer to quote, in a condensed form, some remarks made by Thomas Story to the Archbishop of Canterbury, which show the views held by our Society as to the source of Gospel ministry, the manner of its exercise, and the degree of support which the Church is bound to bestow.

"We believe that Christ only hath right and power to call, sanctify, and qualify, whomsoever He pleaseth, as ministers and officers in his congregation, or amongst his people. And we observe that now, as in times past, He taketh the weak things of this world whereby to overpower the strong; and foolish, whereby to confound the wisdom of the wise: that no flesh may boast before Him.

"And when at any time we are sitting together in silence, as we usually do, waiting upon the Almighty for the influence of his Holy Spirit, that we may be comforted, refreshed and edified thereby, if any one has his understanding enlightened thereby into any edifying matter, and moved and enabled to speak, the rest have proper qualifications by the same Spirit, to discern and judge, both of the soundness of his speech and matter, and also of the spirit and fountain from which his ministry doth arise; and if from the Holy Spirit of Christ, who is Truth, it hath acceptance with the congregation, and though but in few words, it is comfortable and edifying.

"And it often doth happen, that such person is moved or called by the Word of God to travel in this service in some other places remote from his habitation, which will take him off from his business whereby he maintains himself, his wife and family; suppose him to be a cobbler of old shoes, a patcher of old clothes, or the meanest mechanic that can be named, poor and not able to fit himself with necessaries for his journey: in such a case the Friends of the meeting to which he belongs provide all such things, and furnish him. And if in that service he is so long from home as that his horse fails, and his clothes wear out, and necessaries are wanting unto him, then the Friends where he travels, where his service is acceptable, take care to furnish him till he returns to his family and business. And in the time of his absence from them, some Friend or Friends of the neighborhood visit his family, advise in his business, and charitably promote it till he return. But as to any other temporal advantages, or selfish motive of reward for such service, there is no such thing among us. For if our ministers should have the least view that way, and insisted upon it; or our people were willing to gratify that desire, we should then conclude that we were gone off from the true foundation of Christ and his apostles, and become apostates."

On page 399 of last volume, there was a short notice of Canada Yearly Meeting, which met at Pickering on the 18th of Sixth Month. We have since received a copy of the printed Minutes, and also of a document prepared by the Representative Meeting.

In the Minute of Advice it is said that Christian love "leads into a forgiving spirit, and to pray for the salvation of all, including enemies."

In the care of children, "the need of early and continued training in the way they should go was felt and expressed. But that duty cannot be rightly performed without an understanding of the way ourselves. We must walk in the right way, and the light of our example must reflect the character of the sons of God, if our precept and our restraint is to be effectual with our children. Instructions in right things may be diligently applied in our intimate intercourse with the children, and we need as diligently to guard every avenue to wrong."

A concern arose in the women's meeting to address a short epistle to a company of members who had removed to and were residing in the North West Territory, and are holding a meeting after the manner of Friends; and also to a few members who reside in British Columbia.

"On carefully considering the whole matter of the lawsuit now pending, the Representative Meeting was authorized to avail themselves of any right opening that may present for a settlement of the matter without the Law Courts."

A document prepared by the Representative Meeting, and which is called "A brief re-affirmation of our fundamental principles," was approved and directed to be printed.

This document (which is quite short) opens with a statement of doctrines, extracted from the Canada book of discipline; and asserts that those who depart from these foundation principles have no constitutional right to the name and privileges of the Society of Friends. "Yet many in membership have assumed the right to change their opinions and have persistently propagated and tried to commit meetings to the official acknowledgment of extreme innovations in doctrine and practice." "They have obtained a decree from the Court of Appeal, which denies that the Society of Friends have any foundation principles, and consequently are changeable." This decision "is a cause of deep suffering."

The document closes with the following sentences: "We are well assured that the adoption and propagation of unsound doctrines have been the sole cause of the trouble and separation in meetings. There cannot be a harmonious worshipping and working together without a submission to Christ, the Head, and being joined together in Him.

"The dissensions and separations which have occurred have been the cause of long-continued suffering; and our prayers are to the Lord that He will so move upon the hearts of the people that they may be gathered into the one fold with the One Shepherd over them."

The Editor of the Independent received a letter from the "pastor" of a church in New England, of which it says, "We print it, because the remedy proposed will apply to a good many other cases." For the same reason we give a part of the letter a place in "The Friend."

"The — church here, for over a year has been divided into two parties on account of a personal quarrel between leading members of the church. Every attempt to settle the difficulty had only made matters worse, so that when I came here for my summer's work, one party in the church refused to attend the meetings, or to aid in the support of the church.

"It was evident to me that unless a reconciliation was effected speedily, the church would go down; and so I began to cast about in my mind for some method by which to approach the leading men involved, with a view to securing peace. It was while my mind was thus occupied that I took up The Independent for June 8d, and read this editorial note:

"The best way to settle a quarrel is for the innocent one to take the initiative and forgive the guilty one. A quarrel is seldom healed in any other way. Try it."

"It seemed to suit the case exactly, and as in this case both parties were thoroughly convinced of their own innocence, I determined to read the note to both of them. This I did; and the result was that both took the initiative. Everybody forgave everybody else, and at a large church meeting a few days ago, where both parties were present, resolutions of peace were unanimously adopted; and now everything is lovely."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A protective association of liquor dealers has been formed in this city. One of the resolutions adopted is the following: "That we agree with the State League in giving our adherence to men and measures that bespeak for us aid and comfort in practically carrying out our principles, and that the presidents of our respective organizations be instructed to take active steps in this direction without making this a political organization or tributary to either party, but solely as it may aid the advancement of our cause."

A despatch from Reading, Pa., says the cloud-burst and storm on the night of the 13th inst. was unprecedented. The streets of Hamburg presented the appearance of rivers. Hundreds of cellars were flooded, and wagons and agricultural implements were washed from farm-yards into the Schuylkill river and carried away. Cornfields were washed away, leaving not a vestige of the crops, and tobacco fields were riddled. The fruit crops are a total loss.

Heavy rains have fallen in many sections of Middle and Northern Wisconsin, and have greatly subdued the forest fires. In other places the forests are still blazing. Early on the evening of the 13th inst. a fire suddenly advanced toward that part of the village of Spencer not destroyed a week ago. The sheet of flame is described as having been "over one hundred feet high, and creating a roar that could be heard for miles." Wagon loads of goods formed a caravan to neighboring towns. At Stiles "similar scenes were enacted. People buried their effects to save them from destruction. As the people were about despairing of saving the town, showers of rain fell and averted the apprehended catastrophe."

Extensive fires have also occurred in the Northwestern part of Michigan.

An earthquake, which lasted twelve seconds, was felt at Indianapolis on the afternoon of the 12th inst. Houses were shaken perceptibly, but no damage is reported.

Captain Traut, of the steamship Venitian, while towing the disabled steamship Werra, made use of oil during a storm in smoothing the troubled waters. He reports that after oil bags were hung out, not a drop of water broke on board the Werra, and the ship was in all respects more comfortable.

Specimens of gold are exhibited in Eau Claire, Wisconsin, which is said to have been discovered seventy miles north of that city, the ore assaying $80 per ton.

Seventy-six Chinamen were expelled from Innean City and Douglas Island, Alaska, on the 6th instant. They were shipped to Fort Wrangel, on two small schooners.

Governor Ireland, of Texas, has issued a proclamation calling for contributions in aid of the sufferers by the drought in Brown, Coleman, Callaghan, Eastland, Stephens, and other counties of that State.

A "rich oil belt" is reported to have been discovered five miles from Livermore, California.

The deaths in the city last week numbered 362, which was 47 less than during the previous week and 105 less than during the corresponding period last year. The main causes were: cholera infantum, 41; consumption of the lungs, 52; inflammation of stomach and bowels, 13; marasmus, 30. Of the total number of deaths, 118 were of children under one year.

Cotton sold in a small way on a basis of 9½ cts. for middling uplands.

Corn—Sales of No. 2, high mixed, in grain depot, at 5½ cts. No. 2 yellow, in grain depot, 54 cts. Oats, No. 2 mixed sold at 33 cts. No. 2 white at 37½ cts. No. 1 white at 37½ cts.

Beef cattle were 3½ cts. to 5½ cts. Sheep, 2 cts. to 4½ cts. Hogs, 7 cts. to 7½ cts.

The receipts on the 16th were: Beeves, 2500; sheep, 12,600; hogs, 5000.

FOREIGN.—The Canadian Government has issued orders forbidding American vessels from entering the Bay of Chaleur, on pain of instant seizure.

Cardinal Taschereau, a Roman Catholic bishop in Quebec, has written a letter condemning the organization of the Knights of Labor, as of a secret society, which the bishops are enjoined to proceed against as against others of the same kind. Cardinal Gibbons, of Baltimore, Md., commenting on this letter, says:—"We hold that if a man joins a society, swearing never to reveal any of its workings, no matter how criminal, and to obey the dictates of its officers blindly, he surrenders his personal liberty, becomes a slave to his fellow man, and cannot partake of the sacraments of the church. On the other hand, if a man joins an organization, swearing to keep secret its workings, with the proviso that nothing therein shall be contrary to the laws of the land, to his conscience and religious tenets, we hold that his action is perfectly justifiable. The whole question as to the church's attitude towards the Knights of Labor, depends on which of these oaths the members take."

Rioting in Belfast has been renewed. A dispatch of the 16th says: "The military withdrew from the streets at one o'clock this morning. Since then the city has been quiet." "Public houses are being closed, and other precautions are being taken." "Secular strife has recurred in a deplorable, cold blooded fashion." Several hundred persons have been wounded, and taken to public or private hospitals. The London Times censures the Protestants of Belfast for their refusal to submit to the authorities.

The Longford [Ireland] Board of Guardians has adopted resolutions denouncing five local landlords for the heartless eviction of fifty-six families. The Board asks the Government to take immediate cognizance of the landlords' action, in order to prevent wholesale pauperism and the deportation of large numbers of the people of Ireland.

Prussia and the Vatican have signed a convention terminating the religious controversy between them so far as it related to all secondary matters, and regulating the presentation of benefices and appointments to ecclesiastical seminaries within the kingdom of Prussia.

The number of new cases of cholera in Italy, reported on the 16th inst., was 170, and the number of deaths 69. It is stated that the places most seriously threatened lie in the centre or on the edge of marshy plains, where there is always more or less malaria at this season of the year.

Cholera of the most virulent form prevails among the French troops in Tonquin.

Central Russia, especially the neighborhood of Moscow, has been devastated by tornadoes and water-spouts. Many buildings, bridges and crops have been destroyed.

A spring of petroleum, of fine quality, has been discovered at Ferrand, Auvergne. This is said to be the first petroleum found in France.

DIED, at her residence in Ullyses, Tompkins County, N. Y., the 26th of Seventh Mo., 1886, AMY M. PYLE, wife of Edward Pyle, in the 45th year of her age; a member of Hector Monthly Meeting of Friends. In the early part of an extended sickness of seven months she was impressed with a belief that she should not recover, and was enabled through mercy, to give herself into the hands of her Redeemer, and make a full surrender of herself, her prayer being, "Here am I, body, soul and spirit; all Thine; do with me as Thou seekest fit." And after a time, she felt that the sacrifice was accepted, and although the struggle was great to give up her husband and children, and other near relatives, yet she was enabled to feel a full resignation to part with all; and also an evidence that her sins were forgiven, and a place of rest prepared for her. She was favored beyond many in having near access to the Holy Spirit, saying "I have never been left to myself since I made a full surrender; I sometimes have to seek longer than others, but it is always there; I can always turn to it and find it." And she was at seasons so filled with the presence of her Saviour, that in much tenderness of spirit she praised His holy Name for His wonderful love to her soul, and for such great condescension to one so unworthy as she felt herself to be, saying, "These are tears of joy." Her illness was marked with an unshaken faith in her Redeemer, saying at one time, "How can any one distrust Him who has taken me into His enclosure, and prepared, and cleansed for His kingdom. It would be sinful for me to have one doubt; which I have not had." Being naturally of a social disposition, she was interested in passing events, but did not care to dwell long upon them, saying "I would rather settle back to heavenly things; these are more than anything of earth." "How many precious seasons I have had in the night when I could not sleep;" "and each day brings new mercies." She was frequently engaged in supplication for her family; and at times for others; and seemed to have a work from season to season by way of counsel or encouragement to those who mingled with her. As her own sufferings increased, she petitioned for strength and patience to hold out to the end, expressing her full readiness and even longing to go, yet always coupled with "Not my will, but Thine be done;" or "Thou knowest best, dearest Lord;" "Thy time will be the right time." Being in deep pain, she said, "Take me, take me dearest Father, for Thou knowest I am ready." Many were the expressions that fell from her lips from time to time, evidencing to those about her the peaceful state of her mind, and that the Supporting Arms were underneath to the close; when she quietly passed away; and we reverently believe was admitted through the Pearl Gates into that city which has no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it: for the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof.

—, at the same place, the 30th of Seventh Mo., 1886, ANNA, daughter of Jesse and Rebecca H. Meckel, in her 16th year. Being in delicate health, she evinced at times a tenderness of spirit, and though the summons to her was sudden, we can but trust she was safely gathered.

—, at her late residence, in Philadelphia, on the 12th of Eighth Mo., 1886, SIDNEY POTTS, widow of Joseph K. Potts, aged 87 years, a member of Western District Monthly Meeting.

Eleventh Mo. 6th, 1836. In company with mother and brother J., went to the city and attended their evening meeting. There was a large collection of people. The upper seats were filled with many dear Friends; all of whom sat as with their lips sealed, except our friend E. Evans, who supplicated on our behalf; wherein all states seemed brought into view, even to the weakest who had no more to offer, than the poor widow formerly which the Lord was pleased more to own, than they who cast in of their abundance. Then on behalf of the precious lambs, craving that He would feed them with that which will be as nourishment to their poor souls, &c. A solemn covering prevailed, under which the meeting closed. The next morning attended the Quarterly Meeting; the first part of which was held in silence. The last was an interesting and instructive season; much weighty and excellent advice being given by E. E. and others, on the subject of "love and unity;" also the neglect of the attendance of our meetings, encouraging to visit and labor with such, also to visit not only the delinquent ones but those who were confined at home with sickness or infirmity, shut up as it were in their prison-houses. Saying that if we lived under a right feeling, we would be drawn toward such. She feared there was too much of a caring exclusively for ourselves and our own immediate families. Were there only as much care in the discharge of our religious obligations as is shown to our outward concerns, what a different people should we be! It seemed as though each one was endeavoring to excel in neatness and niceness; every thing kept in the most exact order as to outward concerns, so much so that it seemed to her, she could almost see inscribed on some door posts, "This is my home forever and ever." How awakening was her call to such as were using lawful things in an unlawful manner! She feared the day was approaching to some, if there was not a change, when the language would go forth, "Let Ephraim alone for he hath joined himself to idols." E. Pitfield followed in solemn supplication. The business throughout was conducted in much harmony. Never more precious did the order of Society, and the ever blessed Truth appear to me. Did we only live up to it as we ought, what glorious meetings should we have!

the young people, some in an especial manner, who were ready to cast away the little shield of faith. He warned us not to take our flight in the winter season, neither on the Sabbath day; continued against an unbelieving spirit, such as doubting whether they had ever been visited by the Holy Spirit, and whether such and such a thing was required! If this was indulged in, said he, by and by we should be left to ourselves, and the precious visitations of a Saviour's love would be withdrawn. O, how he labored for the help and restoration of these! May I seek Best Help, to withstand that busy enemy, who is seeking to cast down and destroy.

Twelfth Mo. 4th. Went to meeting this morning with a heavy heart. But how shall I sufficiently return thanks for the favor of this day! My hard heart was unexpectedly broken in upon and made to overflow, under a sense of the Lord's mercy still extended. May I keep close to my dear Master.

8th and 11th. Preserve me, O Heavenly Father! from a spiritual death.

18th. On first taking my seat in meeting this morning, a precious feeling overspread. But for want of keeping on the "watch," clouds of darkness surrounded; through which not a sigh could ascend. I was led to bemoan my situation; and, like Job, to take a view of days past, when good meetings and good seasons were oftener known by me. I can say, there is nothing I enjoy more than a good meeting. Fear I have not prized and sufficiently improved past favors, or I should not now be so often left; and experience such great desertion. A little comforted this afternoon in reading in S. Grubb, of the low places she was let into.

29th. Our Monthly Meeting held at Gwynedd. We had the company of our dear friend, Alice Knight, from Frankford. She has a minute to visit the families composing our Monthly Meeting. The company and labors of this dear friend were truly strengthening and encouraging. She revived in our first meeting, "They that wait on the Lord shall renew their strength," &c., and spoke of the many precious promises of the dear Master, which remain sure. She had a word of tender encouragement for the young people. May they and we profit thereby. Ezra followed with, "The spirit and the bride say, come," and "Let him that heareth say, come," &c. All were invited, and to all the call is extended. Those who are truly united to Jesus, are willing to leave all, yea, houses or brethren, wife or children, for his sake. And their reward even in this life is an hundred fold, and in that which is to come, life everlasting.

First Mo. 1st, 1837. It seems as though it could not be that another year has run its course! How many during it, have been summoned from time to a never-ending eternity! Very many of my friends and acquaintances, have been called hence; and I yet spared! Has it not been that I may work out the salvation of my poor soul! which is not in readiness to appear before the Judge of quick and dead. May I be more alive to this all-important subject; and while health and strength are afforded, be found diligent in begging of Him who alone can, so to strengthen, that when the summons comes, it may not find me unprepared.

First-day evening. This evening our friends A. Knight and E. Comfort, had a sitting in our family. Both were much favored; particularly dear A. Her gift is small; and how precious was it to see her care not to exceed it. There is something very instructive to me, attending the ministry of those who have small gifts, when they are willing to abide in the littleness, and hand forth just what the dear Master gives. After a precious stillness, Alice called our attention to the words of Paul: "For unto you it is given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on Him, but also to suffer for his name's sake;" upon which she instructively enlarged. She seemed much concerned on behalf of the younger part of our company; fearing there was a holding back in some of us, not being willing to part with all the dear Master was calling for. Ezra, also, was much exercised for some of us in a particular manner. He believed it had been shown unto us very clearly, what was called for; but there was not a willingness to part with all, but rather an endeavor to serve two masters—themselves and their Heavenly Father too. This, we were plainly told, would not do, and that we could make no advancement in the good way, till a full surrender was made. He feared there were some of us, who were standing in the way of others; such as would not enter the kingdom, nor suffer those that would. Said if there only was a yielding up, we would be blessed in basket and in store; and that there were those present who would be made preachers of righteousness, and pillars in the Lord's house to go no more out. He called our attention, also, to the uncertainty of life.

12th and 15th. Fifth and First-day meetings. The former a season wherein self was much humbled and brought down. Am sensible I have not arrived at that state of humility which so helps to make the true Christian. There is so much in me to be humbled and laid low, that at times it seems to me, nothing short of the hand of my Heavenly Father being laid heavily upon me, will make me what I ought to be. How apt are we to forget, when surrounded with every blessing and things pass on in a smooth course, that here we have no continuing city! How I crave for myself and my young friends, that we may bear this in mind; for if not, I fear a day of trial will overtake us. My feelings during our little meeting this morning, were those of great strippedness; causing me to feel sorrowful in that the little time set apart for the solemn purpose of worship, should, in a manner, be lost.

Second Mo. 3rd. Attended yesterday our Monthly Meeting; the forepart of which was held in silence; yet to me a season of instruction. How exceedingly precious I felt it to be, that of true silent waiting upon the Lord! though I know I am far from attaining this state, yet I believe a little foretaste has been given, which causes an hungering and thirsting after more. And does not the promise still remain, that those that "wait on the Lord, shall renew their strength?" and "those that hunger and thirst, shall be filled?" Nevertheless, it feels as though it could hardly be, that those precious promises can belong to one so poor as self! Were I dealt with according to my deserts, should not merit the very least of His favors; but thus it is, we are cared for by Him who regards the poor of his flock. It seems to me that we children, or at least my poor self, were living too much in forgetfulness of the many kind bounties received. Be pleased, O Heavenly Father! to make us what we ought to be. Let us not live to dishonor Thee, or our dear parents, whose prayers, I believe, have oftentimes been put up for our preservation. How I feel for our dear mother! she being yet, in the ordering of a kind Providence, spared to us. May we improve the blessing, and be the means of smoothing her declining years, and not in anywise bring down her gray hairs with sorrow to the grave, or great will our condemnation be.

For "The Friend."

A Trip to the Saguenay.

LETTER NO. 1.

Saratoga, Seventh Mo. 29th, 1886.

Dear Friend: Not having been asked to resign as one of thy correspondents for "The Friend" when in distant parts, I venture to report at this point on my trip for this year's vacation to the wild scenery and mountain and sea air of the Saguenay River.

Leaving Philadelphia about noon yesterday, with my wife and niece, our course in the afternoon lay along the west shore of the ever beautiful Hudson, the scenery of whose Highlands and water sheets, is a feast of which the eye does not easily tire, or the mind grow weary in contemplating. The commerce of the river is very great, and the numerous steamboats with their many passengers, and the homely transports of the canal traffic give an air of life and utility to the changing scenes as the train swiftly speeds on its way. We reached this place late in the evening as an abiding place for the night; but the hours kept are not those of country towns, and the place was full of life and brilliant with electric lights. Many of the hotels were entertaining their guests with music on the piazzas, and it was painful to realize that so many of the intelligent of the country are willing to give so much of their time and attention to so profitless a mental food as music. Music is a growing evil to the American people, the ill effects of which are shown more and more to the observer year by year.

The hotels of this place are noted for their size and the extravagance of their appointment, the dining-room of one of them, we were told, will seat from 1400 to 1500 guests. Besides the few large and fashionable ones, there are many small ones, and moderate boarding houses, accommodating the 9,000 transient residents, according to their tastes.

The original attraction of the place, as is well known, was the medicinal properties of the springs, or more properly speaking, the artesian wells of Saratoga.

It has been supposed that an ancient ocean spread over this part of the globe, whose waters, in whole or in part, deposited their solid portions on the bed and disappeared. Convulsions of the crust of the earth afterwards took place, and still further changes occurred, the ocean bed subsiding, and being now beneath the rock and present surface, and the mountains of the Kavaderosacc range on the west appearing above the surface. It is further supposed that the rainfall on the higher grounds around Saratoga, now finds its way through the crevices of the rock to the ancient ocean bed beneath, where it absorbs certain of the solid portions and becomes charged with carbonic acid, to which is due the effervescent properties of the springs. And thus we find, upon boring through the rock, a bubbling seething fountain of saline waters, of great service in some of the ills that flesh is heir to, and a boon to the afflicted.

Great numbers of invalids frequent the springs for the waters, and the early morning hours are interesting seasons to watch the callers; all classes patronize them, the wealthy and the ragged, the cultured and the ignorant—the well, as well as the sick—the former as an invigorator rather than a medicine.

The depths of the borings vary from about 100 feet to 300 and over, and the force of the stream sometimes spouts it to considerable height, but at other wells the dipper must be used to reach the waters. The amount of these waters annually consumed must be enormous, as the shipments to distant parts are very heavy; but the supply seems inexhaustible. Chloride of sodium predominate among the records of the analysis, and then follows a long list of bromides and chlorides which the chemist generally writes down, and perhaps finds, as a result of his labors.

There is quite a difference in the amount of solids in the different springs, although not far distant from each other, and the calcareous deposit of the water varies accordingly, and so of the diseases for which each is prescribed.

The chemist can imitate these waters by adding their various constituents, but nature's subtle principle of combination and harmony is wanting in the mixture.

Besides the fashions and follies of the place, which draw the butterflies of society, and besides the healing waters sought by the invalids, there are attractions at times to the scientific and the lover of useful pursuits. Saratoga is of late years the meeting place of Scientific Societies, Banking Circles, Trade and Commerce Associations, Educational Institutions and the like, and much useful knowledge may be obtained at their Sessions and Lectures through the season.

The Summer School of Methods is now in session, and has attracted some hundreds of teachers from all parts of the country, including several of our friends of that important calling; and we gave an hour to one of the Lectures on the subject of thinking, and how the human mind generally reaches its conclusions and opinions. Probably most of the audience heard little but what they had thought on before, but the subject was treated with perspicuity, and held its interest to the close.

A ride of two hours compassed the principal springs of the place,—a few of which were outside the city. The country for most of the region around, presents but little in the way of pretty or striking scenery. There are many fine houses of the wealthy, and we rode through the grounds of Judge Hilton's park of 800 acres, with its good roads and handsome houses, and pretty lawns. The ground has been stony and light in soil, but expense with lavish hand has wrought a great change, and the views from the residences are about the only fine ones to be seen around Saratoga.

It is always easier to grumble at an abuse than to bear one's own share of the labor necessary to get rid of the abuse.

A Testimony of Lewes and Chichester Monthly Meeting concerning DANIEL PRYOR HACK, a Minister, deceased.

In the death of our dear friend, Daniel Pryor Hack, we have lost a beloved and venerated pastor, who for upwards of sixty years fed the flock of Christ in these parts. But deeply as his loss is felt amongst us, sorrow is not the uppermost feeling; much rather do we rejoice that he has entered into his eternal rest; and give thanks for the grace which was bestowed on him, manifesting to us how the Lord is able, now as ever, to save and keep and sanctify his believing and obedient children.

This grace began to work as the mind of our dear friend unfolded. Visiting when a child his grand-parents at Hertford, he loved to go apart, whilst others were at play, to read the little books which his grandmother, Mary Pryor, lent him; and at school, whether he went before he was ten years old, he used to talk of heavenly things with the little boys who slept in his room.

At thirteen and a half he went as an apprentice to Chelmsford. The words of Christian sympathy of the Friend who visited him on the receipt of his certificate were a great help to him; and when he was little more than fourteen, he wrote:—"O that I may be concerned rightly to bow myself in humble reverence, and to petition for aid from the Almighty to serve Him truly!"

At nineteen he was drawn for the local militia, and refusing to serve, or to pay the fine imposed, he was with some other young Friends committed to jail for a month. Treated with all the consideration a prison permitted, his affectionate heart still felt keenly the separation from his friends and the loss of liberty; and the first evening he was much cast down. Soon, however, peace returned; and when he heard the watchman on his round cry, "All's well," his heart responded, "Yes, all is well." He received comforting visits from various Friends on their way to and from the Yearly Meeting; and he himself made calls of sympathy on the prisoners, two of whom were under sentence of death for sheep-stealing.

Just before the termination of his apprenticeship he received a "family visit" from Susannah Nash and Priscilla Hannah Gurney; two portions of Scripture which they quoted were often recurred to by him through life:—"Lord, I have loved the habitation of thy house and the place where thine honor dwelleth;" and "Did not our hearts burn within us, as He talked with us by the way?"

In 1815 he returned home to Brighton to assist his father in business, which he did with ability and diligence. He afterwards became a partner; but in 1827, disapproving of some departments of the business, he relinquished his share in it, and, receiving some addition to his income from other sources, he never carried out his intention of entering into commercial life elsewhere.

He had been already recorded a minister by our Monthly Meeting in 1823, on the same day as his beloved friend Grover Kemp.

In his religious services away from home, extending to nearly (if not quite) every meeting of Friends in the United Kingdom, he was frequently joined by his beloved wife, whose entire sympathy and excellent judgment were very helpful to him, especially in times of physical weakness, and of spiritual conflict by which he was often brought very low. The pastoral care which they exercised for so many years was not confined to their own Quarterly Meeting; and their solicitude for the religious and temporal welfare of a large circle of friends was greatly blessed, and was repaid with no common degree of confidence and love.

In the frequent calls made by Daniel Pryor and Eliza Hack on Friends visiting Brighton, as well as on residents, social courtesy often led to religious sympathy and communion. Especially to be noted was the timeliness of these and other similar visits, due not only to a delicate consideration, but still more to a watchfulness of spirit for the pointing of the Divine finger.

We give thanks to God when we call to mind the abounding love which dwelt in the heart of our dear friend, the reverent sweetness and humility of his spirit, his courtesy, hospitality and charity. Nor must we omit to mention his delight in the Holy Scriptures, and in other writings in which Christ is exalted and the work of the Holy Spirit magnified. Although full of gentleness and meekness, he was bold in his Master's cause, and inflexible wherever Christian truth was concerned. The well-being of our Society was intensely dear to him. Any interruption of brotherly love, or inconsistent conduct of any kind, deeply grieved him. But his sympathy with his fellow-men was not confined to our community; he took an active part in the philanthropic work of his own town, and in the national movements for the temporal and moral progress of his fellow-men.

Although numbering so many years, our dear friend had to contend with physical infirmity throughout early and middle life. In one of the few memoranda he has left of his religious experience, he writes (in 1856):—"Feeling the uncertainty of my continuance here, I am desirous of recording that I have nothing but unmerited mercy to trust to; but I do reverently and humbly trust that notwithstanding all my shortcomings and backslidings, which have indeed been very many, so that I feel I am not worthy of the least of all the Lord's mercies, He who was pleased in marvellous condescension to visit me in early life, and has watched over the seed sown in my heart through all the vicissitudes attendant on my pilgrimage, and enabled me (as I cannot doubt) to bring forth some fruit, however small, to his praise,—will not now cast me off, but will through his unbounded love and mercy in Christ Jesus, my adorable Saviour, forgive all my sins and complete his own work in me."

In prayer and preaching he was frequent and fervent, and so continued to the end, his offerings after he reached his ninetieth year being as lively and instructive as at any previous time. He was able to attend his meeting for worship nearly to the close. Three weeks before he died he spoke with much freshness, saying he had a message of cheer for such as were "going heavily on their way, because of the oppression of the enemy," and inviting all who were undecided to make their choice for Christ.

The last illness continued about a week. It was accompanied with much bodily oppression and suffering. "To depart," he said, "and be with Christ would be far better;" yet it was his frequent prayer that he might be kept from impatience: "If it be Thy will, give me a little ease; if not, grant me strength to bear it. His affection towards his family, who were with him, was tender in the extreme, and he desired his love to be given to all his friends, saying: "It goes out to all the world. I want all my dear friends to be brought to the Saviour, and to have their whole trust placed in Him that He may be their all in all. I feel it most precious—the atoning sacrifice of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ for the sins of the world. We must not limit Him and his work in the hearts of the children of men; when they come to Him, He brings them to the state of little children. We must not reason." When near the close he was heard to say, "All is peace; all is joy; let me go; glory! glory! He will be with me through a never-ending eternity. Dear, dear Lord! Lord Jesus!" These were nearly his last words. He entered into rest on First-day morning, the 7th of Third Month, 1886, aged ninety-one years and five months.

His remains were interred at Blackrock on the 11th, in the presence of a large company of sorrowing yet praising survivors; after which a meeting of worship and thanksgiving was held at the meeting-house, Brighton.

Pharaoh's Palace in Tahpanhes.

W. M. Flinders Petrie, the explorer and the discoverer of Naukratis, has been working for the last two months upon a large mound, or group of mounds, called Tell Defeneh, about twenty-five miles south of Port Said, and which Egyptologists and historians have long identified with the "Pelusiac Daphne" of the Greek writers, and the "Tahpanhes" of the Bible. Here, says the Times, he has discovered the ruins of that very palace to which, as recorded in the Book of the Prophet Jeremiah (chapter xliii), Johanan, the son of Kareah, followed by "all the captains of the forces," and "the remnant of Judah," brought the fugitive daughters of Zedekiah, then a dethroned and mutilated captive in Babylon. This flight of the Hebrew princesses took place about B. C. 585. Pharaoh received them with hospitality. To the mass of Jewish immigrants he granted tracts of land, while to the daughters of Zedekiah, his former ally, he assigned this royal residence, which the Bible calls "Pharaoh's house in Tahpanhes." W. M. Petrie's exploration has been so thoroughly carried out that not only the architectural structure of the building, but even its history has been rescued from oblivion. The building was first a stronghold, quadrangular, lofty, massive. It contained sixteen square chambers on each floor, both the outer walls and partition walls being of enormous strength. This stronghold was built by Psammetichus I, whose foundation deposits (consisting of libation vessels, corn rubbers, specimens of ores, model bricks, the bones of a sacrificial ox, and of a small bird, and a series of little tablets in gold, silver, lapis-lazuli, jasper, cornelian, and porcelain, engraved with the royal name and titles) have been discovered by W. M. Petrie under the four corners of the building. The name of the founder being thus determined, we at once know for what purpose the castle was erected. Having fought his way to the throne by means of a force of Carian and Ionian mercenaries, Psammetichus granted them a permanent settlement at "Daphne of Pelusium," where, according to Herodotus, they occupied two large camps, one on each side of the river. Here they continued to be quartered till Amasis, a later king of the same dynasty, transferred them to Memphis.

"The docks where their vessels were laid up and the ruins of their habitations," says Herodotus, "were still to be seen in my day at the place where they dwelt originally, before they were removed by Amasis." (Book II, chapter 154.)

Now this fortress, built by Psammetichus, probably about B. C. 665 or 666, stands in the midst of what was once a square courtyard, the whole being again enclosed within an immense walled area measuring 2000 feet in length, by 1000 feet in breadth. Some three or four acres of the enclosed soil have been turned over by W. M. Petrie's Arabs to a depth of six inches, and have yielded an extraordinary number of arrow heads, in bronze and iron, besides horses' bits, iron and bronze tools, fragments of iron grating, iron chains, etc.

A number of later structures have been added on against its outer walls, thus forming a curiously irregular ground plan and more than doubling the superficial extent of the original building.

What the excavations have disclosed is, however, still more curious. And here it is necessary to remember that the place is not merely a ruin, but a burnt ruin, the upper portions of which have fallen in and buried the basements. Furthermore, it was plundered, dismantled, and literally hacked to pieces before it was set on fire. It would be idle, under these circumstances, to hope for the discovery of objects of value among the ruins. Moreover it was only in the basement chambers, where things might have fallen through from above, or have been left in situ, that there seemed to be any prospect of "finds" for the explorer. Now, the basements were the offices, and some of these offices have been found intact under the superincumbent rubbish. There is certainly nothing very romantic in the discovery of a kitchen, a butler's pantry, and a scullery. Yet even these domestic arcana become interesting when they form part of an ancient Egyptian palace of 2552 years ago. The kitchen of "Pharaoh's house in Tahpanhes" is a big room with recesses in the thickness of the walls, which served for dressers. Here some fourteen large jars and two large flat dishes were standing in their places, unharmed amid the general destruction. A pair of stone corn-rubbers, a large iron knife, various weights, and three small flat iron pokers—or possibly spits—were also found in this room. The butler's pantry, it need scarcely be said, was the room to which wine jars were brought from the cellars to be opened. It contained no amphore, but hundreds of jar-lids and plaster amphore stoppers, some stamped with the royal ovals of Psammetichus, and some with those of Necho, his successor. Here, also, was found a pot of resin. The empty amphore, with quantities of other pottery, mostly broken, were piled in a kind of rubbish depot close by. Some of these amphore have the lute-shaped hieroglyph signifying "nefer" (good) scrawled three times in ink upon the side. Most curious of all, however, is a small room evidently sacred to the scullery maid. It contains a recess with a sink; a built bench to stand things upon; and recesses in the wall by way of shelves, in which to place what has been washed up. "The sink," writes W. M. Petrie, "is formed of a large jar with the bottom knocked out, and filled with broken potsherds placed on edge. The water ran through this, and thence into more broken pots below, placed one in another, all bottomless, going down to the clean sand some four or five feet below." The potsherds in this sink were covered with organic matter, and clogged with fish bones.

In other chambers there have been found large quantities of early Greek vases ranging from B. C. 550 to B. C. 600. A sword-handle with a wide curved guard, some scale armor, bronze rings, amulets, beads, seals, small brass vessels, and other minor objects of interest have also turned up, and two rings engraved with the titles of a priest of Amen. Some small tablets inscribed with the name of Amasis (Ahmes II), and a large bronze seal of Apries (Hophra) are important, inasmuch as they complete the name-links in the historic chain of the 26th Dynasty. Apries brings us to B. C. 591-570, and to the time of the flight of the daughters of Zedekiah. It may be that the Egyptian monarch added on some of the latter external chambers for the accommodation of their suite; "for all the captains of the forces," all the nobles, and priests, and merchants of Judea were among the immigrant multitude. With them, also, sorely against his will and judgment, came the prophet Jeremiah, whose first act on arriving at Tahpanhes was to foretell the pursuit of the Babylonian host:

"Then came the word of the Lord unto Jeremiah in Tahpanhes, saying, Take great stones in thine hand, and hide them in mortar in the brickwork, which is at the entry of Pharaoh's house in Tahpanhes, in the sight of the men of Judah; and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, the God of Israel: Behold I will send and take Nebuchadnezzar the King of Babylon, my servant, and will set his throne upon these stones that I have hid; and he shall spread his royal pavilion over them. And he shall come, and shall smite the land of Egypt; such as are for death shall be given to death, and such as are for captivity to captivity, and such as are for the sword to the sword." Jeremiah xliii: 8, 9, 10, 11.

W. M. Petrie writes: "Outside the buildings, I find by repeated trenchings an area of continuous brickwork resting on sand, about 100 ft. by 60 ft., facing the entrance to the latter buildings at the east corner. The roadway ran up to a recess between the buildings and this platform. The platform has no trace of chambers, and seems to be an open-air place for out-door purposes, such as loading goods, arranging things, etc.; just such a place as is needed for business, and such as even poor villagers make before their houses, levelling a smooth hard bed of mud, which they keep clean swept. It is curious how exactly this answers to the brick area, 'at the entry of Pharaoh's house in Tahpanhes,' and it would be exactly the place where Nebuchadnezzar would 'spread his royal pavilion.' The rains have washed away this area and denuded the surface, so that, although it is two or three feet thick near the palace, it is reduced in greater part to a few inches, and is altogether gone at the north-west corner."

To identify Jeremiah's stones (unless he had first inscribed them, which is unlikely) would of course be impossible. Yet W. M. Petrie has looked for them diligently, and turned up the brickwork in every part. Some unheven stones have indeed been dug out from below the surface, but whether those placed there by Jeremiah cannot be told.—Selected.

"He Goeth before Them."—This is a sight which may still be seen in the East. With us sheep are driven; with the Orientals they are led. The shepherd goes on before, and the sheep follow after, much as dogs follow their master in the West, but without the briskness and vigor of dogs. It is not unusual to see the shepherd leading the sheep thus, and at the same time carrying upon his shoulder some tender youngling of the flock.

"It is a sorrowful thing to see the eternal truth, that Christ is the Head of the Church, laid aside; and we claim that it is practically laid aside when a pre-arranged order of service is the custom in a meeting. It is certain that to set a pastor over a meeting is to usurp authority on the human side, and that it inevitably tends to hamper the free exercise of spiritual gifts."—Interchange.

LOVELINESS.

"Beautiful thoughts make a beautiful soul, and a beautiful soul makes a beautiful face."

Once I knew a little girl,
Very plain,
You might try her hair to curl,
All in vain;
On her cheek no tint of rose
Paled and blushed, or sought repose!
She was plain.

But the thoughts that through her brain
Came and went
As a recompense for pain
Angels sent;
So full many a beautiful thing,
In the young soul blossoming,
Gave content.

Every thought was full of grace,
Pure and true;
And in time the homely face
Lovelier grew;
With a heavenly radiance bright,
From the soul's reflected light
Shining through.

Shall I tell you, little child,
Plain or poor,
If your thoughts are undefiled,
You are sure
Of the loveliness of worth;
And this beauty, not of earth,
Will endure.

"THE NIGHT COMETH."

BY EMMA C. DOWD.

An angel passed through a busy street,
His step was swift and his smile was sweet;
And he sped in the path of the rising sun,
Saying, softly, "The day is begun,
The night cometh."

He met a child who laughed and ran,
Chasing the butterflies with her fan,
A circlet of lilies, white and fair,
Crowning her wavy yellow hair;
And, stooping, he asked, in a gentle tone,
"Do you love the Master, my little one?"
She raised her beautiful, sunlit head,—
"I am one of his little lambs," she said;
"Then do," said the angel, "as He commands;
Your work is ready, it waits your hands!"
The child made answer, "I'll not forget,
I shall do my work ere the sun has set;
But 'tis going to be such a long, long day;
It is morning now, and I want to play!"

The angel watched her in sad surprise,
As she flitted away with the butterflies;
And he sped in the path of the rising sun,
Whispering soft, "Will the work be done?
The night cometh."

An hour flew by, and the child lay dead,
A stain on the beautiful, sunlit head,
A stain which the lilies could not hide,
Though they spread their waxen petals wide;
And the weepers heard, in a voice divine,
Like the solemn moan of a wind-stirred pine,
"The night cometh!"

The angel passed through the busy street,
And met a man with hurrying feet;
"Stay," he cried; "are you one of those Who love the Master and hate his foes?"
"Oh, yes!" he replied; "my name is enrolled In the books of the church. I am safe in the fold."

"Then do," said the angel, "as He commands;
Your work is ready, it waits your hands!"
"Good sir," said the man, "I shall do my work
All in good season, I'm never a shirk;
Just now I am busy, as you must see,
But some time—yes, some time—I hope to be free
To work for the Master; I'm still in my prime,
With life before me,—there's plenty of time!"

The angel watched him, speeding along
With a troubled brow through the jostling throng;
And he followed the path of the setting sun,
Whispering soft, "Will the work be done?
The night cometh."

The years rolled on. Through a city street
A man walked slowly, with tottering feet;
His form was bent and his face was old,
And his heart was as hard as his silver and gold;
But he seemed to hear, like a mournful rhyme,
"Life is before me, there's plenty of time!"
And those who were nearest him heard him say:
"It is growing dark,—I have lost the day!
The night cometh!"

S. S. Times.

Waiting upon God.

This duty does not, we fear, receive the attention it deserves and demands. The great activity which of itself is so commendable a feature in the religious life of our day, yet carries with it a grave tendency to push into the background those quieter soul-exercises that nourish the inner life. Traces of this may be seen in our public services, but it is in the sphere of private devotion that the neglect is more likely to prevail, and it is here also that its operation is most to be dreaded. Not that we think the exercises of the closet are altogether ignored, but often, we believe, they are so circumscribed and hemmed in by the pressure of other duties that no adequate time is left for true "waiting upon God." During the brief interval spent alone, the soul has no time to divest itself of the pre-occupations and cares that go with it even into the Divine presence. And thus many come and go from the closet as worshippers in the outer court only, without having entered the holy of holies, where to the anointed eye the King reveals His beauty, and where, in the sacred stillness, His still small voice falls upon the opened ear. The loss to those who fail to gain this close access to and undistracted waiting upon God is so great and irreparable that we do not hesitate to say that time should be found for it at all costs. In very few cases will this necessitate any abatement of service; the time required will usually be found in other directions, but if need be even Christian work must give place to the claims of Divine communion. The time abstracted from the closet will prove a dearly bought gain for which no amount of activity will ever be able to offer adequate compensation.

The importance of this exercise is seen in the prominence it receives in Scripture, and the blessings that are attached to it. "The Lord is good to them that wait for Him," "He worketh for him that waiteth for Him," bestowing a wealth of blessing, and imparting a fulness of Divine strength that transcend all human conception. These times of solitary waiting upon God become epochs in spiritual experience. It was when Jacob had sent his family and his possessions across the Jabbok and tarried behind alone, that there came out of the darkness One who wrestled with him, and "blessed him there." And having looked on the face of God, he was prepared to meet his brother. The biographies of the Old Testament concur in testifying that the men who waited on God in secret were the men who carried His presence with them in their public ministry, and had their witness sealed by manifestations of His almighty power.

Our Lord enforced the necessity of this quiet waiting in the most effective of all methods of instruction, by leaving us an example that we should follow in His steps. Not only did He seek the retirement of the olive shades, or the mountain side for His night-long communings with His Father, but once and again He paused in the midst of His work, even when it seemed most prosperous and successful, and leaving the thronging multitudes behind Him, sought the seclusion of the desert for solitary converse with God. If He found this necessary, and that at a time when life moved slowly and with even pace, how much more does the necessity bear upon us weak mortals, in an age when life rushes with frantic speed, and is full of ceaseless commotion and strife!

The Psalmist summed up the lessons and experiences of an eventful life in one emphatic conclusion when he exclaimed, "My soul, wait thou only upon God." We would with all possible earnestness reiterate his counsel. The living God is not fully known to many of His servants because they do not wait in silence till He can reveal Himself, and they have to go forth to their service in weakness, and with faltering testimony, because they lack the inspiration of His presence, and the authority of His direct commission. And for want of waiting on God many do not know themselves. It needs the light of His sacred presence to give self-discovery. Beneath His searching eye, and in the solemn stillness of His presence; the soul's gaze is diverted from outward things and turned in upon itself, and then illusions fade, and false estimates are dispelled. The soul awakened to a true perception of its own innate worthlessness, is stripped of all its self-trust and vain glory, and humbled in the dust. This becomes the prelude to blessing, for the prostrate soul is prepared to receive the fulness of grace and strength that God waits to bestow on those who wait on Him. For lack of this waiting on God, there are many busy workers who cannot discern between the impulses of fleshly zeal and the promptings of the Divine Spirit; but they who have learned to wait on God have also learned to wait for Him, and do not hastily run where He does not lead. "Wait on the Lord; be of good courage, and He shall strengthen thine heart: Wait, I say, on the Lord."—From the Reaper.

Faith-healing.

The Medical Record of Third Mo. 27th, contains an article, by Dr. J. H. Lloyd, which describes the efforts and results of a committee of the "Society for Psychological Research" in Philadelphia, to investigate the subject of faith-cure. The inquiries they made of those who profess to practise this method of healing disease were partially unanswered, from the natural aversion which such persons felt to expose to cavil and criticism that which in their eyes was clothed with a degree of sacredness. As one of them wrote: "I should as soon expose the sanctity of my homelife to the public eye, as the sacred work of God in human bodies to scientific criticism."

The individual cases which came under examination furnished little or no evidence of any curative power having been exerted, except by influences which have long been recognized in the medical profession.

An elaborate article on the same general subject in the Century Magazine for the Sixth Month, written by J. M. Buckley, a Methodist minister, brings to notice the remarkable physical effects produced by "Mesmerism" or "animal magnetism;" the trances among the early Methodists and other religious bodies; the cures of Dr. Newton, those performed by Prince Hohenlohe, Father Matthew, and at various shrines of the Greek and Roman Catholic Churches,—such as Knock Chapel in Ireland, and at Lourdes in France; the curing of King's evil by the touch of royal hands; the cures that have followed the incantations and superstitious rites of medicine-men in heathen communities; and those effected by Mormon priests; many of which are equally remarkable and as well authenticated as those of the faith-cure establishments of the present day. The reality of many of these cures and effects, J. M. Buckley does not doubt, but he attributes them to the operation of natural causes, such as the influence on the nervous system produced by the concentration of the attention upon a part of the body, &c.

In illustration of his subject, he narrates the following case: "The daughter of an eminent clergyman in this city [New York] had been sick for a long time, entirely unable to move, and suffering intense pain. One of the most famous surgeons in New York declared, after a careful examination, that she had diseases of the breast-bone and ribs which would require incisions of so severe a character as to be horrible to contemplate. Three times the surgeon came with his implements to perform the operation, but the parents could not bring themselves to consent to it, and it was postponed. At last the late Dr. Krackowitzer was called in; he solemnly and very thoroughly examined her from head to foot, taking a long time, and at last suddenly exclaimed, 'Get out of bed, put on your clothes, and go down stairs and meet your mother in the parlor!' The young lady automatically arose and obeyed him. The next day she took a walk with her mother, and soon entirely recovered. Dr. Krackowitzer stated that he recognized in her an obstinate case of hysteria, which needed the stimulus of sudden command from a stronger will than her own. I received this narrative from the young lady's father; she has never had a relapse, and is still living in excellent health."

The conclusions which J. M. Buckley reaches are that the claims of Christian faith-healers to supernatural powers are discredited by three facts:

- (1). They can exhibit no supremacy over pagans, spiritualists, magnetizers, mind-curers, &c.
- (2). They cannot parallel the mighty works that Christ produced, or the works of the Apostles.
- (3). All that they really accomplish can be paralleled without assuming any supernatural cause."

The Scientific American, more than a year ago, contained some very sensible observations on faith-cures. It said: "It is not our purpose to deny or even to question, the verity of cures 'by faith.' The mind so acts on the body, and the brain plays so important a part in the nervous system, by which the whole organism is energized and controlled, both in regard to its functions and nutrition, that it is not only quite possible, but an absolute fact, that many maladies which are not so far advanced as to be dependent upon changes in structure, or 'organic diseases,' may be remedied by or through the agency of the mind. We will even go so far as to affirm that a very large proportion of the ailing might be, and probably would be, sound, if only they were sufficiently strongly impressed to believe themselves to be so. This influence of the mind on the body has been the stronghold of quackery from the earliest times, and 'faith' is as powerful an influence for good or evil now as it has ever been. Such 'miracles' as the Salvationists are working among the emotional classes, whether illiterate or well-informed, have uniformly signaled the commencement of a new era in religious enthusiasm. When the first enthusiasm subsides, 'miracles cease' of physico-mental necessity. The large class of so-called hysterical, cataleptic, and even epileptic affections are distinctly amenable to this influence; so are those nervous disturbances and derangements which consist wholly or chiefly in disorderly activity, as distinguished from actual disease. The mimetic maladies, of which there are always a very large number of cases, are, of course, amenable to the curative influence of faith. Outside of these classes, however, stand a multitude of badly managed or misunderstood cases which only need to be placed on a new footing—it matters little what—to get well.

"There is not a word to be said against 'healing by faith.' Every busy practitioner has cases under his observation that he would be heartily glad to find so powerfully affected that they can be cured even by this agency. Of course, it is true that many of the poor people who are reported to be 'cured' are actually benefited, and by their faith. This is a fact, and there is no sort of reason why the benefits received should not be permanent. If the subjects of these cures are thankful to the Giver of all good, that is not a matter to make merry about. It is as it should be."

It is very certain that the same Divine Power which enabled Apostles of old to effect miraculous cures, can enable the servants of the Lord to perform similar wonders in this day. I know of no good reason for discrediting such an experience as that of Thomas Story, who relates that on returning from a journey, "I went home to my father's house in the evening; and having taken much cold, so that I was hoarse, I spoke with difficulty when I went into the house; yet through a very sensible operation of the Divine Truth, and the healing virtue thereof, under which I sat in silence for about half an hour, I was perfectly healed; by which I was forever confirmed in the belief of the miracles of Christ recorded in Holy Scripture." The Lord's hand is not shortened that He cannot save, neither is his ear grown heavy that He cannot hear." It still remains both a privilege and a duty to present our cause to Him, in times of affliction as well as in all the other exigencies of life. But as man knows not what he should pray for, except as he is taught by the Holy Spirit, and as all petitions should be in submission to the Divine will, it is unreasonable for him in a general way to assume, that specific requests for restoration to health will be granted, in the manner in which he may desire.

The Massoretic text is the name given to the punctuated and vocalized text found in ordinary Hebrew Bibles. It is so called because it represents the completed labors of the Massorettes or Traditionalists, whose labors began in obscurity, but the results of which were committed to writing between the sixth and ninth centuries of the Christian era. Like other early Semitic writings, the Old Testament was originally written without vowels, and without breaks between separate words. This led frequently to ambiguity, and the labors of the Massorettes were directed to fix immutably the meaning of the sacred text, by supplying to each word its appropriate vowel-marks. Unfortunately, the Massorettes were but poorly supplied as textual critics. The text now found in Hebrew Bibles represents only a single line of descent, while the ancient versions have been made from texts showing in many cases readings at variance with those of the present text. Many scholars believe that a large proportion of the divergent readings which can be inferred from the ancient versions represent a purer text than the present Massoretic text; and such scholars claim that these divergent readings shall receive due attention in any attempt to fix what was, in any particular case, the actual reading of the Hebrew Scriptures.—S. S. Times.

Natural History, Science, &c.

The Purification of Sewage.—Col. Waring, in an article in the American Architect, says that sewage as such is not taken up by crops, until after its organic character has been destroyed by a process of putrefactive fermentation. This is effected through the agency of bacteria, which abound in fertile soil near the surface of the ground; and it requires the presence of air. Under natural conditions this organic destruction takes place only near the surface, probably nine-tenths of it within the first six inches, and practically not at all below a depth of twelve inches. These remarks point out the importance of avoiding cess-pools, and other arrangements by which sewage is removed from the purifying action of the air and soil—all of which tend to corrupt the underground streams and thus prepare a supply of typhoid and other diseases for those who use their water.

The English Colonial and Indian Exhibition.—Besides the art courts, there are other courts illustrating the raw products and rough manufactures of the country, which are scarcely less interesting—filled with varied timbers and bamboos, fibre, cotton, coffee, rice, oil-seeds, etc. Then the ethnological department has a surpassing interest with its modeled groups of the less known inhabitants of India and the countries closely adjacent—the Andamanese and inhabitants of the Nicobar islands, the Karens of Burmah, the Singphos, Mishmis, Nagas, and others. Nor is the animal life of India left unrepresented, for a huge jungle trophy has been arranged, with the great game in their natural haunts presented with life-like force; and close by is the hunting trophy of Kutch Behar, in which an elephant, preceding the beaters, has come upon several tigers, one of which he has cast prone into the grass, while the other has sprung upon him with a terrible grip. Meanwhile the jungle fowl are flying away from the scene of conflict, and the monkeys in the trees are making haste to depart. To arrange these trophies great numbers of animal's skins have been brought from India, with jungle-grasses, bamboos, trees and many wild natural products.—The American.

The Nettle.—A Belgian botanist named Gravis has published a work on the anatomy and physiology of the Stinging Nettle, of 250 quarto pages, profusely illustrated. He feels that there is yet much to learn about the plant, and that even "the patient study of a long life would not exhaust all the knowledge that a stinging nettle is capable of affording."

Excavating the Sphinx.—The chief director of the department of antiquities in Egypt having suggested the excavation of the Sphinx from the sands which in the past 3000 years have accumulated around and partially buried it, funds have been subscribed for this purpose.

Heating by Flame.—At a meeting of the Gas Institute, London, Thomas Fletcher, gave an account of his recent researches into the heating power of flame by direct contact, and reproduced some of the experiments from which he deduced his results. He stated that in heating by flames applied to the bottom of a vessel full of water, there is a great loss of heat because the contained liquid keeps the bottom plate of the vessel at its own temperature, and, flame cannot be made to come into direct contact with a cold surface. He illustrated this by pasting a paper label on the bottom of the vessel before applying the flame, and on removing the flame the paper was not even scorched. His process was to use a vessel with a number of rods inserted through the bottom, one and one-half inches long and spreading out into a flat disc at the top, where in contact with the water, to give a greater heating surface. With the same gas jet and similar conditions the water in this was boiled in one minute fifty seconds against three minutes fifteen seconds for the vessel with an ordinary bottom. He mentioned his experiments on this principle with a larger size of boiler, and claimed that it would be possible to reduce the heating surface one-half in marine engines by its adoption. The principal difficulty was, he said, to insert these rods in boilers for high pressure without weakening them, but he hoped to surmount the difficulty by making use of transverse ridges, which would be rolled in the boiler iron, and would not seriously interfere with its strength.—The American.

To Obviate Sunstroke or Heatstroke.—London Lancet recommends ventilation, regular nutrition, light clothing, and, as far as possible, remission of the pressure of work. "Beer and other stimulants," it says, are hurtful rather than helpful, and the substitution of non-intoxicating cooling drinks for those beverages is a truly scientific and sanitary advance in public taste. Protection of the head is a subject which is well understood. It should not be forgotten that the neck, as well as the cranium, requires to be covered."

Ground Squirrels.—Most residents of the country are familiar with these pretty little striped squirrels, which run along the fences and in the woods. They are often termed Chipmunks, which is frequently shortened into "Chippy," the name by which I knew them in childhood. Their nests are placed in burrows excavated a number of feet under the earth, and lined with grass. About the middle of the Eighth Month, they commence to store up provisions for the winter, bringing quantities of corn in their cheek pouches, and later in the year, acorns and chestnuts, which are laid away in their burrows. Children sometimes dig up these stores, and rob the poor squirrels of the chestnuts which they have so industriously gathered.

C. C. Abbott thinks the ground squirrels give up their out-door life after the first heavy white frosts in the fall. On the 3d of Eleventh Month, he dug out one of their nests, and found in it four chipmunks very cozily fixed for winter, in a roomy compartment, and all of them thoroughly wide-awake. Their store of provisions was in a smaller room adjoining, and consisted of chestnuts and acorns. The shells of those they had eaten were all pushed into one of the passages, so that there might be no litter mingled with the soft materials that lined the nest. When the cold becomes more intense, they pass the time in a dormant condition, until awakened by the returning warmth of spring. A pair that were dug out in the Third Month were quite torpid, and apparently lifeless when first taken up in the hands, and did not become thoroughly lively until after several hours' warming.

The same pleasant writer describes the summer movements of a family that had taken up quarters under a stone wall near his house. On the 23d of Sixth Month, six young ones made their appearance about the wall. "Very frequently during that summer I was astrid at sunrise, and I always found that these chipmunks were already on the go; and throughout July, they appeared to do little but play in a very animated sort of way. They seemed to be playing at what children know as 'tag,'—i. e., they chased each other to and fro in a wild, madcap fashion, and tried to touch or catch one another, and sometimes to bite one another's tails. Occasionally the tail of some laggard gets a nip, and he gives a pitiful squeal, which starts them all to chattering. But however mad may be their galloping, let a hawk swoop down, or even pass over, and in a moment every one is motionless. If on a fence, they simply squat where they are: if on the ground, when an enemy is discovered they will dart to their nests with incredible swiftness. These creatures, during the summer, play merely for play's sake. Indeed, so far as I have studied animal life, this indulgence in play, just as children play, and for the same reasons, is common to all animals."

—Treatment of the Chinese.—The China Branch of the Evangelical Alliance has addressed, from Peking, a communication to the President of the United States, encouraging him to use his influence for the protection and proper treatment of the Chinese who are in this country. They urge this for three reasons:

1. The maintenance of the sacredness of treaty obligations in the eyes of the Chinese, who are well aware "that the Burlingame Treaty expressly guarantees to the Chinese in the United States, the same privileges as to residence and trade as are granted to the citizens of the most favored nations.

2. "Those principles of kindness, hospitality and justice, which belong to all mankind, and, being implanted in the natural conscience, are of universal obligation." "In view of the hatred and grievous wrongs experienced by their countrymen in the United States, what must be the estimate formed by the Chinese people of the humanity and justice of Christian nations? What the estimate of the effect produced by the teachings of the Christian sacred books?"

3. The danger to the lives and property of American and European residents in China. "It cannot be expected that Americans and Europeans should enjoy their present liberties, kind treatment, and official protection in China, while the Chinese in America are driven out of the country by ruthless mobs. It is not in human nature not to resent such injuries, and retaliate upon the people which inflicts them."

—Warlike Missionaries.—The Independent says, that the American Baptist Missionaries in Burmah have been active in enlisting their Karen converts, and procuring arms for them from the British government, to assist in the overthrow of the party which opposes the British occupation of that country, and who are known as Dacoits. The Dacoits are said to have attacked the native Christian Karens, who are inhabitants of the mountains, and without whose aid "it would be almost impossible for England to conquer and hold the country." The Dacoits are encouraged by their Buddhist priests; so that the war is partly of a religious nature, as well as political.

A "Christian" war with weapons designed for the destruction of life and limb, seems to us a confounding of light and darkness; and not to be reconciled with the mission of Him whose coming was announced with the angelic message, "Peace on earth, and good-will to men."

—Unity without Conformity.—The editor of the Christian Advocate quotes with approval the following extract from the sermon of an Episcopal minister: "Let any man, or any body of men, turn men from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God; let them make saints of sinners, and moral men of reprobates, and do it in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, 'both theirs and ours,' and though 'they follow not us,' we will say, with the Master, 'Forbid them not.'" And he further expresses the desire that the time may come, "when all genuine Christians shall so rejoice in the work done by each and all, that there will be an irresistible gravitation into two or three great bodies, which shall remain separate only because of radical differences of conception upon certain points, but shall maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace."

—Words Unfelt.—A correspondent of the S. S. Times speaks of how frequently it is the case that the words of the hymns sung in places of worship are "the words of an unknown speech," and remarks: "It sounds comical to hear an ordinary congregation of well-dressed, comfortable-looking people singing, 'Jesus, I the cross have taken, all to leave and follow thee.' Think of a woman with a silk gown on, and a stuffed bird in her hat, standing up and singing, 'Naked, poor, despised, forsaken, thou from hence my all shall be.'"

—The Ordinances.—The Christian Worker states that at Goshen Quarterly Meeting [a branch of the Ohio Binns' Body] a proposition was introduced "to forward to the Yearly Meeting a request to reaffirm the long-established views of Friends on the ordinances, as being both orthodox and scriptural; but there being a considerable expression in favor of toleration on this subject, it was dropped after a short discussion."

—Sugar Grove Suit.—The Star and Crown states that at a recent meeting of the Representative Yearly Meeting of Western Yearly Meeting [Larger Body], in reference to the suit for the possession of the meeting property at Sugar Grove, Hendricks Co., Ind., the meeting "was fully united as to the desirability of having the matter amicably adjusted and further litigation ended." A committee was appointed to have the matter in charge, and to make overtures looking to a final peaceable settlement of all matters in controversy.

Tell the Truth.—A boy twelve years old was the important witness in a lawsuit. One of the lawyers, after cross-questioning him severely, said, "Your father has been telling you how to testify, hasn't he?"

"Yes," said the boy.

"Now," said the lawyer, "just tell us how your father told you to testify."

"Well," said the boy modestly, "father told me the lawyers would try and tangle me in my testimony; but if I would just be careful and tell the truth I could tell the same thing every time."

and the knowledge of God grew, so I became as a counsellor of them that were tempted in like manner as I had been."

The late Thomas Kite, of Philadelphia, (of whom a Memoir has been published), was remarkably engaged in this line of service, as well as in the more public work of the ministry. Many were those, especially young people, over whom he watched with loving care, and whom he endeavored to instruct and encourage in the path of true dedication to the Lord, by his sympathy, advice and private ministry, as well as by the use of the pen.

And at the present time, do we not all know those on whom the Lord has laid a large measure of this concern, and whose loving care extends over many? and of whom it may truly be said that the Lord has given them a field of labor in this direction?

The extension of such care and oversight is one of the principal duties of the duly qualified Overseers of our meetings—officers who probably are designed to fill nearly the same position as the episcopoi (bishops) in the primitive church, for the literal meaning of episcopos is, one who watches over others.

But in the performance of this, as of every other religious duty, we must remember that it is the extension of Divine life and help which alone can make such labor spiritually useful. Those who are rightly exercised in such services, will be free to acknowledge, that unless they act under the fresh impulse of the love of God and concern for the welfare of others, their efforts will be flat and useless. We believe that no one of the Friends to whom reference has been made, as peculiarly drawn into such labors, ventured to enter upon them in their own time and way, but waited for the arising, on each occasion, of a renewed concern and feeling of duty. As they thus moved in the fear of the Lord, and in dependence upon his guidance and help, a blessing rested upon their labors.

This consideration seems to show that this form of religious labor (and the same is true of every other), cannot be made a matter of mere official duty, which a person must regularly perform as a thing of course, in order to comply with his part of an arrangement with others, who, in consideration of his service, undertake to provide for his maintenance. "The wind bloweth where it listeth"—the Spirit of the Lord moves on the hearts of his servants as it pleaseth Him,—and we cannot command its fresh influences.

The case is a still plainer one, when among the duties expected of such a "pastor" is that of preaching to the people. Whatever attempts may be made to reconcile the appointment of persons to salaried positions of this kind, with the doctrine of a free gospel ministry; and however plausible the plea that it is only extending the necessary assistance to those who already feel the concern, but have not other means to support themselves and families; such a step is a long stride into the system of paid ministry, with its attendant evils. It almost inevitably leads the preacher to prepare himself and speak to the people, even when there is no bubbling up of the pure spring of gospel ministry. And it as surely leads the people to depend on outward preaching, instead of gathering into that state of inward exercise and waiting on the Lord for instruction and help where his refreshing presence may be felt.

In the discussions over the "Home Mission" work in the late London Yearly Meeting, this tendency towards the establishment of a system of paid ministry was clearly pointed out, as one of the results of the operations of the committee in charge of Home Missions. It was stated that the grants of money in successive years had been £131, £694, £977, and £1,298; and that these figures showed very clearly the course on which they were embarked; and Friends were asked to consider "whether the uncasiness and difficulties caused by the work of the Committee, had not been greater than any good it had done."

Where the true ground of ministry is thus departed from, there is danger that the gift of discernment will be lost in the people, and the day come, spoken of by the Lord's prophet, when men call good evil, and evil good, and can no longer distinguish between that which serveth God, and that which serveth Him not.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The recent trial of anarchists at Chicago, has resulted in a verdict of guilty, with the penalty of death upon seven of the accused, and a sentence of 15 years' imprisonment upon another. Application has been made for a new trial.

The detailed report of the Agricultural Department on the condition of the growing crops says, that the returns for Eighth Month show an improvement in wheat in the Northwestern States, compared with the report for the Seventh Month. The harvest is two weeks earlier than usual, and the quality is unusually good, except in sections where heavy loss has occurred from blight. The general average condition of the wheat crop is placed at a fraction over 80. A heavy decline in the condition of the corn crop is reported, the average having been reduced from 95 to 81.

A great storm along the Gulf coast, on the 19th and 20th insts., did damage to the city of Galveston, Texas, to an amount estimated at $500,000. The wind blew with great violence, while the waters of the Gulf inundated the eastern and southern portions of the city to the depth of from one to seven feet. "A despatch of the 22d says: The beach and the adjacent portions of the city for several blocks back from the shore presented a deplorable scene of havoc and desolation as far as the eye could see. The ruins of hundreds of houses, large and small, had been hurled and twisted into every shape in the awful maelstrom that then prevailed. All pleasure resorts along the Gulf shore are either swept away or ruined." Great destruction of property has also been occasioned by it at Corpus Christi and other towns along the Texan coast, and in the neighboring country. It extended for 200 miles inland, destroying thousands of houses and involving a pecuniary loss of many millions. Thirty-eight lives are known to have been lost. Great suffering it is expected will ensue, particularly to the negroes, from the loss of crops and shelter.

The amount of new railroad constructed thus far in 1886, is reported to be 2655 miles, and the amount to the same date last year, 1472 miles.

In a recent address, T. V. Powderly, speaking on behalf of the Knights of Labor, denounced the rioting and violence carried on in the name of that organization, and said: "The Anarchists will never obtain a foothold in the Knights of Labor. Anarchy is destructive to civil liberty, and no honest workman can afford to identify himself with an organization which has for its object the destruction of life and property."

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 28, 1886.

In the editorial of last week, some reference was made to a demand that has been urged by one who still claim to be members of the Society of Friends, for the settlement and support of meetings—under our name—of persons as resident pastors. It is evident that these are to be looked upon as a kind of ministers, who are to preach to the people, when no other ministers are present; and, in some cases at least, are expected to spend their time in looking after the spiritual interests of those who may be considered as their flocks.

The Society of Friends has always recognized the importance of a watchful care over one another by its members, especially of the more experienced over those less advanced in religious growth and knowledge; and, indeed, the Holy scriptures often refer to this service. Very many are felt the concern which animated Stephen Crisp, one of its early and dignified members, who says: "The more I came to feel and perceive the love of God, and his goodness to flow forth upon me, the more was I humbled and bowed in my mind to serve Him, and to serve at least of his people among whom I walked. As the word of wisdom began to spring in me,

The receipts on the 23d were: Bees, 4000; sheep, 14,000; hogs, 5000.

FOREIGN.—The English Parliament convened on the 19th inst. Churchill, speaking on behalf of the Ministry said, "The Government had come to the conclusion that the adoption of coercive measures for Ireland would be unwise." Continuing, he said, "The Government intended to devote the recess to a careful consideration of the question of local government for all three kingdoms. They hoped that when Parliament reassembled in February, they would be prepared to submit definite proposals on that most important of all questions." In conclusion, he said that the Government took the verdict of the country in favor of maintaining the union as final and irrevocable. Upon that verdict they based their policy, and by that policy they, both as a Government and as a party, would stand or fall.

The British national debt amounted Third Month 31st, 1886, to $3,722,079,540. Deducting certain "loans recoverable," &c., the net debt is placed at $3,565,569,570.

Many evictions at Gweedore, in the district of Donegal, have lately taken place. The total amount of the rents concerned does not exceed 500 yearly. There were 150 policemen and bailiffs and 60 cars. Boats engaged for eleven days in the proceeding, and at a cost of £100 a day. "The scenes were pitiful, the people being steeped in poverty."

Rioting in Belfast has been checked, but occasional disorders have taken place within the past few days, and the military and police have been on guard. Much complaint has been made of the arbitrary action of the police.

Prince Alexander of Bulgaria, has abdicated the throne. A dispatch from Berlin states that, England having refused him active support against Russia, and Turkey being afraid to risk war in behalf of Bulgaria, and the Gastein meeting showing that the alliance was unbroken, his position was a hopeless one. After his abdication, Alexander was escorted over the frontier. The populace then adopted a resolution requesting the Czar of Russia to re-extend his sympathy to the Bulgarian people, and proceeded to the palace of the Russian agent, and submitted it to him, all kneeling. The agent assured them of the Czar's friendship, and a provisional government was formed. The garrison at Shumla refused to recognize the provisional government. This event has occasioned much surprise in Europe, and on account of the possible political complications involved, has awakened much excitement. The London Times observes: "The event must be regarded as a triumph of Russian diplomacy, and it is a very impressive event. It is also, in a less degree, a reverse for England's diplomacy. It is only too clear that the Marquis of Salisbury is confronted with all the dangers and difficulties in an aggravated form which he had to face on his first accession to power."

The Daily News says: "Alexander was nominally a vassal of the Sultan, and if it can be shown that he was deposed without the Sultan's consent, a grave international difficulty will at once be raised."

A dispatch from St. Petersburg says, that a passenger steamer plying on the river Volga, at Saratov, capital of the Province of Saratov, in Russia, was burned, on the 21st, and that two hundred lives were lost. The fire was caused by the fall of a hanging lamp while the passengers were in bed. Many of whom were drowned.

Advices from Yokohama to the 3d inst., state that the cholera is raging in Corea. In Keishodo alone 20,000 deaths are reported. The natives call the scourge a divine visitation, and refuse to give medical attention to those stricken with the disease.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOLS.

These schools, under the care of the three Monthly Meetings of Friends of Philadelphia, will re-open in the new School-house 140 N. 16th St., above Arch, on Second-day, Ninth Mo. 13th, 1886.

The departments for Boys and Girls respectively remain under the care of their former Principals, John H. Dillingham and Mary W. Woolman, who are assisted by a corps of competent instructors. Two vacancies in the Girls' Department have been filled by the appointment of Jane J. Wetherell and Mary Anna Jones, who it is believed will form valuable additions to the working staff.

The Boys' Primary Department, so long under the efficient care of Susanna House (now released on account of ill health) will be conducted by Elizabeth Warner. A Girls' Primary Department has been organized under the direction of Anna Yarnall, for some years an efficient teacher in the upper school.

The new School-house is well adapted for conducting a first class school; great care having been taken to provide all necessary comforts and conveniences. The heating and ventilation have been carefully attended to, and the cheerful and commodious character of the rooms, and the arrangements of the surrounding grounds are attractive. The scholars will have the benefit of Friends' Library, soon to be removed to a new building now being erected for its accommodation within the same enclosure as the School-house.

Children not members of our religious Society are admitted, and the attention of Friends and others is invited to these schools, which afford the opportunity for education free from the disadvantages which appertain to many seminaries. The terms are moderate, and our members who find the charges burdensome may be fully relieved.

The School-house will be open daily from and after the first of Ninth Month, from 9 A. M. to 12 M., and 3 to 5 P. M., when teachers will be in attendance to give information and receive applications for admission.

Further information may be obtained from JOHN W. BIDDLE, Treasurer of the Committee, No. 119 S. Fourth St.

MOORESTOWN ACADEMY.

Under the care of Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends, N. J., will re-open Ninth Month 6th, 1886.

R. A. FORSYTHE, Principal.

Application may be made to Wm. Evans or Mary W. Stokes, Moorestown, N. J.

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting, Moorestown, N. J. Eighth Mo. 19th, 1886, WILLIAM J. BLACKBURN, of Danville, Indiana, and M. ELIZABETH COLEMAN, of Moorestown.

DIED, at his residence near Harrisville, Ohio, Seventh Mo. 12th, 1886, BENJAMIN BRANSON, in the 38th year of his age, a member of Short Creek Monthly, and Harrisville Particular Meeting. He bore a lingering illness with patience and resignation, at different times referring to his affliction as a dispensation of mercy; and although he entertained a hope, until a few weeks before he closed, that his health might improve, when that hope was taken away, calmness and resignation appeared to be the clothing of his spirit. A few days before his death, in connection with other weighty expressions, he uttered the following: "I have been endeavoring for several years past to have all my deeds brought to the light; and to become liberated from any undue attachment to the things of this world, and I have found that this state is attainable; I now feel no burden nor condemnation resting upon me. My hope is not the hope of the hypocrite."

Eighth Month 8th, 1886, suddenly of heart disease, FRANCIS W., son of William and Jane D. Stanton, aged 11 years, 4 months and 3 days, a member of Stillwater Monthly Meeting, Ohio.

Second Mo. 12th, 1837. On Fifth-day last, I attended our Quarterly Meeting under feelings of great desertion. Though so poor myself, I thought our meeting was a good one. No strangers being in attendance, the service seemed to fall on our own friends. E. Robeson, early in the meeting, revived the query: "Children have you any meat?" turning our attention to Him, who alone can supply, and desiring that none might go empty away. E. Comfort followed with a word for the tried and discouraged ones. A. Knight succeeded Ezra with: "It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth. He sitteth alone and keepeth silence, because he hath borne it upon him." Counsel flowed sweetly to the younger part of the meeting.

26th. Came to the city yesterday, and attended the morning and afternoon meetings at Orange St. In the evening was at Arch Street. The two former were held in silence, but instructive opportunities to me. Sensible I am that there is too much of a disposition alive in me, to be looking to the poor instruments for help; and I fear it was that, which drew me thither this day. Therefore silence was a good and necessary lesson. The dear Master is able and willing to feed all his hungry, erring, thirsting children; and will do it as He is sought unto. Hence, as said before, I was instructed in these silent opportunities. This craving for words, and looking to the poor instruments, as I can testify, has a very scattering effect. In the evening, upon gathering with my friends in their meeting, my heart was made to overflow under a sense of the dear Master being in the midst. I felt it a privilege, also, to be permitted to assemble with so many fathers and mothers in the Church, the very countenances of whom did me good. After a season of precious silence, Thomas Kite arose with saying, he was loth to break the covering overspread, but believed he was called upon to revive in our remembrance, how it was with that favored people, the children of Israel, when pursuing their journey to the promised land; noting particularly the precious promise that was given unto them of a better country, "a good land." So we, also, in a spiritual sense, have the same promise. While such as were seeking after it, and who at times may feel the mountains on either side, the sea before, and Pharaoh and his host pursuing after, may remember, how He manifested himself for their deliverance, making way where none could be seen; leading them by the pillar of cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night. To the true Israel, his language was very sweet. He believed there were those present, who were pursuing after righteousness, and who were holding forth the inviting language to their dear children, "come and follow me." Ah! they can invite them, but they cannot pursue the journey for them. Though Noah, Job, and Daniel stood before me, saith the Lord, yet could they save neither son or daughter. After this, the young people were pleaded with to turn unto the Lord, &c.

Fourth Mo. 23rd. E. C. was led to speak in meeting this morning of the purifying operations necessary to be passed through, before we could be made a fit receptacle for the dear Master to dwell in. "He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver;" "and He shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver; that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness." "Then shall the offerings of Judah," &c. He believed there were among the younger part of this meeting those who had known something of this purifying work; these were encouraged to endure patiently the refining process, and not seek to get themselves out of the furnace till the work was complete, or until all was consumed, that was offensive in the Divine sight.

27th. Our Monthly Meeting held at Gwynedd, E. C. was close and searching in testimony. He spoke of the famine that was declared should come upon a people formerly, not an outward famine of bread and of water, "but of hearing the word of the Lord." Said if some who were now present, were not more concerned to seek the Lord for themselves, this would be their experience: and for such his concern was great. I felt sensibly the force of this communication. None knows but thee, O Heavenly Father! the hunger and thirst I have passed through of late!

Fifth Mo. 1st. Attended, yesterday, Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting. John Letchworth was short and lively in testimony, on the subject of being only professional Christians. Our last meeting was truly excellent. The much counsel and advice handed, tending to strengthen that which is ready to die. B. Sansom, H. Hartshorne, and E. Evans, were very lively. The Representatives also fulfilled their station and duty in handing down the exercises of the Yearly Meeting. The necessity of improving our time and talents was feelingly revived. The one talent was to be improved as well as the five. Dear Beulah told us, "It was the willing and the obedient who were to eat the good of the land." H. Hartshorne had a word of encouragement for some tried ones present, who she believed were going mourning on their way; and like one formerly who trembled for the ark of God, were saying secretly within themselves, "The glory is departed from Israel;" their harp was hung as upon the willow. "They that carried them away captive, required of them a song; and they that wasted them, required of them mirth; saying, sing us one of the songs of Zion. But how shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land?"

Near the close of the meeting, after the reading of the epistles and extracts, E. Evans arose with: "The needy shall not always be forgotten, the expectation of the poor shall not perish forever." For the encouragement of some tried ones present, she believed she was called upon to revive this promise. Some who had been sensible that for many days past, there had been a bountiful table spread, and different states handed forth to, but they had received nothing; so that great discouragement surrounded them, being ready to conclude, they were forgotten. But as had been quoted, "The needy shall not always be forgotten," &c., and, "For the crying of the poor and the sighing of the needy, now will I arise saith the Lord." Oh how comforting was her language to some who were passing quietly along, it being known to none but the great Searcher of hearts, what they were passing through. She believed the language to their poor souls had been, "Salute none by the way;" therefore they could not feel freedom to unbosom to any. Such were recommended to keep close to their dear Lord; who still remains a refuge for all such to flee unto, who is a very safe, and an ever sure refuge. She urged these often to be found like Daniel, putting up their petitions to Him, with their faces toward Jerusalem. And believed, however tried such might feel, they were under the peculiar care of their Heavenly Father; and the day was coming in which these little, secret, hidden ones, would be brought forth, who were now, though out of sight, the very bones and sinews of the Church; and whose secret petition often was, "reject me not from amongst thy people."

4th. Attended our own Quarterly Meeting, held at Germantown. We had the company and labors of our dear friend, Hannah Warrington. It was when the Bridegroom of souls withdrew himself, then it was that the bride truly mourned. She believed this was the experience of some then present; who, for a long time past, had felt the absence of the Beloved of their souls; but as these held on their way, He would again arise for their help. She also held forth a word of encouragement for the younger part of the meeting; that we might be found coming up in more faithfulness. The children of believing parents were loudly called upon. For if these were not faithful, others would be called in to fill the ranks, &c. In the last meeting she had a tender word of encouragement for some among the dear children—as she termed them—who were going mourning on their way, not only on their own account, but on account of the Church; that she had heard a plaintive language, even the bleating of the tender lambs had sounded in her ears. Our meeting throughout was a good one; though I never felt more unworthy to be a partaker.

7th. Renewedly convinced this day, that there is nothing more conducive to a spiritual growth, than trials and afflictions, if rightly abode under. When a kind Providence is pleased to open wide his hand, and to spread blessings all around, such as health, kind friends, &c., 'tis then we are too apt to forget Him. I have very much feared this has too much been my case of late! while enjoying the bountiful gifts, have been too forgetful of the Giver. So that I have sometimes feared the day is not far distant, when some of these favors will be withdrawn.

19th. Went to our little meeting this morning under feelings of great brokenness; a state I have not been able to attain to for many months past. Such hath been its hardness its impenetrability, that it seemed as though my poor heart could get no relief. Even tears were denied. The heavens appearing as brass, and the gates thereof as iron; and the enemy buffeting on all sides. Ah! this has been a painful season, and comparable to a long wintry one. But I am not able to set forth the rejoicing that filled my heart this morning, to find my hard heart broken and access granted. Oh, how precious! I feel almost afraid to speak of the favor, from the apprehension it may be the presage of closer trials! if so, my strength be given to keep close to the dear Master—the alone place of safety.

29th. Went to meeting this morning with fear and trembling; yet secretly craving to be found in my place; which in measure was granted; particularly the latter part, when the feeling was so sweet and soothing, that I even felt like wanting to tabernacle there. The thought hereupon of again having to enter on the busy cares of the world felt a burden. How disheartening would it be, had we nothing to look forward to, but the cares and joys which this world gives! But when we can truly hope for a "better country," a "richer inheritance," how animating!

For "The Friend."

A Trip to the Saguenay.

LETTER NO. 2.

Steamboat St. Lawrence, below Quebec, Seventh Mo. 30th, 1886.

We were through with Saratoga by 3 o'clock on the 27th, and taking rail for Caldwell, passing for a part of the way along the upper waters of the Hudson, with its saw-mills and dams and booms and countless logs, we embarked on that beautiful lake known in poetic literature as "Horicon or the Silvery Waters;" but called by Englishmen, of more loyalty than romance, by the prosaic name of George.

The plain name, however, has never dimmed the beauty of the waters, and for an hour we had a charming sail, with the lights and shadows of the setting sun and fleeting clouds, setting off the combination of bluffs and slopes and water with rare beauty; the climax of the panorama being a magnificent rainbow, which a shower just before landing afforded us.

We halted for the night at a good hotel on an island near Bolton, one of the prettiest parts of the lake, and next morning, when the steamboat "Horicon" came along, we resumed our journey down the lake, realizing in the expressive language of an appreciative friend who traversed it some years ago, that "beautiful exceedingly, enchantingly, exquisitely, was Lake George." A short rail ride at the foot of the lake, transferred us to the steamer on Lake Champlain,—a lake of greater dimensions than Lake George, not so famous for scenery, but of great beauty, and the day's boating of enjoyment ended at Plattsburg; whence a little less than three hours by cars landed us at Montreal.

The Canada customs men are less inquisitive or more intuitive about traveller's baggage than the American, and we passed inspection without examination or delay, and gladly reached a resting place, the hour being late.

Montreal is a solid city of substantial residences and stores, good public buildings, costly houses of worship, macadamised streets, and is rapidly Americanizing—a marked advance in this direction being observable within a few years.

A great cathedral is one of the places of note in Montreal, and two of our party looked into it, the other refraining because of the probable homage expected to be paid to the building. We next visited the Bonsecours market, and were interested in the provisions and wares on the shambles—from familiar meats and vegetables to leaf tobacco and straw hats. Considerable quantities of cubes of maple sugar were for sale, hardly distinguishable from brown soap to the eye, even of the expert of the party.

Through with the central parts of the city, an accommodating cabman with a strong horse took us on the Mount Royal Drive, whence we had a fine view of the city below, with the harbor, the river, the Victoria Bridge, 1½ miles long, and the Lachine Rapids—the last we did not see to advantage, the atmosphere of a showery morning being unfavorable.

Snow and ice are natural productions of the Dominion of Canada, and the people of Montreal take great delight in winter in "tobogganing" on the former and building a palace of the latter.

The "Toboggan" is the Canadian coasting sled, a long thin board, about 2 feet wide, turned up across the front, with hand-rails at the sides, and holds several persons. One of the favorite courses is on top of Mount Royal, and begins with an artificial hill made of timber for the start; whence it stretches across a little plateau some 1800 feet. The Ice Palace is built on a square of vacant ground in the city, the crystal masonry being quarried from the St. Lawrence river in pieces 5 and 6 feet thick, and cemented with water by the aid of the zero weather at ready command. Though a foolish expense, it must be very pretty and strange and sparkling, especially just as it begins to melt away in the glow of the vernal sun. The snow sports and Ice Palaces of Montreal, draw great numbers of visitors in what they call carnival week; notices being already up at our hotel that rooms could now be engaged for the next carnival in the Second Month of 1887. Comfortable accommodations at this time must be costly to the guests, as the hotels fill the rooms with as many as can be got in, unless enormous prices are paid for the use of the rooms by one or two persons.

At 7 o'clock we took the night boat for Quebec, and though a little discouraged by a heavy thunderstorm prevailing, we fared comfortably.

Between the region of the Thousand Islands, and for a long distance below Montreal, the mountains of the Laurentian Range are so far removed from the river that beyond the waters of the river itself, with its famous rapids, there is little of striking interest in the scenery.

The waters of the river, however, serve an important part in the economics of the earth's inhabitants, and may some day take a more conspicuous position in the commerce of the nations than even at this day.

It was a surprise to me some years ago, to read that if a pin is placed on the map or globe at Chicago, and another at Liverpool, a thread stretched between them would lie closely along the line of the valley of the St. Lawrence River. I supposed it would have crossed the New England States and left the Atlantic coast somewhere south of Halifax. The Canadian steamship lines advertise as a recommendation of their route to England, that it is only five day's sail from land to land, and freer from heavy seas than American lines must encounter.

The long winters are against the full development of this watercourse as a competing route for traffic; but the United States cannot afford to ignore its geographical and natural advantages while the waters are open.

History tells us that the empires of old strove with great energy to command the wealth that a trade with the orient brought them, and at this day it is a prominent feature of the aims of commerce. For it the Suez Canal was cut, and before our first road to the Pacific was built, orators dwelt upon the theme, and capitalists embraced it in their estimates.

Recently 80 car loads of Tea from Japan crossed the continent of America for Europe, as a test of the time compared with the passage of the Suez Canal; and the Canada papers now look upon this trade as something within their reach.

It is claimed that the Canadian Pacific Railway reaches the Pacific Ocean by relatively a lesser mileage than either of the three more southern railways across the continent, and although the climate is against the Dominion's position; yet as the Intercolonial Railway through the lower Provinces is maintained with freedom in the severest weather, only those who are familiar with problems of commerce can safely forecast the future that is before the enterprise of our Northern Brethren. It is conceded by some, and possibly by many, both of the United States and Canada, that it would promote the material interests and developments of both countries if they were one nation; which one that should be, probably varies somewhat with the residence of the person involved, and how it can be accomplished is a problem generally given up before very deeply gone into. An incident took place on the deck of a steamship going round the Gulf of St. Lawrence some nine years' ago, which caused amusement to those present. Some Americans and Canadians were conversing on the disadvantages of the boundary line, and the interests separated by it, and the difficulties of so uniting the respective peoples as to realize the promotion of their mutual welfare. How to do it was not developed, but the conclusion was agreed upon that if both nations could wake up some morning and find themselves one government, it would be very desirable. At this point the gravity of the conference was broken up by a little American girl of fourteen, who had been an attentive listener, putting in with: "Yes, provided it was the United States." The little upholder of American pre-eminence was cordially cheered and great good humor prevailed, especially among the Canadians.

We reached the foothills of the mountains, or some other range of hills at Batiscan, 60 miles above Quebec, though we were not out to see them at that early hour; but further on in the early morning we enjoyed the increasing beauty of the river banks, until the heights of Quebec and its crowning citadel came in sight, with the shipping of the port below, and soon after we transferred to this steamer for the ride on the lower St. Lawrence, and the prosecution of our journey.

An association has been formed in England, called the Morning Watch, whose object is to encourage early rising and early communion with God. "A little while spent with Him before the cares of the day dim the freshness of the mind does more than aught else to foster close communion with God."

Religion.

For "The Friend."

The professing Christian world is full of religion. And if it is a pure and undefiled religion, which purifies the heart, and finally saves us, all right; the more the better. But if it is only a superficial work which "makes clean only the outside of the cup and platter, while within they are full of extortion and excess," all is wrong and worse than nothing, as far as man's salvation is concerned. For a superficial religion may make a man more respectable, and more moral, and a better citizen of the world (which is all right as far as it goes); but if it stops short of redemption from sin, the last state of that man is worse than the first; because it satisfies him with that which is not saving. And he flatters himself with a belief that it is the Spirit of the Lord which leads him, while he is yet in the enemy's kingdom, and led by the deceiver. And if so, the longer he remains there, the harder it will be for him to return.

So while many are rejoicing over the prevailing religion of our day, others are mourning over it, under a fear that many sincere seeking ones will be induced by it to stop short of that saving perfection which they are seeking for. We are told that many shall seek to enter in at the strait gate, and shall not be able. If I read the Scriptures aright, it was a great part of the concern and labor of the holy men of old, and of our Saviour himself, while personally among men, to warn them against the insidious workings of the Enemy in religion and in the churches, as well as against the corruptions that are in the world through him. I believe that the Apostles, and our early Friends, were anointed by the same Holy Spirit, to raise up a standard against the Enemy, who has at times been permitted to come in like a flood into all the different churches of God, in order to try them, and see what foundation they are building upon. And he comes in now, in our enlightened day, under the cloak of religion, and as an angel of light, more successfully than he could in any other way. And he cares not how sincere, or how earnest, or how zealous we are on the side of a false religion.

Some may think, that because there is so much zeal and sincerity and tenderness in the modified religion of our day, and of our Society, that there must be some good in it; and indeed it does look so. But let us remember that Paul had a great zeal, and a great earnestness and sincerity, when he was so industriously defending the Jewish religion, and persecuting the Christians. For he said, "I verily thought with myself that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth." But, he says, he "obtained mercy, because he did it ignorantly, in unbelief." And so I hope it may be now, in regard to such as are persecuting the old defenders of our ancient faith. And while we may have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge, yet it is good to be zealously affected in a good thing. And I doubt not Paul's sincerity before he was converted, as well is after. But what good does our sincerity do while we are continuing in the wrong?

As to the tenderness which sometimes manifests itself even unto tears, under the emotional religion and ministry which we have so abundantly of late, that is no proof of religion, for it belongs to both saint and sinner, though produced from a different cause. As far as my observation extends, it belongs, more or less, to all mankind. The man of the world has it, and the man of God has it. But godly sorrow worketh repentance unto salvation; while the sorrow of the world worketh death. So there is a godly sorrow and tenderness; and there is a human sorrow and tenderness that has nothing to do with religion. But the imitating power of the enemy is great, and his emissaries are busy; compassing sea and land to make proselytes to his religion, which now appears in great splendor; inasmuch that if it were possible it would deceive the very elect.

We want more zeal; yet not a zeal without the knowledge of Him, whom to know is life eternal. We want an inward and experimental knowledge in the heart, not in the head—in the spirit and not merely in the letter. And we want religion; but we want it to be a pure and undefiled religion, which will not depend on outward observances, or musical sounds, nor tend to secure worldly admiration, for the gratification of pride. We want righteousness, but not that righteousness which will incline us to go about to establish our own righteousness before we have submitted to the righteousness of God.

Christ said to his disciples "that except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees ye shall in no case enter the kingdom of heaven." Have we not a good deal of the same righteousness, in thinking we shall be heard for our much speaking, and for our many prayers? &c. But God sees not as men see. Finally we want a religion and a righteousness which will save us from the wrath to come. But I believe that much of what is palmed off upon the credulity of the professors of religion for the ministry of the gospel, has but little of the power of God unto salvation in it. But that it has so much of the power and eloquence of man, and of the deceivableness of unrighteousness in it, that it is received and exalted by the bewildered multitude for genuine, when it is nothing but a counterfeit with worldly polish.

Pure religion keeps all who live under the influence of it, pure in heart, so that they are enabled at times, through faith, to see Him who is invisible; and to see the hidden works of darkness. Undefiled religion preserves us from the defilements and corruptions which are in the world through lust. It teaches us to beware of fleshly lusts which war against the soul; and to shun the lusts of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, which are not of the Father, but of the world which lies in wickedness. It keeps us down in humility, and from aspiring after that knowledge which is forbidden to the followers of the lowly Jesus, who had not where to lay his head. It keeps us from that lofty, haughty spirit which influenced the Babel builders of old to say, "let us go to and let us build a city and a tower whose top may reach to heaven, and let us make us a name." But the Babel building ended in confusion. Is there not something of that confusion of language amongst us now? so that we "cannot understand one another's speech"—half Jew, and half Ashdod. Some crying, lo here is Christ, and others lo He is there; causing the potsherds of the earth to strive together in bewildering confusion; and all leading away from the peaceable waters of Shiloh; and from the still small voice which appeared to Elijah after the jarring elements which the Lord was not in, had subsided.

O my friends and readers! there is nothing more plain to me, than that there are two religions prevailing in the world—the true and the false—the religion of Christ, and the religion of Antichrist. The one leading to the heavenly Jerusalem, the city of the saint's solemnity; the other leading to mystery Babylon the great—the mother of all the false birth which is now making such a fair show in the world. But all is not gold that glitters; and well might I. Pennington say, that Babylon is built in the likeness of Zion, but by another spirit. And this other spirit is the one which now rules and reigns in the religion of the disobedient. D. H.

A Sensible Celebration.

The Messenger of Peace republishes from an old paper, an account of a celebration of the 4th of Seventh Month, which was held at Gorham, about 8 miles from Portland, Maine, in 1825.—"According to arrangements previously made at a meeting of the citizens of Gorham, last Monday was celebrated in attempts to repair the loss recently sustained by Doct. Dudley Folsom, of this town, in the consumption of his house and out buildings by fire.

ORDER OF EXERCISES.

At four o'clock, a. m. the bell rung, and the laborers repaired to their work.

At half past six o'clock, they were called by the ringing of the bell to breakfast with the villagers in their houses.

At half past seven o'clock, at the ringing and tolling of the bell, a large concourse of men, women and children, was collected on the spot of the ruins, and having listened to the order of the day and a short address, united in singing and prayer. The workmen then proceeded in their labor.

At ten o'clock, the workmen were called by the ringing of the bell to refreshments, suitable to the hour, and presented by the young ladies.

At one o'clock, p. m. the workmen were called to a sumptuous dinner, prepared by the females of the town, and spread upon a table (on the spot) 168 feet in length and 4 in breadth. About 200 were seated at this table, and many others kindly invited to the neighboring houses. At two o'clock, the men were again called to the work by the ringing of the bell.

At five o'clock, the bell called all on the spot to tea, coffee, &c., prepared by the young ladies. About 350 partook of this repast. The men then continued their labor until seven o'clock, when they were discharged.

The workmen were, in the morning, divided into parties, and assigned their particular service, each having its master-workman; and every exertion was made, that all hands might be employed.

The timber for the dwelling-house, 40 feet by 36, two stories and hipped roof, was taken in the rough, and more than half the work, necessary for its erection, done. The wood-shed, 34 feet by 16, and 10 foot posts, was framed, raised, boarded and shingled, and the floor laid. Some of the timber for this building was growing in the woods in the morning.

A good barn, 36 by 24, presented by one of the citizens, was, without previous preparation, moved about 180 rods, placed on the spot, and a cellar under it, dug and stoned, and the whole completely underpinned. Two new sills were added to the barn, and the floor framed and laid.

The cellar of the house was cleared of its rubbish, and the walls and underpinning repaired; and 20 feet of the wall laid entirely new.

The corn, potatoes and garden, belonging to the sufferer, were hoed, and one or two acres of grass mowed and raked.

On Tuesday, the workmen volunteered their services to finish the framing of the house. They also parted off and finished a granary in the barn, prepared the stalls for horses and cows, and completely underpinned the woodshed. In the afternoon the house was raised."

Russian Despotism.

J. M. Buckley in The Independent gives the following narrative illustrating the police system of Russia:—"A Nihilist, now residing in this country, gave an account of his own arrest in language which then seemed to me very extravagant, but which I found to be within the limits of truth. I will give the substance of his account, omitting, however, minor details. He says: "It was past midnight. The bell rang. I jumped up at once. With trembling hands I lit a lamp and burned several papers written in cipher or in invisible ink. The bell rang again. My landlady was very slow in getting up, thus giving me an opportunity to burn all those compromising documents. With a sudden crash the door gave way, and the gendarmes rushed in. The captain informed me that, by order of the Government, he had come to arrest me. They took my keys and opened my trunks and drawers. They searched every nook and corner, carefully collecting every scrap of written paper. It took them three hours to finish the examination. At length they put me in the carriage and hurried me to the Third Section. The heavy iron door shut behind me. A week passed. No officer came near me. At last I was brought before the chief of gendarmes, who sternly told me that I was guilty of taking part in a revolutionary propaganda and of pronouncing the sentence of death upon an alleged spy who was afterward killed by some of my comrades. 'You will have to prove your accusations,' I said. 'That is what we shall do, and you meanwhile will stay at the Petrapavlosky fortress.'" There he remained two years before learning the charges against him. His case, with those of one hundred and nineteen others, he declares, were the first and the last tried by a jury. Three-quarters of the whole number, including himself, were acquitted. "When he heard the result, the late Czar exclaimed in rage: 'No more jury trials for political criminals'; and he kept his word. At first he established a special court composed of Senators; afterward came the Military Courts."

In other countries, a prisoner acquitted is free. This young man at the time of his arrest was a medical student. After his acquittal, he went to the medical academy and asked to be re-admitted to the institution. Of the result he says: "The General kindly informed me in a whisper that the doors of all the universities were forever shut against me. I hurried to the Third Section. 'I have been acquitted by the Court and yet I am under punishment. "What does it mean?" 'You shall hear from me,' said the Chief of the Russian Inquisition, and he left the room. At midnight the bell rang, and the Captain of gendarmes came again to arrest me. That same night I was sent away from St. Petersburg in the company of two gendarmes. Five days we travelled. At last we reached a small village in the woods of the Archangelsk Province. "Guard him well if you don't care to see Siberia," said one of the gendarmes to the village constable; and they left me without any means of subsistence." He afterward escaped and came to this country.

The Dirty Rope.—Sometime about the year 1870, a godly congregation assembled in Eastern Pennsylvania, to listen to a minister, Isaac P—, who was also a man of business, and kept a country store, by which he supplied the varied wants of the surrounding population.

On this occasion, when the congregation had assembled, a sister of the preacher, Mrs. L—, a person of much intelligence, but subject to occasional attacks of mental disorder, came into the meeting-house, bringing a long dirty rope. Walking down in front of the pulpit where her brother the preacher was, she laid the rope on the table before him, and turning to the congregation, said:

"Friends, this is a very dirty rope, but it is to hang a very dirty man. It is to hang Isaac P—, who does not practice as he preaches. He preaches the gospel, but he sells tobacco. Now he has got to stop selling tobacco, or he does not preach here to-day."

We need not say that this address produced a sensation. The speaker had often expostulated with her brother on the tobacco question, but had never been able to persuade him to abandon the traffic; but this testimony did the work. Isaac P— left the house. He did not preach that day. He was sorely grieved at the publicity of the rebuke; but he stopped selling tobacco; and to the day of his death would not deal in the dirty stuff.—The Seaguard.

GOD'S PROMISES.

O, broken hearted ones of earth,
O, souls bowed down with pain and care,
Faint not! A God of rest is found;
His promises are full and rare.

Let your weak faith in Him lift up
The weary eyes beyond earth's night,
To where, in endless depths of truth,
They glow in beauty pure and bright:

As mountains round Jerusalem,
Do guard and keep the city's wall,
So rise the towers of his strength
Forever round about us all.

Beside still waters we shall find
Green pastures where the soul may rest;
His rod and staff shall comfort us
E'en through the shadows dark of death.

His word is perfect and is tried;
And as a rock He is to all.
Our feet like hind's, 'He makes to flee,
And guides them lest they trip and fall.

A marvellous loving-kindness rolls
Round those who put their trust in Him:
The shadow of his wings enfolds
When darkness falleth chill and dim.

Deep in his tabernacle strong,
In times of trouble He will hide:
Sad mourning turns He to a song:
His gladness shall with us abide.

Our feet along the water-course,
His pleasant ways shall wander in;
His mercy, like a boundless flood,
Shall wash away our every sin.

Then lean on Him; his arm would save.
His strength is mighty, and his love
Years ever toward us, as He calls
To a glad home of rest above.

THE BRAVEST LIVES.

Great deeds are trumpeted; loud bells are rung,
And men turn round to see;
The high peaks echo to the psæns sung
O'er some great victory:
And yet great deeds are few, the mightiest men
Find opportunities but now and then.
Shall one sit idle through long days of peace,
Waiting for walls to scale?
Or lie in port until some "Golden Fleece"
Lures him to face the gale?
There's work enough, why idly, then, delay?
His work counts most who labors every day.
The bravest lives are those to duty wed;
Whose deeds both great and small
Are close knit strands of one unbroken thread
Where love ennobles all.
The world may sound no trumpets, ring no bells,
The Book of Life the shining record tells.

The Fort and Palaces of Lahore.

BY BISHOP JOHN F. HURST.

When one reaches Lahore, and climbs to the top of the lofty minaret near the ancient Mogul palace, his first thought is to cast his eye to the far northwest, where Afghanistan lies, and where Russian and Saxon are sure, sooner or later, to battle for the India at your feet. But when that battle comes, there need be no fear of the result. The real current of weal never goes back. India will be English until, like Canada, and Ireland, she gets her own parliament, as she is sure to do, and ought, the moment she is ripe.

In former times Lahore stood on the banks of the beautiful Ravi. I mean one Lahore, out of the half-dozen which have lived and died. But that river now flows off at a distance, and, to see it at all, you have to scale a wall, or climb to the top of a minaret, to see its winding course, as it sweeps on to lose its waters in the great Indus. As we rode out of one city-gate on the western side, we followed the line of the old wall of Lahore, which stood when walls meant something more than mere antique memorials. We crossed a depression, which must have been a place where the river either formerly ran, or its waters were let in, in case of need, to aid in destroying an attacking enemy. This wall the Moguls built; and, next to the Romans, none have known better how to put stone on stone, and in more enduring beauty, than those imperial architects, who never lived out of Asia or came into relation with the Romans.

The line of the beautiful and still firm city wall of Lahore is graceful, and follows the curves of the hills with charming fidelity. The bastions are not frequent, but there is enough variety to render you intent and watchful for surprises with every revolution of the wheels of your carriage. There is something singularly fascinating in going around the ancient walls of this old city of Lahore. You see where armies have come and battled for the possession of India. Look carefully, and you will see, down in the dried trench, some stone balls which have lain there for long centuries, worn smooth by time and the noses of the friendly goats. They went hurling out of coarse and rude brass mortars, before the days when balls of iron were the rule in Oriental warfare. Look a little more closely still, and you will see some fragments of burst guns, and now and then a hole in the wall, while the stone and mortar intended to hide the opening, only illy conceal the old rift. The Ficus Indicus thrust its intruding roots into the zigzag openings and climbed up to the very top of the wall, and then pushed out other roots, and stuck them into the interstices, and would ornament it while it disintegrates. Many a weed has found a lodging on the coping of the wall, and nods in the fresh breezes from these far off Cashmerean hills.

This Lahore is a bastion, and means bloodshed and possession. But who dreamed of the Anglo Saxon when Shah Jahan's masons laid these massive stones? Yet the Englishman has come, walked into the city, and ascended the Fort by the grand Delhi gate, which we shall reach in ten minutes more, if our lazy horses do not surrender. What presumption! The Saxon has come to stay. The Mogul dynasty has almost died out. One of the last of the line still lives in the suburbs of Calcutta, a tolerated pensioner of England, walking about among his peacocks, parrots and great serpents, and seeing English ships sail up the Hughli, and looking at the slopes of the great Fort, where Clive built up the English Empire of to-day on the ruins of that of his ancestors. Did I say he lives? No. He dies; and when he disappears the Mogul graveyard may be regarded as filled. The Anglo Saxon grave-digger of dead dynasties will have finished his Indian task.

There is a great surprise for anyone travelling in India who supposes a Fort to be the usual thing which the word would mean. You enter the gateway in the wall. An English guard presents arms. You fancy you will see only soldiers, guns, ramparts, and all the machinery of resistance. But here you are in error. Remember, first of all, you are in India, and the first of all Indian experiences is that of the unexpected. The Fort is a collection of buildings, all of them historical, and associated with many a bloody deed and day. There are armories, but at the same time great courts, magnificent trees and mosques, where emperors prayed. You can still see the worn marble slabs where they knelt and kissed the stone, and asked of the one God and his prophet for strength for the next bloody campaign. Then, too, there are great marble tanks, as large as the Athenian Acropolis, whose sides are of finest stone, and down whose steps only princely feet might walk, and where only princely bodies might leave. To crown all, there was a vast place, with spacious court and outreaching corridors, like the spread wings from a falcon's spotless breast. Here the monarch held audience. Halls extended on all sides. Little secret rooms, whose sides were carved with more little mirrors than even the Arabic arithmetic might enumerate, opened by a spring; and here the Emperor might consult with a friend, or hide himself from everybody at will. Here was the Moti Masjid, or Pearl Mosque of Lahore, of whitest marble, above which rise three great domes. Here, in the Mogul days, Ranjit kept his treasures. Next comes the great Akbar's palace, which extends a distance of five hundred feet; and was enlarged by Shah Jahan and Aurangzib. Its front is covered with glittering tiles, bearing on their face all the richest designs known to Arabic art in the times when only the Indians knew the deep secret of the finest glazing, and took it off with them at their death. Then comes the Palace of Mirrors, where room after room is entirely covered with miniature mirrors, and you are reflected from ten thousand surfaces. On one side is a gem, the Nau Lakha—a marble pavilion inlaid with stones from the richest mines of the Eastern world. Here, in another place, is the Emperor's sleeping apartment. It is of white marble, except the floor, which is of alternate black and white tiles from the rarest quarry.

The view from the balcony is beautiful; but there is many a balcony. By gentle steps you reach an upper landing, and come out upon the great flat spaces which are the marble roofs of the palaces where you have been walking and wondering and dreaming. The parapet is low; so be careful how you bend over, and dream of the past, and look down upon the base of the great wall, and out upon all Indian history. You are now where emperors and their families spent their evenings. The sun set then in the same spot as now out over the Afghan steppes, just straight off toward Peshawer. Those imperial folk had their rich rugs of camel's hair and gold, which servants in gay costumes laid down and smoothed with careful fingers, and here the minstrel recited refrains from the classic Arabic and Persian poets.

The army within this historical group of buildings called the Fort is the best I have seen in India. There are enough wonderful weapons here to fill a long gallery. They are of such antique fashion, and of such superb workmanship, that they would enhance the value of even the Green Vaults in Dresden. There are no very modern implements of war. All are so old that the weapons of our day present few suggestions of these far-back types. Here is the heavy mace, with rusty iron spikes, any one of which could crush even an Afghan's thick skull. Here are the great kettle drums, by which Mogul and Sikh marched to victory, and made the wilds of Persia and Beloochistan re-echo with their harsh peals. Here are the rough matchlocks, with twisted barrels, that you might load to the muzzle, and let your little girl fire off, knowing that not one could burst, for they were forged in the Persian smithies, where only thorough work was done. Here are swords which have double edges, and only a strong arm can lift. Here are great axes that were never meant to fell trees; but only men, and, if kings, all the better. Then, hard by, are daggers, each of which seems but one, yet has the secret power, when the thrust is made, of unfolding itself into two, and then dividing so as to hack and rend the flesh which it had entered very deftly and with single blade.

But let us get away; one's flesh creeps. We will climb to the top of the highest minaret. It is a toilsome pull, through the dark upward passages, over steps worn and smoothed by the long-dead generations. We have no taper, and so have to feel our way as best as we can. But at last we reach the little balcony, where, in the other days the Muezzin's call to prayer made Emperors and Kings turn their faces westward toward Mecca, and fall on their prayer rug, and lie long in silent and abstract reverence. The steps of this commanding balcony are grooved by the slipped feet of the dead and forgotten priests. But what a view! The Fort and its gateway; Akbar's Great Palace, with its beautiful roof; the spacious courts and corridors, and even the English sentry, all are mere toys, far below, as seen from this dizzy height. Lahore is lying like a miniature, and mimic city, at our feet. Its very noises have merged into one faint murmur. Only the distant monotonous rumble of the busy streets is heard. Far away lies Afghanistan, with all its violent history. Far off to the north is Cashmere. Its mountains are shimmering thrones of everlasting snow. The sun is just now giving them its every tinge. There they stretch, eastward, westward, and now lose themselves in their wilderness of frost. Their peaks are like alabaster, and only here and there can one see a patch of bald rock, so fondly has the snow embraced all the granite in its icy arms.—The Independent.

For "The Friend."

A Reminiscence of Daniel Pryor Hack.

The account of Daniel Pryor Hack in yesterday's "Friend," recalls pleasant memories of meeting with him one year ago.

We first met with him when entering the meeting-house at Brighton. He was a short, venerable looking man, dressed plainly, and with a broad-brimmed silk hat, such as is now hardly seen in England, leaning on the arm of his daughter. He courteously addressed us as strangers, and upon learning our names, turned to his daughter and in a tender voice exclaimed, "Here are these two dear friends who have come all the way from America to see us." Thus our first pleasant impression was that he was an hospitable and lovely character, which some little acquaintance subsequently confirmed.

We afterwards took tea at his comfortable home. Although 90 years old, his brightness and animation were wonderful. He showed us with much pleasure, a letter written to him by his grand mother, Mary Pryor, when he was in prison 70 years before, for refusing to serve in the army. This aged piece of paper, with its excellent counsel, he carried much with him, and it gave evidence of frequent perusal. He told me, by way of encouragement to one not strong in health, that when he was a young man his future father-in-law said, he only had one objection to his marrying his daughter, which was that "he feared she would be left a widow soon." The good old Friend laughed heartily as he considered that his father-in-law's fears proved groundless. His politeness and hospitality, his Christian sympathy and encouragement, and humility, all made us glad that we met with this delightful and remarkable old man. How beautiful it is to see old age softened and chastened by the grace of God!

It was a privilege to hear Daniel Pryor Hack preach in meetings. His ministry was of the old fashioned sort, and its source and power could not be doubted. I remember him now, as he stood leaning upon his cane, his animated face all aglow with loving zeal, as he spake of God's tender love for his children, and of the rewards for obedience. Out of the abundance of his heart his mouth spake, and his listeners could but appreciate that the aged preacher spoke not from theory, but from a real experience of the truths he uttered.

The lessons to be drawn from such a life are many; not the least is, that a youthful surrender to Christ's yoke does not debar one from a life of happiness, but on the contrary opens the way to true enjoyment. When we remember how his long life brought pleasure and consolation to all with whom he was brought into contact, and how at the end he could welcome death, we also should be stimulated to follow the Divine Guide as he followed it, and hope for the same reward we reverently believe he has obtained.

Planets and Stars.

In the advancing twilight, a little before dark, looking west you see a bright star just above the horizon; it is the planet Jupiter. Several weeks ago this star was much higher in the sky than it is now. But like all other stars it seems to move westward, caused by the apparent eastward motion of the sun, which is due to the earth's actual motion around the sun. So, in a short time, Jupiter will set before dark; and be out of sight for several weeks. Having passed the sun—or rather the sun having passed it, this planet will appear as a morning star. Many will recognize this as the "giant planet" (largest one in the solar system.) It has four moons revolving round it, and two belts across the disc—as seen through a good-sized telescope.

Some distance south of it, and higher, we see the fixed star Alpha in Virgo, often called Spica. About as much farther, and some higher, the planet Mars displays its fiery lustre. Then away eastward across Libra, we meet Scorpio, a constellation of much interest both to the naked eye and with telescope also. Its chief star, Antares, is very conspicuous. Three stars in a nearly vertical row to the west of this red star, are Beta, Delta and Pi. The upper one, Beta, is a beautiful double star—viewed with a moderate telescope. The same glass would show an interesting nebula, or fine cluster of stars about 4° east of Beta; and another about one degree west of Antares. A row of stars from Antares extending east and downward for some distance, then turning back a short way nearly on itself upward, and terminating in two pretty stars, forms the tail of the Scorpion. Indeed this constellation bears some resemblance to a boy's kite. An amateur with even a good spy-glass might spend several hours in observing and studying this constellation. The stars eastward make the constellation Sagittarius, the Archer. We may here trace out a small dipper, and bow with its arrow pointing toward Antares the "heart of the Scorpion."

That fine gem near the zenith is Alpha Lyrae. Another one nearly equal and about half way toward the western horizon is Arcturus. An hour or so nearly east of Arcturus the Northern Crown displays a semi-circle of rather dim stars. The brightest one is Alphecca. Hercules is between the Crown and Alpha Lyrae; and the Serpent-bearer between Hercules and Scorpio. Almost every one knows the Great Dipper, now west of the North Star, and that the two stars opposite the handle always point toward the North Star, and hence are called Pointers. This group of stars appears to move around the North Star every day from the same cause that the sun and stars rise and set. It being so far north, we see it in this latitude always above the horizon, though when right north it is but little above. In still more northern latitude it would seem higher; and at the Pole of the earth the Dipper (and all northern stars) would appear to go around the Zenith as a centre of motion every day—north of Zenith during 12 hours and south the other 12.

East of the North Star about as far as the Dipper is west, we find the constellation of Cassiopeia. Below Cassiopeia is Perseus. Above, bearing to the left, Cepheus. Still above, bearing eastward, and nearly east of Alpha Lyrae, is the Great Cross. West of Cepheus, or nearly as high above the Pole as the Dipper is west of it, several stars form the imaginary coils of Draco.

Venus and Saturn are now morning stars. The more eastern and brighter one is Venus. On the 22d of Tenth Month Venus and Jupiter will be very near together, and make an interesting sight near the eastern horizon, in morning twilight. Saturn will then be up near the meridian.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Hatter's Consumption.—A writer in the New York Medical Journal has been investigating the causes of the prevalence of pulmonary consumption among those engaged in the hat manufacture. In the "sizing" room, where the hat hodies are moistened with hot water containing sulphuric acid, and then worked by hand to make the felt more compact, the vapor is often dense, and is inhaled directly into the lungs; thus subjecting the worker to a long continued vapor bath, which renders the system liable to contract disease upon subsequent exposure to cold air. In the dyeing room, the evil effects of the hot vapor is heightened by its admixture with the fumes of the dye stuffs. In the "pouncing" room, the hats are placed upon revolving blocks, cleansed of the rough fur, and smoothed with emery, which fills the air with particles of fur. A suction-tube is placed near each block, to prevent the inhalation of these particles, yet much of the fur passes into the nostrils, throat, and lungs. The fur, as it finds lodgment upon the delicate mucous membrane of the respiratory apparatus, acts as a mechanical irritant, producing after a short time an irritative cough; this, together with the continued irritation of the fur and dust, soon establishes an inflammatory condition, which, if allowed to continue, terminates in a true phthisical process. The hats are next sent to the "finishing-room," where they are placed upon stationary blocks, sand-papered and ironed by hand, and exposed to a naphtha flame. In this room there is greater danger than in any other department of the work. The men, in using the sand-paper and the irons, bend over the blocks, bringing the face very close to the hats. They are therefore in the best possible posture to inhale the fur which is detached from the felt by the use of the sand-paper, and to receive into their lungs the hot vapor which results from the ironing of the damp hats with the heated irons.

Of the hat finishers, it is said, the majority die of consumption, and of these the greater part become unfit for work before they are thirty years of age.

Caution in the White Heron.—They invariably kept in the middle of the tract of meadow, unless when feeding, and then never ventured nearer than, say, one hundred yards to the wooded margins of the meadow, or to the near outstanding trees. This shyness, as it would be called, was not of itself at all remarkable, but as it was accompanied with another habit having direct relation to it, it was very curious and clearly indicated reason. This other habit was that of rising to a very great height always when passing over woods. While the less timid blue herons would pass leisurely along the tree-tops, not a dozen yards above them, the great white herons, on being disturbed, or when voluntarily leaving the meadows, would rise rapidly to an unusual height, and, apparently keeping directly over the spot where they had been standing, would not commence an onward flight until the upward one was sufficiently prolonged to assure them that they were wholly out of harm's way.—Abbott's Rambles about Home.

The King-Crab in the Pacific.—A specimen of this common inhabitant of our Atlantic Coast, where it is perhaps better known as the Horse-foot crab, has lately been found in the Pacific Ocean on the coast of California, where it has hitherto been unknown. It is supposed that some of the eggs were accidentally introduced into the Pacific along with the lobsters, which the United States Fish Commission sent there a few years ago.

Laying Dust in Coal Mines.—In examining one of the coal mines of England after a great explosion in 1884, it was found that the flame had penetrated most of the workings, but had been arrested at one point where the dampness caused by the transportation of water had removed from the air fine coal dust which is produced by quarrying the coal. This proof of the influence of coal dust in spreading explosions, suggests the propriety of sprinkling the passages in mines with water, as one of the safeguards to the miners and mines.

Corundum.—Pure Corundum is an oxide of Aluminium, and is one of the hardest of known substances, ranking next below the diamond in this property.

The gems, ruby, sapphire, oriental emerald, oriental topaz, and oriental amethyst, are all forms of corundum, and are found chiefly in the beds of the rivers of Ceylon.

Emery is the same substance in a granular form. The island of Naxos, in the Grecian Archipelago was long the principal source of this mineral, but in 1847 large deposits were found at Smyrna, and the site of the ancient Ephesus in Asia Minor; and more recently both it and corundum, which is the massive form of the mineral, have been found in considerable quantities in Massachusetts, North Carolina and Georgia.

Its principal use at present is in grinding and polishing. The ground material is separated into different grades of fineness which are used for different purposes. A large amount is required by the plate-glass manufacturers. Emery wheels are prepared by mixing the powder with glue or cement and subjecting the paste to severe pressure.

Items.

—An Organized Christianity in America.—President Apple of Franklin and Marshall College, suggests in The Independent, that advantages would result from the Christian Churches in this country forming a federal union, somewhat like the political union of the different States. He says, "Let the churches organize a general representative body, composed of delegates appointed by the different denominations, for the purpose of mutual co-operation, and the consideration of such questions as pertain to the common interests of Christianity in its relation to the nation. Let it be an advisory body merely, without legislative functions." Among the questions which he thinks might properly claim the notice of such a body, are those of marriage and divorce, the proper observance of the First-day of the week, &c.

—San Francisco Girls' Union.—A co-operative society, of more than ordinary merit and success, has been in existence two years on the Pacific coast. It is the San Francisco Girls' Union, organized in Sixth Month, 1884, with a membership which now amounts to 400. The membership is of two classes, sustaining and beneficiary, the dues for both being $3.00 a year. The latter are entitled to a home while out of employment for a moderate sum, to assistance in fitting themselves for work and in finding work; and the former are alone entitled to the privilege of obtaining trained help from the Union. This is no small thing when it is known that there is a training school attached, and that no girls are sent out until thoroughly competent in their special department. The school includes skilled nursing, domestic service and sewing. During the last year and a half, 324 girls have been trained and placed in good positions.

—Exciting Delusion.—The notion that the world would come to an end on the 15th of [Sixth Mo.,] at two o'clock in the afternoon, was believed by an immense multitude of the more ignorant classes in Madrid, Spain. At that time more than a thousand persons assembled on the heights of Vistelles, and tremblingly waited for the catastrophe. "Many curious phenomena were seen in the sky by the excited spectators, as, for instance, St. Peter walking in the midst of a red cloud, but the end did not come." Some person finally stated that a mistake had been made in the calculation, and the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds would occur on the 24th of June, and the crowd dispersed. As for signs in the sky, a crowd of excited people can see them as easily as a worthy deacon infected with Spiritualism saw a table with a kerosene lamp standing on it chase him up a flight of stairs without the lamp being upset. The poor man gazed with mingled shame and wonder when a friend measured the table and the stairs, and discovered that the table was six inches wider than the stairs!—Christian Advocate.

—Bishop Ryle on the Church of England.—Bishop Ryle, in a sermon delivered some time since, expressed his conviction that the Church of England at the present day suffers great loss from the prominence given in its organization to the clergy and other officials, and the comparatively small share of responsibility devolving upon the members generally. "A mischievous habit of leaving all religion to the parson of the parish has overspread the country, and the bulk of lay churchmen seem to think that they have nothing to do with the Church but to receive the benefit of her means of grace, while they contribute nothing in the way of personal active exertion to promote her efficiency." This, he says, was not the case in the primitive Christian Church, where all the members took an active interest in the welfare and progress of the body.

—British and Colonial Temperance Congress.—At a meeting of this body at London in the Seventh Month, Archdeacon Farrar stated, that for every Christian whom they had made in India, they had made an hundred drunkards. "In India every Hindoo patriot was complaining of the demoralization which we were causing to the 200,000,000 of our fellow-subjects there. Drunkenness was spreading among the native populations of India with a rapidity which was epidemic. The cry from Burmah was that everywhere the population was being destroyed by the rum we introduced into the country. The Maoris of New Zealand were originally a fine race, but now they were plunged in degradation and diminishing in numbers because of the drink traffic, and the vice which had followed in the wake of our civilization. In Japan and Madagascar the population were suffering from the rum imported into the country; and at Nazareth at this moment when a drunken man was seen, the Mohammedans pointed the finger of scorn at him, and said, 'That man is a Christian.'"

The Congress adopted a memorial to be presented to the British Government, praying for immediate attention to the drinking system and traffic which were afflicting India, Ceylon, and the Colonies.

—The British in Burmah.—The Herald of Peace (London) contrasts the unsettled condition of Burmah, the opposition to the British invasion and possession of that country, the call for more troops to hold what is now occupied, and the heavy expenses incurred in the unjustifiable attempt to annex that country, with the rose-colored reports in The Times as to the ease with which it could be effected. It states, on the authority of correspondents of The Times itself, "that the whole country is in a state of insurrection against us, when our troops are trying in vain to subdue; that utter anarchy prevails everywhere; that commerce is destroyed; that towns and villages are being burnt; and that our troops are suffering severely from sickness."

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 4, 1886.

NORTH CAROLINA YEARLY MEETING.

This body convened at High Point, N. C., on the 5th of Eighth Month,—the Representative Meeting and the Meeting on Ministry and Oversight having met the previous day.

There were in attendance several persons from other Yearly Meetings with minutes, including three from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. These were all kindly received; but no returning minutes were given to those from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. This refusal, we suppose, was not grounded on any dissatisfaction with them personally, but because North Carolina Yearly Meeting, about thirty years ago, had formally notified Philadelphia, that it could not maintain an official correspondence with the latter body, so long as it remained in fellowship with the body in Ohio, which it had recognized as the legitimate Yearly Meeting there. As that recognition and fellowship remain unbroken, it seemed to some of the North Carolina Friends, that it would be inconsistent with their previous action to grant the customary returning minutes to members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

Rufus P. King returned the minute granted him in 1883 for labor in Australia and other distant parts.

L. L. Hobbs, of New Garden, was appointed Clerk for the year.

In the Meeting for Ministry and Oversight, a concern was expressed that ministers and elders should dwell under a weighty exercise of spirit from day to day, and especially that their deportment in meetings should be reverent and becoming. They were cautioned against becoming stumbling blocks to the young and inexperienced by any unguarded conduct. The command addressed to Jonah was revived: "Preach the preaching that I bid thee;" also the declaration of Paul at Miletus, that he had kept back nothing that was profitable unto them, &c., and that he had not shunned to declare unto them the whole counsel of God; setting forth to those present the great responsibility of ministers being faithful and honest in declaring the whole gospel, not making the path to the kingdom appear any easier than it really is, as they might have to answer for such deception in the great day of account.

In a public meeting for worship, a hymn was sung at the prompting of one of the visitors from Indiana; and much stress was laid upon faith in the atoning blood of Christ, without sufficient reference to the inward work of his Spirit, and the consistency of life which would flow from obedience thereto. Another Friend quoted the text: "If we walk in the light as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin;" and commented on it in an appropriate manner.

The answers to the Queries showed much neglect in the attendance of week-day meetings; and it was stated that one of the subordinate meetings had laid down its mid-week meeting for worship—a meeting which had been kept up for a long period. In connection with this subject, our letters state, that in the Select Meeting, one of the strangers mentioned that on his way to the Yearly Meeting he stopped to attend a week-day meeting at the regular time for holding it. But one person came, and they went away without opening the house. This was probably an unusual case, but one calculated to show the need of greater zeal in the performance of this duty.

On several occasions during the Yearly Meeting, collections were taken up, to obtain funds for special purposes; persons being designated to go around among the men and women and receive what each one was disposed to contribute.

Years ago, in visits among the colored people of the South, we had become familiar with this method of raising money, and deplored its dissipating effect on the feelings of solemnity with which the company had previously been favored. There is reason to believe that it has a similar unsettling effect in the meetings of Friends.

The Report of the Trustees of New Garden Boarding School stated that the burning of the building occupied by the boys, had not suspended the operations of the school—accommodations for the boys having been found among the neighbors, while a new building containing dormitories, for the boys, was being erected. This was called Archdale Hall, in memory of one of the early governors of the State. An additional building for class-rooms was nearly completed, so that more ample accommodations will be provided than before the fire. The average attendance for the year was nearly 100 pupils; about two-thirds were Friends. An earnest hope was expressed in the meeting, that North Carolina would not follow the example of some other Yearly Meetings in introducing the study of music as a part of their curriculum. The fact that George Fox felt bound to cry against all kinds of music was brought to notice.

Report was made that a difficulty which had existed among Friends in Tennessee was in a fair way for settlement. This difference does not appear to be on doctrinal points.

Quarterly and Monthly Meetings were granted the liberty of erecting on the ten acre lot belonging to the Yearly Meeting, cheap frame structures for the accommodation of their members, so that those who were unable to pay board could attend the Yearly Meeting without much expense.

When the subject of education was before the meeting, much stress was laid by some on the importance of literary culture, especially the study of the Bible, in connection with the ministry. One of the strangers said that a minister who went into the gallery without this preparation was as much at fault as a mechanic who undertook a job of work without tools! The danger of such views was pointed out; but there is need in North Carolina, as well as elsewhere, for counteracting the efforts of those who would introduce a system of ministry in which the wisdom and will of man bear rule.

At the last sitting of the Representative Meeting, the subject of the Charleston Trust, under the care of Friends of Philadelphia, was discussed. "The meeting seemed to settle to the conclusion that [Friends of North Carolina] had no legal right to the trust, and that the best plan would be, simply to request Philadelphia to devote the money to the benefit of their meeting. One Friend intimated they ought to be thankful for what they had already got from this fund [about $11,000], and so the matter concluded."

The Book Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings have recently published "A Memoir of Christopher Healy," a neat 12mo. book of 258 pages. It details the varied experiences of this dear friend, many of which are related in his own graphic language. To many who knew and loved him, who have been reached by his living gospel ministry, and edified by his uncommonly interesting conversation (which often seemed to be but another form of preaching), this book may recall the memory of one, who preferred the spread of the Redeemer's kingdom, and the performance of the service required of him, to everything else. It is both instructive and interesting.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Prohibition State Convention at Harrisburg, on the 26th ult., nominated Charles S. Wolfe for Governor, and made other nominations. The platform adopted declares that the Prohibition party is the only party which gives the citizens an opportunity of voting for public officers not in complicity with the liquor business, and removes from the voter all moral responsibility for the evils which the liquor system inflicts. It also demands the enforcement of all laws against the violation of the First-day of the week; 644 delegates were present, of whom 40 were women and 138 clergymen. There were 4 colored delegates.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has prepared stringent regulations for the enforcement of the oleomargarine law, which goes into effect on Tenth Month 31st next.

The late speech of T. V. Powderly, against the anarchists, has called forth a reply from A. R. Parsons, one of the anarchists convicted in Chicago. He says: "The foundation principle of Socialism, or Anarchy, is the same as that of the Knights of Labor, viz: 'the abolition of the wage system, and the substitution in its stead of the industrial system of universal co-operation, making every capitalist a laborer and every laborer a capitalist, ending forever the conflict of classes and the inevitable antagonisms of the wage slave system.'"

Other arrests of anarchists have lately been made in Chicago.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 363, which was 39 less than during the previous week, and 54 less than during the corresponding period last year. The main causes were: cholera infantum, 30; consumption of the lungs, 59; typhoid fever, 19; inflammation of lungs, 12; marasmus, 23; old age, 21.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s registered, 110½; coupons, 111½; 4's, 126½; 3's, 101; currency 6's, 126 a 136.

Cotton sold in a small way to spinners on a basis of 9½ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum was quiet at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Feed.—Winter bran in good supply. Sales at $13 per ton.

Flour.—New Winter flours were in ample supply. Sales of 375 barrels Winter, straight, at $4.50; 375 barrels Winter Patent, at $4.70 to $4.80; 125 barrels Minnesota clear, at $4.00, and 500 barrels Minnesota Patent at $4.80 to $5.00. Rye flour.—New was held at $3.25 per barrel; 100 barrels choice old was sold at $3.40 per barrel.

Grain.—No. 1 Pennsylvania red Wheat, 89 to 89½ cts. No. 2 Delaware red, 87 cts. bid. Sales of 1200 bushels No. 2 yellow corn in grain depot, at 52 cts., and 1200 bushels do. at 51½ to 51 cts. Oats.—Sales of No. 2 white, on track, at 35 cts. No. 3 white, at 32½ cts. Rejected white, at 29 cts.

Bee calf taken was 3½ cts. to 5½ cts. Sheep, 2 cts. to 4½ cts. Hogs, 7 cts. to 7½ cts.

The receipts on the 30th ult. were: Beeves, 2800; sheep, 13,000; hogs, 5000.

FOREIGN.—The withdrawal of Prince Alexander from Bulgaria, proves not to have been voluntary, but was forced upon him by a conspiracy. The deception practiced upon the people by the report that it was a voluntary act, has exasperated them, and a strong revulsion of feeling in favor of the Prince has taken place. The provisional government created by the Revolutionists was overthrown, and another formed in the name of Prince Alexander and the Bulgarian Parliament, which invited the return of their late ruler. On the 30th ult. he arrived at Sistova, on the northern border of Bulgaria, and received an enthusiastic welcome. The recent revolution was caused by Russian intrigues.

William E. Gladstone has issued a pamphlet of 58 pages on the Irish question, reviewing the discussions upon this subject, the results of the late election, and the policy of the present Government. He expresses the undoubted belief that a measure of self-government not less extensive than that proposed by himself during the present year, will eventually be carried.

A recent despatch from Glasgow says: Thirty-four steamers and twenty-three sailing vessels are rotting at their docks, having been idle some two years. This state of affairs is attributed to low freights and the general depression in business.

General Buller has been sent to Ireland. In an interview in relation to his duties in County Kerry, he said: "I wish to distinctly state, that I have not accepted a draughting mission, nor shall I assist in evictions. My task will be simply to repress moonlighters and ensure the safety of life and property."

A number of men who were engaged in recent rioting in Belfast, have been sentenced to imprisonment for periods of from two to nineteen months. Further disorder is feared.

Violent earthquake shocks were felt on the 28th ult. in Egypt, Greece, Italy, and the surrounding region. At least six towns in Greece were entirely destroyed, and a score of others were partially destroyed. On the main land much damage was done, but there was little loss of life. On the islands it is estimated that 600 persons were killed and 1000 seriously injured.

The Greek Cabinet is sitting in Athens almost continually, devising relief measures. Little damage to life appears to have taken place in Italy, though the population of many of the towns in southern Italy were panic stricken and took refuge in fields and places of worship.

A despatch of the 29th, from Naples, states that "Vesuvius is again in a state of eruption. The people of Naples and Bari are fleeing to the country, or gathering in the open spaces to pray. At Bari the priests proclaim the earthquake a visitation of God."

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

During the summer the stage will connect on week days with the 7.7, 9.3, 2.47 and 4.55 trains from Broad St. Station to convey passengers to the school. Telegrams should be sent to West Chester via Western Union Telegraph Company, whence they will be sent to the school by telephone.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOLS.

These schools, under the care of the three Monthly Meetings of Friends of Philadelphia, will re-open in the new School-house 140 N. 16th St., above Arch, on Second-day, Ninth Mo. 13th, 1886.

The departments for Boys and Girls respectively remain under the care of their former Principals, John H. Dillingham and Mary W. Woolman, who are assisted by a corps of competent instructors. Two vacancies in the Girls' Department have been filled by the appointment of Jane J. Wetherell and Mary Anna Jones, who it is believed will form valuable additions to the working staff.

The Boys' Primary Department, so long under the efficient care of Susanna House, will be conducted by Elizabeth Warner. A Girls' Primary Department has been organized under the direction of Anna Yarnall, for some years an efficient teacher in the upper school.

The new School-house is well adapted for conducting a first class school; great care having been taken to provide all necessary comforts and conveniences. The heating and ventilation have been carefully attended to, and the cheerful and commodious character of the rooms, and the arrangements of the surrounding grounds are attractive. The scholars will have the benefit of Friends' Library, soon to be removed to a new building now being erected for its accommodation within the same enclosure as the School-house.

Children not members of our religious Society are admitted, and the attention of Friends and others is invited to these schools, which afford the opportunity for education free from the disadvantages which appertain to many seminaries. The terms are moderate, and our members who find the charges burdensome may be fully relieved.

The School-house will be open daily from and after the first of Ninth Month, from 9 A. M. to 12 M., and 3 to 5 P. M., when teachers will be in attendance to give information and receive applications for admission.

Further information may be obtained from JOHN W. BIDDLE, Treasurer of the Committee, No. 119 S. Fourth St.

CORRECTIONS.—In the last issue, or No. 4, of "The Friend," page 25, 5th line from top of middle column, for continued, read cautioned.

In "A Trip to the Saguenay," on page 26 of last number, the date of the letter should have been Seventh Mo. 27th, instead of Seventh Mo. 29th.

DIED, at Old Mission, Michigan, the 18th of Sixth Mo. 1886, HANNAH G. MATHER, a member of Chicago Monthly Meeting, Ill., in her 89th year. She was born in Connellsville, Penna., the 23rd of Third Month, 1798, and removed to Kaskaskia, Illinois, in the first quarter of the century. After her marriage she moved to Springfield. The Society of Friends, of which her ancestors for many generations were members, had then no organized meeting in Illinois, except one in Vermillion County, and not until she removed late in life to Chicago, did she enjoy the privilege of uniting regularly in the public worship of the Society. So far as possible, however, she identified herself with the church of her birth and connections; and at great inconvenience, when far advanced in life, made long and painful journeys to attend Yearly Meetings. She availed herself of all proper occasions to disseminate the principles of Friends, subscribing for their publications and circulating their books, tracts and documents, where these principles were not generally understood. She was an active promoter, in a quiet unostentatious way, of many religious and charitable enterprises. Her practical sympathies were especially enlisted in behalf of the orphan, the destitute and the oppressed, and many of these remain to cherish and bless her memory. In a serene old age, surrounded by those whom she reared from infancy, and upon whom she leaned in her declining years, her tranquil and loving spirit passed to the unseen world in full assurance of an abundant entrance into the mansion prepared for her by her Heavenly Father, upon whose mercy alone she trusted for pardon and forgiveness.

—, on the 4th of Eighth Month, 1886, MIRIAM, wife of Charles Britton, and daughter of the late Moses Hall, in the 65th year of her age, a member and elder of Rich Square Monthly Meeting of Friends, N. C. She was warmly attached to the doctrines and practices of early Friends. She was a woman of a meek and quiet spirit, and ever ready to relieve the needs and sufferings of others, as far as ability would admit. Although the call was sudden and unlooked for, her friends and relatives have the assurance that she has reached that home where the weary are at rest.

—, at Germantown, Philadelphia, on the 20th of Sixth Month, 1886, after a short illness, SAMUEL B. MORRIS, son of Elliston P. and Martha C. Morris, in the eighteenth year of his age. In the removal of this dear young man, whose opening powers gave promise of a life of usefulness and virtue, his sorrowing friends have the consoling belief that through redeeming love and mercy, when the solemn end came, all was well.

—, at Haddonfield, New Jersey, on the 8th of the Eighth Month, 1886, HANNAH G. EVANS, an esteemed elder of Haddonfield Monthly Meeting of Friends, in the 78th year of her age.

Sixth Mo. 1st, 1837. Our Monthly Meeting held at Plymouth—a season of sweet refreshment. There was that to be felt, which bore evidence the dear Master was in the midst, and was pleased afresh to anoint his servant, E. C., to speak to some of our states in a very plain searching manner. He arose with "The words of a great and wise king who, after writing and speaking a great deal, summed up the whole with, 'Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man.'" He then went on to show how pure and undivided the love to our God must be, to be able to keep all his commands, to give up all that He may call for! for if we are found reserving anything called for, then we have other lovers, that are stealing our affections from Christ, the first to be beloved. He seemed to fear this was too much the case with some of us; like one formerly we had been enquiring, "what we should do to inherit eternal life?" but when the terms were shown us, there had been a "turning away sorrowful." Oh, how feelingly did he plead with such, if any such there were! assuring there was no other way to the kingdom, than that which has been laid down before us by Christ and his Prophets and Apostles; and if we really feared and loved our dear Lord, we would be found ready and willing to accept of the terms. To me it was an instructive communication; and one I desire to profit by, as there has been too much of a secret withholding, though I trust not through wilful disobedience.

11th. On taking my seat in meeting this morning, I found that unless there was a watching unto prayer, and with the whole heart, the enemy would enter. That of presenting ourselves before the Lord, and then not found waiting upon Him, is a very serious thing. It is a state I have painfully witnessed of late: often sitting whole meetings through, mourning the absence of Him whom my soul loveth.

Seventh Mo. 4th. Came to the city, and on First-day morning attended the meeting at Orange Street: where the feeble aspirations of my heart were for even the smallest crumb of heavenly bread. Oh! the hungering and thirsting for the word of life, and for a renewed evidence of the Divine will concerning me. The greater part of the meeting was sat through in solemn silence; when our dear friend, R. Shober, arose with a language of sweet encouragement for some then present, who were endeavoring to bear the cross of Christ; which, to the wise of this world, might seem a hard attainment, but to the poor and simple-hearted it would continue to be a very plain and easy way. Said she could not express what she had felt for some then present amongst the young people, who were going quietly along, being almost afraid to take another step, fearing they should bring a reproach on the precious cause. How sweetly did she impress it upon us, to be faithful to manifested duty, and unto death. Then, a crown of life should be ours. In the afternoon attended the meeting at Arch Street. Samuel Bettle was led to minister in a very instructive manner, on the nature of true Christian faith. He represented, that in the days when our dear Lord was personally on earth, there were those He could not minister unto, on account of their unbelief; even so it was in the present day; there is a faith which may be called a dead faith, which is easily attained, and which he feared too many of us were resting satisfied in; but which we should find would not stand us instead in a day of trial, which, sooner or later, must overtake us all. Our foundations would not then stand, because not built upon that rock, Christ Jesus, which is the alone sure foundation. Hence the necessity of true living faith, that we may have something sure to lean upon, when trials do come. He seemed to think there were those present, who had of late been much tried! For these a watchful, prayerful state was recommended; with the exhortation to strive to put on the whole armor of light, and above all, the shield of faith, so as to be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked one, seeking to follow our dear Lord in the way He is pleased to lead us. Then, however great our trials, He will be near, supporting by his invincible arm of power; and we shall find Him an holy High Priest, touched with a feeling of our infirmities; and who, in his own time, will administer beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness.

Third-day. Being still in the city, I attended North Meeting; where we had the company and labors of our dear friend Wm. Evans. My heart rejoiced to see this friend come in and take a seat amongst us. I always esteem it a great favor to be in company with W. E., particularly when thus met. His manner of "silent waiting" in our religious meetings, is very instructive and always loud preaching to me.

Near the close of the meeting he arose with, "Satan hath desired to have you that he may sift you as wheat, but I have prayed for thee Simon, that thy faith fail not." Our dear Lord and Master knew the weakness of human nature; and when, afterwards, Peter had so far forsaken Him as to deny Him, his love was still towards him. For it is written, "He turned and looked upon Peter." And what deep remorse did this excite! causing him to turn away and weep bitterly. And so it is with all the disobedient children, who go counter to the commands of their dear Lord and Master. What was written afore-time, was written for our learning; and he believed a lesson of deep instruction was to be gained from this account we have left of Peter. He greatly desired the faith of some present might be strengthened. That however severe their trials might be, yet there is One who remains able, and can as in a moment change the dispensation, giving the "oil of joy for mourning;" and these trials and afflictions, which seem now too heavy to be borne, will be as jewels about their necks. He continued to urge these to try to be willing to part with all the dear Master calls for: to be found watching unto prayer, so that they may be able to maintain the warfare; and then if faithful, when done with time here, they will be permitted to join those who have come through great tribulations, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. The secret language of my heart at this time is, what shall I render unto the Lord for all his mercies!

16th. Attended the meeting at Horsham, which was truly small. How did I crave for this little company, while sitting in silence with them, that they might be preserved as in the hollow of our Heavenly Father's hand; and that they might be enabled to offer unto Him acceptable worship.

27th. Attended the meeting at Westtown School. I was made sensibly to feel the watchful care of a kind Providence over this place.

30th. Went to our own little meeting, secretly craving to be found in my place. In measure this was granted; so much so that my meeting was a precious one. I do believe that the dear Master is waiting to bless us, if we will only come unto him. "Oh! for a closer walk with God."

Eighth Month 3rd. Monthly Meeting held at Plymouth. E. C. was led to call our attention to the shortness and uncertainty of life, and the need of a preparation for our final change.

My feelings seemed afresh awakened, in the last meeting, to the lowness of the answer to the 1st query, in regard to sleeping in meetings. I was led to query in myself, how can any present themselves before the All Seeing as worshippers, and then sleep away the time! If we were as weighty in our spirits as we ought to be, Satan would hardly dare tempt us. But truly, "The flesh is weak!"

11th. At our Quarterly Meeting yesterday, we had the company and labors of our friends John Letchworth, Wm. Evans and Ebenezer Roberts. Dear John pressed upon us the necessity of improving the talents committed to us, if but the one. Ebenezer's concern seemed chiefly for those in the middle walks of life, who had around them young and rising families. Represented the great responsibility that rested upon them, and how needful that their example might speak as loud as precept; both showing that the whole bent and aim of the mind was, to seek first the kingdom of heaven. He urged to diligence in the attendance of all our meetings, taking our precious children with us—their young minds being often very susceptible of tender feelings. In the last meeting, the subject still remaining with him, he could not feel clear without coming into womens' meeting, and pressing the same more closely upon mothers. Some in an especial manner who, he feared, were not as careful as they ought to be; but who, even in very young years, dressed and adorned them with things which in after life they could not restrain them in; thus throwing the reins upon their children's shoulders. He queried, if such parents are not more faithful, what answer will they give when the language goes forth, what hast thou done with those lambs I committed to thy care? Will not the reply necessarily be, whilst I was going hither and thither, and taken up with other things, they have been too much overlooked. To these, awful will the consequence be; as the parents lives may be required for their children's. He seemed to think some among the dear children had seen, as Jacob saw, a ladder reaching from earth to heaven; and that their journey thither is as step by step. If obedience keep pace with knowledge, making to themselves no secret reserves, such will be led safely along. And could these do no more, or have nothing more said or required of them than was formerly of a prophet in Israel on this wise: "There is Elisha, who poured water on the hands of Elijah," it will not lose its reward thus to strengthen the hands of your elder friends, which so hang down.

W. E. spake at considerable length from: "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straightened till it be accomplished!" &c. Enlarging instructively.

A Trip to the Saguenay.

Tadousac, Eighth Mo. 3d, 1856.

My last letter was commenced as we steamed along the St. Lawrence River with the magnificent slope of the north shore constantly in view; but this evening we seek the genial warmth of a fine wood stove in the upper hall of the Tadousac hotel for our place of writing. Taking a slip from books, rather than observation, the hydrographical basin of the St. Lawrence proper is about 900 miles, by 250 broad; but the land drainage is 400,000 square miles, and the lake area over 130,000 more.

A range of mountainous country rises on either side of the lower end. The Laurentides on the north, and the mountains of Notre Dame on the south. The Southern range leaves the river about 100 miles below Quebec; at Quebec it is about 30 miles from the river and at Montreal 50, when it becomes known as the Green Mountains, and as it goes south-westward becomes the Alleghenies and the Appalachian Chain, preserving some of its characteristics as far as Alabama.

The Northern range leaves the St. Lawrence about 20 miles below Quebec, is distant from it at Montreal about 30 miles; extends up the Ottawa on the north side about 100 miles, sweeps thence round to the Thousand Islands, near Kingston, thence to Georgian Bay and along the eastern and northern shores of Lake Huron and Lake Superior, and turns north-westward to the Arctic Ocean, extending from Labrador 3,500 miles.

Few persons care to follow the full length of these ranges; but the portions which form the banks of the St. Lawrence River, in fitting complement to that majestic stream of one to fifteen miles and over in width, are worthy the labor of the lover of natural scenery, to reach and sail between them. The scenery would be lost to the tourist if the boats followed the middle of the stream, but skirting as they do on either side, the panorama of the mountainous river bank, now in easy slopes of cultivable lands, with farm houses and green fields far up the heights, and now with rocky wall and inhospitable regions and jutting peaks 1000 to 2000 feet high, affords a pleasing and inspiring memory on which the mind may dwell for many a day.

The St. Lawrence boats are necessarily good, staunch boats, adapted for the occasional seas that raise upon the waters and to stem the swift currents of the river; and though not large, are comfortable for passengers. The dining cabin of our boat was fragrant with the spruce boughs which hung profusely on the side; and among the boughs we perceived the flags of the three nations—England, France and America. The table is very fair, one item in particular, some strawberries of fine flavor and great size, the circumference of the largest one, which we measured, lacking only an eighth of an inch of being 6 inches, and making four pieces of reputable size for a mouthful.

The day was all that could be desired, and the company intelligent and generally agreeable and ready to communicate. We stopped at one or two landings—one of which was a pier and lighthouse in the river—the town, St. Pierre, in a bay further in shore, being reached by lighters and sail boats. As the tides rise 20 feet in these waters, the piers are high and contain a sloping alley-way or passage of steps, which at low tide are reached by long planks from the boat, and make a steep ascent to the wharf above. The landings at high tide being made at other parts of the piers.

The principal stopping place was Murray Bay, a watering place of considerable resort for citizens of Quebec and Montreal. Riviere du Loup was reached about 5 o'clock, and then the river was diagonally crossed for the entrance to the Saguenay, 20 miles distant.

The entrance of the Saguenay might easily be missed by unfamiliar mariners in these waters, because of the relative positions of the high rocky shores at the mouth and along its course, the latter closing the line of sight by crossing the line of opening; but two lighthouses at base of the rocks on the upper side, and a prominent land mark of slat work on top the rocks on the lower, serve as guide posts easily seen. A sense of awe is due to the scene as the boat approaches the river and enters upon these waters to which there is no anchorage and whose banks are walls of rock. It was nearly dark when we reached the wharf for Tadousac at the mouth of the Saguenay, and quite dark when we left it to continue our journey up the river.

There being no shallow water in the river, the pilots have no fears of navigation at night; no lighthouses mark the banks, and the fishermen and lumbermen's houses are few and far between, but the mountain tops are well defined in the darkest nights, and even in fog the boats can here run by the sound of the swash on the rocks as they pass along.

The scenery being shrouded we turned in for the night; but two of us turned out about 2 A. M. at Chicoutimi, the extreme limit of the voyage, but the wharf view hardly paid for the energy. The boat again lay at Ha Ha Bay, further down, in the early morning, and a ride to the village was had on a buckboard, whose owner entertained us in broken French and English, and returned us to the boat refreshed by the pure mountain air.

About 8 o'clock we left Ha Ha Bay, and then came the climax of our journey, the ride down the Saguenay—favored as we were with the finest of weather, a boon not always experienced in this region of easy raining, and abundance of fogs and mists.

For 60 miles through the Laurentian range, cut transversely with the ridges, flows this remarkable stream of the American continent, and the succession of rocky palisades, moss-covered bluffs, wooded ravines, towering peaks, picturesque terraces, silvery cascades, sunny nooks, charming bays, which mile by mile reveals, can not adequately be described. Trinity Rock, a prominent feature with a rather farfetched name, given because of three terraces near the base, has been adorned as some may think with a wooden figure intended to represent the Virgin, but to others the monument of the Creator's power needs no embellishment by man, and the image is out of keeping with the place. Cape Eternity, close by, is 1800 feet high, and the boat sweeps into Eternity Bay, that these majestic rocks of sublime proportions, towering far above our little craft, may be enjoyed to the full. The whistle, too, is sounded in this bay for the sake of the many echoes from distant hills, the effect of which is very fine.

A bucket of stones provided on the capstan, furnishes materials for throwers to try their skill at reaching the rocks which seem so near; with the result of much oftener seeing a splash of the waters where they fall, than hearing a rattle of them against the rocks—so deceiving is the distance.

The captain stated the water at these rocks is 250 fathoms or 1500 feet deep, and that at Tadousac it is 380 fathoms; whereas in the channel in the St. Lawrence it is only 22 fathoms. The Saguenay is therefore a chasm of great depth and is supposed to be the result of volcanic action rather than the bursting through of pent up waters or the erosion of a flowing river. It is generally pleasant to believe what we hear, and these great depths might be accepted as reliable coming from a navigator of the river, but many a pretty picture has to be spoiled, and a practical government navigation chart hung in the ball of this hotel, gives figures about one-half of those of the captain. The discrepancies, however, are easily accounted for, if in the one case heavy cords or ropes and inadequate weights, which would be greatly affected by deep swift currents were used; and in the other the fine instruments of a scientific corps of coast surveyors.

There is a liability of exaggeration in most minds when describing the marvellous, and the high banks are deceptive for judging of the widths of the Saguenay. I was interested in hearing a fellow-passenger as we entered the river, explain to another that it was much wider than it looked, that it did not appear over a mile wide and was really three. Our judgment is that the river is not as wide as the Delaware at Philadelphia. In early life I was under the impression that the Delaware was a mile wide, but measurements on the ice a few years ago, took off 33 to 50 per cent. of the tradition. There is, however, enough of the marvellous about the Saguenay to be had within the confines of the strictest accuracy. The sides of the river for the whole of the distance we travelled are well wooded, but the trees are probably not good timber in the eye of a lumberman, for we learned from one whose firm owned 18 saw-mills, that a mile from the river there was very good timber.

The land belongs to the Government, and is leased to the lumbermen on terms varying with the value of the timber. A price per square mile for the timber leave is fixed as a minimum by the Government, and what is called a Limit is then put up at public sale, and the highest bidder not less than the "upset" price, as it is called, secures the control of the Limit. Besides this bonus, which may vary from a few dollars to several hundred dollars per square mile, a rental of two dollars per square mile per annum is paid, and also a royalty upon every log cut. The Limits taken by the firm alluded to are now about 5,000 square miles, and their annual dues to the Government 40 to 50,000 dollars. The logs are cut 13½ feet long, and must be not less than 12 inches on the stump. The fee of the land remains with the Government.

There are a few settlements on the river. Chicoutimi has saw-mills of note, and so has Ha Ha Bay, and there is a very large one at St. Jean, some miles above Tadoussac. Formerly many small mills were established at small mountain streams along the river, but these are being abandoned, and the logs floated to the larger mills.

Excepting the few points alluded to, the country is uninhabited save as the lumbermen are scattered through the woods back of the river, cutting the trees in the winter and working them out on the snow and by the streams towards spring.

Our voyage in this wilderness region, but region of absorbing interest, closed by our reaching this place about one o'clock on the 31st, and it was pleasant to halt at the end of the week at a comfortable house on land, and rest the mind from even scenery-viewing of so grand a scale.

For "The Friend."

Perhaps it may be interesting to some of the readers of "The Friend," in connection with the testimony of Lewes and Chichester Monthly Meeting concerning the late Daniel Pryor Haek, which appeared in No. 4, to be informed of some particulars of a visit which the writer made to him rather less than three weeks before his decease.

It was her privilege to be present at Brighton Meeting on First-day morning, the 14th of Second Month, when this dear aged friend, who had recently been quite ill, was present, and as the testimony states, "spoke with much freshness," entering into sympathy with the discouraged ones, who were "going heavily on their way because of the oppression of the enemy," offering to them "a message of cheer;" and also very sweetly addressing the young. It seemed as though it might be the winding up of his public service as a minister, and so it proved.

The following day a social call was made upon him, in which he expressed his love for American Friends and his gratitude to them for their kindness to his grandmother, Mary Pryor, when on a religious visit to this country. He spoke of her with much affection, and related some interesting circumstances connected with her voyage. Soon after leaving port, the vessel was found not to be sea-worthy, and it became necessary to work the pumps. As the water gained upon them, the crew became much discouraged. Mary Pryor having been favored with an assurance from her Lord and Master, that they would be saved, encouraged them to continue their efforts. One morning when their hope was almost extinct, she came out of her cabin, where she had been in retirement, and with a placid countenance and cheerful voice told them, that before the day closed, a vessel would be sent to their relief; and said, that if the female passengers would tell her their last names, she believed she would be able to tell them the name of the vessel. They commenced to do this, and when the name Archobald was mentioned she said, that was the name.*

The day wore on, and no ship came, but her faith was firm, and encouraged by her, the sailors continued to work the pumps. At last a speck was descried in the distance, which proved to be a vessel, but for some time there was no evidence that the almost sinking ship was observed by those on board of her; still they persevered in displaying signals of distress, and were finally gladdened by observing that she was bearing towards them. It proved, however, to be a small vessel, and for a time fears were entertained that they could not be safely taken on board; they were rather short of provisions and water for themselves, but finally the captain of the Archobald, as the name of the vessel proved to be, offered, if his crew and all were willing to go on short allowance, he would do the same: this was acceded to, and the work of transfer was quickly commenced. Mary Pryor, after having left the vessel, remembered a letter or package or both, that she was taking from Thomas Scattergood (then in England on a religious visit) to his wife, and insisted on returning to her room for it, which she did in safety, but was completely wet by a wave breaking over her, and having no change of clothes, was obliged to wear her wet garments—yet took no cold. The captain gave up his room to her and treated her with much kindness; he was a serious, thoughtful man, different from the captain of the other vessel, who was an irreligious character.

Two hours after all had been safely transferred, the disabled vessel sank beneath the waves. It was three weeks before the Archobald reached Philadelphia. Upon their landing, Mary Pryor knelt upon the wet ground and returned thanks to the Almighty Father for their preservation; also asking a blessing upon the captain.

The circumstances in relation to the name of the vessel were corroborated some years after. Some English persons who, if memory is not at fault, were friends or neighbors of Mary Pryor, having recently landed at Philadelphia, observed a garden containing very fine fruit, and enquiring the name of the owner, were informed that it was Archobald, and learned further that his wife was the female passenger of that name who was on board the vessel with Mary Pryor.

Before leaving, a feeling not at our command, spread over the little company gathered around the fireside of this beloved father in the Truth, and after a season of precious silence, he addressed us, commencing with the language, "The Lord is good, a stronghold in the day of trouble, and He knoweth them that trust in Him." While speaking very humbly of himself, as a poor creature, he commemorated the mercy and faithfulness of his Heavenly Father towards him all his life long, and encouraged to trust in Him amid all life's trials and vicissitudes.

It was a season not soon to be forgotten, and as we tenderly bade each other farewell, it was felt to have been a privilege to have been under his roof and to have sat by his side. The humility and tenderness of his spirit were very precious, and his greenness in old age instructive and encouraging, bringing forth fruit to the praise of his Lord and Master, continuing faithful unto the end. E. A.

* An account of Mary Pryor's shipwreck, and the attendant circumstances, is contained in the Memorials of Rebecca Jones, which substantially agrees with that related by her grandson to our correspondent. It however states that there was no other female passenger but herself; this appears to have been a mistake.

An Avalanche.

Hotel Victoria, Interlaken, Switzerland,
June 28, 1886.

The avalanche about to be described, started just below the peak of the Silberhorn, a few minutes before midday. At that hour the sun was beginning to make his rays felt in the frozen bosom of the Jungfrau. The Silberhorn, you know, is the showiest ornament of that most bewitching of mountains. It is a pyramid in shape and has a surface like frosted silver. The pyramidal angles are so sharp that the ice and snow are always about to slide off, and, when the afternoon sun shines straight and hot upon them, the watcher for avalanches is never disappointed. I had been staring at the dazzling Jungfrau through smoke-colored glasses for some time and waiting for the show to begin.

Suddenly there was a gleam as of particles in motion on a part of the Silberhorn at which I had often looked with keen expectations. For just there could be discerned, without a glass, a series of long parallel scratches such as avalanches always make. There are the grooves in which, like many human institutions, they may be said to run from year to year by force of habit. The rate of the motion was so slow and indeterminate—for a reason which I afterward found out—that one night, for a moment, question if the shining atoms were not stationary after all. But no! though the pace seemed to be that of a snail, it was real and downward, and was soon too accelerated to be mistaken. The whole breadth of one side of the Silberhorn was moving beyond a doubt. I was witnessing the sublime spectacle of a great avalanche. More swiftly it descended and yet it seemed to crawl. In this way it slid along for a short distance—about 2,000 feet as I afterward learned—when the mass fell over a jutting piece of ice or rock. Then it looked something like a waterfall. Below was another steep slope scored with the furrows of old avalanches. Here the motion was more rapid, but still surprisingly slow. Then and not before I heard a sound as of thunder. If the sky had not been one unspotted blue, I should have supposed a storm to be bursting somewhere among the mountains. It was the noise of the avalanche, at that moment reaching my ears from a distance, which was so deceptive. Later on, studying the phenomena of avalanches more deliberately, I ascertained that the scene of action—apparently not more than half a mile off—was often seven miles and never less than three. By noting the avalanche at the instant of its birth and counting the seconds of time till the first boom reported itself, one can calculate this with sufficient accuracy.

The Silberhorn, being many miles from my stand-point in an air line, it follows that the terms "small" or "slow" used in connection with its avalanches are irrelevant. The breadth of the falling mass should be expressed in rods and not in feet. Its movement was exceedingly swift. What seemed to start as snow was, in fact, a great ice cake, acres in extent and perhaps fifty feet thick. This, striking against rocks in its course, broke into fragments which were indistinguishable in the distance. The apparent waterfall was composed chiefly of large lumps of ice. These were destined to be pulverized in good earnest as they continued their descent. Then I heard a sound as of hissing mingled with the deeper reverberations. A short distance—more than a thousand feet probably—was thus traversed when the avalanche entered upon another stage of its career. It tumbled over another ridge—this time looking more like a waterfall than before. Here its volume was much contracted and I could clearly see that this fact was due to the depth of the rock-bound channels through which it ran. Then it sprawled quite freely over a great open space or plateau, where it rested and formed a perceptible heap, thick at the centre and flattening out gradually toward the edges. Judging by the dimensions of this mass by my revised standards, I should say that it covered many acres, and was deep enough to bury an Alpine village of the average size.

As the sun sank toward the west, and the increasing heat loosened the icy girdles of the Jungfrau, the Monch and the Eiger, the avalanches came rattling down with increasing frequency. They usually resembled cascades from beginning to end. Rarely could one see the popular idea of an avalanche realized. Most people, I find, think of avalanches as broad tracks of snow which are transferred from the upper part of a mountain into a valley at its foot, keeping their general shape all the way. The Silberhorn specimen corresponded to this ideal for a short distance, as I have said. But all the others trickled down in a water-like way from top to bottom. The behavior of the falling ice and snow was so much like that of water that one could be convinced that he was beholding an avalanche only when he saw what took place at its terminus. For, in five cases out of six, the icy torrent ended in a white heap, which still remained far up the mountain sides, though below the true snow line. Except that they lacked the well-known green tint, the tracts of snow and ice thus deposited looked like glaciers. Brooks ran from the lower end of them into the valleys far beneath.

The grooves—or deeply worn passage ways—through which these avalanches descend, seem as if made by human hands. Some of them ran as straight as bowling alleys. Others have easy and graceful curves, as if laid out for a railway. But, almost without an exception, the transit of the avalanche from peak to base, is interrupted by narrow-rock gorges. Against these it dashes itself with a fury expressed to my ear by a sound like that of a small cannon, which is heard far above the rest of the racket. The latter generally reminds one of the irregular firing of infantry, and appears to be produced by the larger fragments of ice and the stones, which are brought down with the lighter material. It is only an avalanche of the broadest pattern that initiates the deep roll of thunder.

The guides of Grindelwald, and of all this region, are lithe and sinewy, with frank, resolute faces. They mostly dress in corduroy velveteen, with slouch hats of the same. Their yellow beards sweep their breasts. A provokingly slow gait also identifies them. They walk—unless under the spur of necessity—about half as fast as the ordinary American or Englishman. A friend of mine, in tow of a guide, consumed six hours in the ascent of the Wengern Alp from Grindelwald. The usual time is only three. But he arrived at the top perfectly unblown, and then appreciated the wisdom of going slow. These men are very taciturn. They give opinions about the weather with great reluctance, if at all, and will not converse about anything while going up the hill. Thus they save their wind, the want of which is so trying to inexperienced Alpine tourists. But, what they lack in demonstrations they make up in essential service. They will stand by their employer in every tight place, and will rescue his remains and bear them back to the valley, if he persists in despising the guide's advice and is killed in consequence.

These trusty fellows make great friends of members of the Alpine Club, and are some times well paid for leaving their beloved Switzerland and aiding in the conquest of high mountains in the antipodes. One of the corps has visited both India and New Zealand for this purpose. He showed as much sagacity in attacking the redoubtable giants of those distant countries, as if he had known all about their weakest points from his infancy. In every case he took his patron successfully to the top, by a route which he instinctively chose as the easiest and the best. This guide returned home through London, and, while there, his employer made him the subject of an interesting experiment. One evening the man was asked to take a ride across London in a cab. He was driven a distance of many miles, and the route was designedly made as tangled and intricate as possible. Arriving at their destination—the house of an Alpine celebrity—the cab was dismissed. After a short detention, the guide was told to return with his employer through the same streets which they had traversed in their round about journey. And he did it without making a single mistake, although an entire stranger in the great city. The man had not the faintest suspicion that he would be asked to do this difficult thing. He had almost unconsciously “marked down” the whole labyrinthine route. He did in London exactly what he would have done without the least effort among the mountains of his native land. His observations and memory of trifles supplied the unerring clues by which he retraced his way through the maze of the metropolis.

THE BEST WINE LAST.

So Cana said; but still the first was good,
For skillful nature wrought her very best,
Turning the sunshine into hues of blood,
Bringing the ripened clusters to be pressed.

But this the Master brings; his silent eye
Flushes the sunshine of a loitering year.
Be still, O guests! for Heaven is passing by.
Bow down, O Nature! for your God is here.

And it is always so. Earth's joys grow dim,
Like waning moons they slowly disappear;
Our heavenly joys fill up the widening brim,
Ever more deep and full, more sweet and clear.

Sweet were his words, when o'er the mountain slope
He breathed his benedictions on the air;
Waking the sleeping angels, Faith and Hope,
Bidding them sing away the grief and care.

And yet, methinks, He speaks in sweeter tones
Out of the shadow of the nearing cross;
Telling of mansions and the heavenly thrones,
Which soon shall recompense for earthly loss.

The good, the better, and the last the best,—
This is the order of the Master's wine;
More than the yesterdays to-days are blest,
And life's to-morrows may be more divine.

And what beyond? Ah! eye hath never seen,
Ear hath not heard, the wonders that await;
Earth's lights are pale shadows to the sheen
Of untold glories just within the gate.

We bid thee, Master, come and be our guest!
Life's common things thou turnest into wine;
Our cares, our woes, our bitter tears, are blest,
If only thou dost cause thy face to shine.

'Tis our part
As Christians, to forget the wrongs we feel;
To pardon trespasses; our very foes
To love and cherish; to do good to all;
Live peaceably; and be, in all our acts,
Wise as the serpent, gentle as the dove.

A WONDERFUL THOUGHT.

BY SUSAN COOLIDGE.

The great round world is full of things,—
Not only armies and realms and kings,
And lands and seas and forests tall,
But little things, so small to see,
So many they cannot count be,
Yet, wonderful thought, the Lord knows all!

The wide-winged eagles He sees, and too
The tiny nest with its eggs so blue,
Which the meadow-lark has hidden close;
Not only the storm-cloud sweeping vast,
But the least dew-droplet, folded fast
In the bosom of the summer rose.

The filament fine of purpled gold,
On the crest of the butterfly one day old,
Is ordered and measured by his will;
He hears the thrill of the bobolink's song,
And, though the thunder be loud and long,
If the cricket chirps, He notes it still.

He counts each drop of the lifting wave,
Each grain of sand on each nameless grave;
Each blade and ear of the manifold grains;
He hears the sigh of the heart's unrest,
The laugh from the happy childish breast,
And the splash of a tear in the rush of the rains.

Oh wonderful thought, that He can know all,
Not only the mighty, but the small;
Not only the Alp, but each flake of its snows!
And He pities and pardons, and loves so well,
That you and I in the thought may dwell,
And not be afraid, though we know He knows.

A Serpent Among the Books.—One day, a gentleman in India went into his library and took down a book from the shelves. As he did so, he felt a slight pain in his finger, like the prick of a pin. He thought that a pin had been stuck by some careless person in the cover of the book. But soon his finger began to swell, then his arm, and then his whole body, and in a few days he died. It was not a pin among the books, but a small and deadly serpent.

There are many serpents among the books nowadays; they nestle in the foliage of some of our most fascinating literature; they coil around the flowers whose perfume intoxicates the senses. People read and are charmed by the plot of the story, by the skill with which the characters are sculptured or grouped, by the gorgefulness of the word-painting, and hardly feel the pin-prick of the evil that is insinuated. But it stings and poisons. When the record of ruined souls is made up, on what multitudes will be inscribed “Poisoned by serpents among the books.”

Let us watch against the serpents and read only that which is healthy, instructive and profitable.

Martin Farquhar Tupper's autobiography, in speaking of the dangers to which a writer's manuscripts are always open, tells us of a faithful maid arranging his study and always putting his papers in awful confusion. “Upon my cautioning her,” he says, “not to destroy anything, I was horrified by the reply, ‘O! sir! I never burns no paper but what is spoiled by being written on!’” And he goes on to say that in “prehistoric days when we sported with loose powder and shot and paper wadding, I was a guest for some days in September with James Maclaren at Ticehurst, and recollect his horror at finding that the luncheon sandwiches were wrapped in some of his most precious MSS.—for he was writing a treatise on finance, and those leaves were covered with calculations—and that his shooting-party were ramming down their charges with the recorded labor of his brains.”

For "The Friend."

An Address to the Younger Members of Canada Yearly Meeting and others.

Since my return from our (Canada) Yearly Meeting, my mind has been much with the younger members, particularly the female portion, and I now feel constrained, in gospel love, to address them through the columns of "The Friend," as truth may open the way.

The subject which has much occupied my mind is dress. As from time to time my mind has been drawn toward you, I have felt there were among us at that solemn assembly, some (perhaps a goodly number) who were under conviction on account of their present mode of dress—those who were dissatisfied with it, and were longing for the peace of mind which could only be obtained by yielding to Divine requirement in this matter, but who had not yet fully submitted their wills to their Heavenly Father's will; had not given themselves up into his hands, to be thoroughly cleansed, and so made willing to part with all for Him.

I have felt there were those present who were querying, "Cannot I serve God as well in this attire as in any other?" My dear sisters, (for amongst such I feel the queries have arisen,) would our dear Lord and Master, (who knows all the thoughts and intents of the heart,—who knows just what each one needs to prepare them for his service here, and a home with Him hereafter) require anything of you that was not really essential? Nay, verily, if He has seen meet to require this little sacrifice at your hands, nothing else will do: "Behold, obedience is better than sacrifice" (when obedience is all that is required), "and to hearken, than the fat of rams." Does the cross appear insurmountable? There is One who can change the cross to a pleasure.

As an example, let me mention the case of a young Friend, who, although through the judicious care of her parents in youth, and the greater restriction of her Heavenly Parent, for a short period, she had never run into such extremes as many, yet did not appear in the simple garb which her Lord and Master, whom she was desirous to serve faithfully, required she should. She was brought under deep exercise on this account. Her chief plea was, that she had just gotten a good supply of clothing, and her parents being in limited circumstances, she could not afford to lay it aside and get a new supply; but all the excuses which Satan suggested, would not bring peace of mind. Finally, her mind being sufficiently humbled, she was enabled to give herself up unreservedly into the Lord's hands promising to lay aside each superfluous article, as it was required of her. Immediately there overshadowed her a feeling of sweet peace, and she was assured that the will was all that was then required of her, and that as each article was to be disposed of, it was to be replaced by a plainer one. Such was the loving kindness of Him who was watching over her, that it was with pleasure she laid aside piece after piece; but not till her bonnets were finally past wear, and a plain one substituted, did she feel really comfortable. He who was mercifully pleased to give strength in this instance, is able and willing to do in your cases just as He sees meet, although it might not be just the same way as in this case.

If the plain dress is assumed in accordance with Divine command, and under a feeling of requirement, there will be strength given sufficient for the occasion.

Does it seem a little thing to cause so much concern of mind? Take it for granted, that if it cause so much concern, it is of greater moment than the spirit of the world supposes. There seems to me to be a querying as to whether the passage, "Come out from the world, and be ye separate," has any reference to dress. I think it has. We so often hear the plea, "Pride is not in the dress." No, it is not; if it were, it would not so interfere with peace of mind. Pride must be in the heart before it can show itself in the dress. If there is no pride present in the heart, why should we want to dress as people of the world, or those who apparently have no thought of their future state, or of what they are here for? Oh, vain dress! How much needless expense is put into it. If all would be content to dress simply, as becomes their poor decaying bodies, how many poor outcasts might be clothed and fed with the surplus!

Not only is there much needless expense put on dress, but also in the furnishing of our houses. I have reference just now more particularly to that portion of which the young women have control. How easy it is to run into "fashion" in this respect. One sees some dainty handiwork and wishes to imitate it, regardless of expense; so one thing after another finds its way to the walls, tables, mantles, &c., till, would we take the trouble to calculate the cost—to say nothing of the precious time spent on them—we would be surprised at the amount expended simply to please the eye.

I have limited my remarks to the female portion; but they have not been alone the subjects of my thoughts. How many of our young men could be distinguished as Friends? I am sorry to say, but a small per cent. Why is it so? Is it not for the same reason, viz: a want of dedication? a fear—must I say a cowardly fear—of taking up the cross, and appearing odd? Do I hear some one say, "My coat is as plain as so-and-so's. I see nothing gay in a collar and small lappel." I beseech thee, brother, look well into thy heart, and see if there is not a little pride there which prompts thee to choose thy present style in preference to a plain one.

Although there is not so much difference between the plain and fashionable dress of the male as the female sex, still there is a constant changing in some particulars, a something to engage the thoughts.

I fear there is in this day too much fear of being recognized by one's appearance as a Quaker. But what does our Saviour say? "Whosoever, therefore, shall be ashamed of me, and of my words, in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him also shall the Son of man be ashamed, when He cometh in the glory of his Father, with the holy angels."

We have been in the mixture so long as to materially weaken the youth; and in too many instances older ones, who should be examples of plainness and simplicity, have become "stumbling blocks" in the way of others. Is it not time for us to rid ourselves of this mixture and become once more the plain simple people we were formerly? None are too young or insignificant to add their mite in helping to rebuild the church from its present fallen condition to what the Lord would have it to be.

One young Friend, who believed it required of her to attend the Yearly Meeting, felt afterward that her going was in good measure as an example, and to strengthen some of those who were "halting between two opinions." If her presence had the desired effect, and she was thus made instrumental in helping any halting one to decide for Christ, to the expulsion of the world, she will be fully repaid for the exertion. How little we know what object the Lord may have in view, when He requires little sacrifices at our hands.

One young Friend told me that when under concern on account of her bonnet, she pleaded that there were others older, and holding higher positions in the church, who did not dress plainly. The answer she received was, "This is for a help to others;" and so it proved, for shortly after she gave up to the requirement, the very ones that had been thus in her way, were brought out in like manner. So we see it is for us to obey every intimation of duty, and leave the result with Him who knows us altogether better than we know ourselves.

My concern has not been confined to the members of Canada Yearly Meeting, but has extended to those of other meetings, particularly the isolated ones, many of whom are miles distant from any family of Friends; and to those also who are in even worse positions than these; for it does seem to me that those isolated ones are often more likely to adhere to the principles of our Society than those whose lots are cast with those bearing the name of Friends whilst holding doctrines and practices contrary thereto.

Rest assured, dear young brothers and sisters, that on this account you have the sincere sympathy of one at least; and I do not hesitate in saying, many fathers and mothers in Israel are yearning over the children with fervent desires that they may be enabled to bear the yoke in their youth, and so be prepared to fill the places of those who are dropping off one by one. We know that according to nature, there are many more whose stay with us must be short; but the Lord will have a people, and He who (as was declared by Christ himself) "is able of these stones to raise up children to Abraham," will, as you submit to his teaching, qualify you to fill the vacancies. Natural History, Science, &c.

Food Poisoning.—Dr. E. H. Bartley in the New York Medical Journal treats of the cases which are from time to time met with, where persons are made sick, or even lose their lives from partaking of food which is not usually regarded as unwholesome.

In many of these instances, he attributes the effect to the overeating of one particular dish; and quotes the case of a servant-girl, who attributed her sickness to ice-cream, and said, "I know it was the ice-cream, for I ate nothing else for dinner. I ate all I could."

There are other cases of undoubted poisoning due to changes in the food itself. Thus cucumbers, melons and some other vegetables have a tendency to develop a purgative principle when not fresh. Commencing decomposition in animal and vegetable food is liable to generate poisonous principles. It has been conclusively shown that certain substances when undergoing spontaneous putrefactive changes may develop alkaloid poisons of the most virulent nature. In most cases, the doctor thinks recent and thorough cooking will prevent the food from doing any serious damage. He says, "I have known whole families to be poisoned by a beef-steak, or by corned beef which had been cooked for a number of days and then left in the same vessel. Meats protected from the free supply of air are more likely to become poisonous than those freely exposed."

A Disappointed Spider.—While a gentleman was watching some spiders last summer, it occurred to him to try what effect a tuning fork would have on the insects. He suspected they would regard the sound just as they were in the habit of regarding the sound made by a fly. And sure enough they did. He selected a large spider, that was at one edge of its web. Sounding the fork, he touched a thread at the other side of the web, and watched the result. The spider had the buzzing sound conveyed to him over his telephone wires, but how was he to know of which particular wire the sound was travelling? He ran to the centre of the web very quickly, and felt all around until he touched a thread against the other end of which the fork was sounding; then taking another thread along, just as a man would take an extra piece of rope, he ran out to the fork and sprang upon it. But he retreated a little way, and looked at the fork. He was puzzled. He had expected to find a buzzing fly. He had caught the sound of a fly, but there was nothing to kill and eat!

A Weakness of Hearing.—The function of the human ear frequently fails; faintly-heard sounds, like that of the ticking of a watch, becoming wholly inaudible at irregular intervals. The intervals of silence have lately been found by A. Raggi to vary between seven and twenty-two seconds; while the periods of sound-perception are between seven and fifteen seconds in duration. The variation proves not to be due to extraneous sounds, nor to blood-circulation or respiration, but is supposed to result from inability to keep the attention long at sufficient tension to perceive faint sounds.

Night Air.—An extraordinary fallacy is the dread of night air. What air can we breathe at night but night air? The choice is between pure night air from without and foul air from within. Most people prefer the latter—an unaccountable choice. What will they say if it is proved to be true that fully one-half of all the diseases we suffer from are occasioned by people sleeping with their windows shut? An open window, most nights in the year, can never hurt any one. In great cities night air is often the best and purest to be had in twenty-four hours. I could better understand shutting the windows in town during the day than during the night, for the sake of the sick. The absence of smoke, the quiet, all tend to make night the best time for airing the patient. One of our highest medical authorities on consumption and climate has told me that the air of London is never so good as after ten o'clock at night. Always air your room, then, from the outside air if possible. Windows are made to open, doors are made to shut—a truth which seems extremely difficult of apprehension.

Every room must be aired from without, every passage from within.—Sanitary World.

Value of Grasses.—In a recent geological paper, Prof. J. Starkie Gardner sketched the value and importance of the grasses at the present day, remarking that they occupy under cultivation one-third of the entire area of Europe, inclusive of lakes and mountains, while, exclusive of malt and spirituous drinks distilled from them, their products to the value of nearly one hundred millions sterling are imported annually into England alone. There are over 3,000 species, fitted to occupy most diverse stations and to overcome nearly every kind of vegetable competition, with the result that about ninety-five per cent of the plants growing in ordinary meadow-land are grasses.

A Natural Trap.—A curious form of animal trap exists in the Santa Paula valley, Ventura County, California, where many unfortunate creatures are captured by small streams of thick mineral oil which flows from the mountain down ravines which are water courses in the wet season. Thus, it is stated on the authority of Prof. E. W. Hilgard, gophers, moles, squirrels, rabbits, all kinds of birds from the buzzard and hawk to the canary, as well as all kinds of insects, may be found just caught or completely submerged in the pitiless viscid mass, which rarely releases a victim once touched. The frequent occurrence of bones of lambs and calves proves that even larger animals are entrapped. It is supposed that the shining surface of the pitch gives the impression that the streams are water.

Crocodiles in Egypt.—It appears that the crocodile, like the faith which formerly esteemed it sacred, is practically extinct in Egypt. The steamers plying the Nile have had more effect in driving it from that river than the guns of sportsmen, according to Prof. A. H. Sayce.—Selected.

African Box-wood.—A new species of box-wood, from South Africa, has just been described by Sir Joseph Hooker under the botanical name of Buxus Macowani. As it is in considerable quantities and is suitable for engravers' uses, it may prove a valuable addition to the diminishing supplies of European box-wood. When seasoned without cracking the wood is valued at two cents a cubic inch.

Welsh Mountain Outcasts.—The Welsh Mountain is a high ridge of land lying on the border between Chester and Berks Counties, Pa., and extending a number of miles south-east into Lancaster County. It has long been noted as the residence of a poor and degraded class of people, both white and colored, many of whom are supposed to eke out their scanty means of subsistence by petty pilfering. There are said to be over 300 children growing up amid poor surroundings on the mountain. About a year ago, a First-day school was established among them by Price L. Supplee, and since then a day school has been established, which has about 30 scholars on its roll. Several persons have become interested in these neglected people, and efforts have been made to procure situations for some of suitable age, where they can be trained to useful labor away from evil associations. A Lancaster County paper says, that the Welsh Mountain country has for years cost the county about $3000 per annum in the way of criminal prosecutions.

The Saloon in Politics.—Under this heading the Western Friend argues that effective legislation on the temperance question cannot be expected from a party which must rely on its saloon votes to obtain a majority; and that officers elected by a divided party must partake of the spirit of compromise, and cannot be relied upon to enforce a law about which its members are divided in feeling. It comes to the conclusion that "prohibition, as the sentiment that would destroy the saloon and arrest its evil work, stands, for the time being, as the political representative of the principles of religion and good government."

—The Jewish Sabbath.—The Philadelphia Ledger says that the Jews are talking about changing the time of holding their Sabbath from the Seventh-day of the week to the First, beginning with the year 1900.

—The One Baptism.—In commenting on that text in the Ephesians, "One Lord, one faith, one baptism," E. L. Sherman, in the Church Union, refers to the outpouring of the Spirit at the day of Pentecost as an illustration of this baptism. He remarks: "Peter said, This is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel. And it shall come to pass in the last days (saith God) I will pour out of my spirit upon all flesh, &c., * * * I will pour out in those days of my spirit," &c. Acts ii, 16-18. Here is a baptism whose beginning is identical with that of the church, and this, too, a baptism so important as to have been the subject of prophecy and promise eight hundred years previously. This same baptism was not only promised by the Baptist, but by him declared to be superior to that he administered, in that he said, "I indeed have baptized you with water; but He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost." Mark i. 8. This statement of John was repeated by Christ in a promise made to his disciples after his resurrection. "For John truly baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost, not many days hence." Acts i. 5.

Acts 2nd records the fulfilment of these utterances. Thus Joel eight hundred years, John three years, and Jesus a few days preceding the event, all prophesied or promised this baptism by the Spirit at the beginning of Christ's kingdom.

Pentecost did not witness the completion of the Spirit baptism, for it is not to be completed, until the last convert shall have been brought into the church. At Pentecost the mighty wave of grace started, which has rolled on by Cesarea, Samaria, Corinth, Ephesus and Rome; over mountains and across oceans; to Britain, America and the isles of the sea, and destined to continue until it shall deluge the whole earth and baptize all generations of men. Is not this the one baptism, of the one church, whose gracious influence is co-extensive with the one faith?

—Spread of Christianity.—An illustration of the silent spread of gospel influence in lands where Christianity is contending with deep-rooted systems of false religions, is seen in a reference to the effects of the Christian religion in India, made by one of the missionaries of the American Board, who is laboring in the Madras district. He says: "To those who engage in this work, it is evident that Christianity and Western civilization have been widely and deeply influential during the last few years in moulding Hindu society. The old idea of polytheism is rapidly giving way to monotheistic conceptions. It is true that many try to harmonize these conceptions with idolatry; but the two cannot possibly long exist together, and idolatry will in time be relegated by all, even as it is by the educated Hindu, to the class of effete and antiquated things. The strong grip of caste is also relaxing, and people are not so isolated and sectional in their feelings as they once were. At least, this is true of the central towns."—S. S. Times.

—Political Influence of Catholic Countries.—Look at the world as a whole, and you will see four Powers, and only four, which are showing signs of progress at the present time—Germany, Russia, England and the United States. None of these are Roman Catholic nations. If you add Italy to these you must also add that Italy began to progress from the moment she set herself to destroy the temporal power of the Pope. On the other hand, if you are to ask for conspicuous examples of nations fallen from their high estate as arbiters of the destinies of Europe, you at once think of Austria, France and Spain, and all these Powers, so far as they have any religious creed at all, are Roman Catholic.—Professor Lias.

Praying without ceasing.—Under this heading an editorial article in a late number of The Independent responds to the request of a correspondent who desired an explanation of the meaning of the Apostle's command, "Pray without ceasing."

This subject is instructively treated of by Robert Barclay, in the Proposition on Worship, the 11th of his Apology. In this, after stating that man cannot offer true prayer without the concurrence and assistance of the Spirit of Christ, he distinguishes between inward and outward prayers and says:—

"Inward prayer is that secret turning of the mind towards God, whereby being secretly touched and awakened by the light of Christ in the conscience, and so bowed down under a sense of its iniquities, unworthiness and misery, it looks up to God, and, joining with the secret shavings of the Seed of God, it breathes towards Him, and is constantly breathing forth some secret desires and aspirations towards Him. It is in this sense that we are so frequently in Scripture commanded to pray continually; which cannot be understood of outward prayer, because it were impossible that men should be always upon their knees, expressing words of prayer; and this would hinder them from the exercise of those duties no less positively commanded. Outward prayer is, when as the Spirit being thus in the exercise of inward retirement, and feeling the breathing of the Spirit of God to arise powerfully in the soul, receives strength and liberty by a superadded motion and influence of the Spirit to bring forth either audible sighs, groans, or words, and that either in public assemblies, or in private.

"As then inward prayer is necessary at all times, so long as the day of every man's visitation lasteth, he never wants some influence, less or more, for the practice of it; because he no sooner retires his mind, and considers himself in God's presence, but he finds himself in the practice of it."

The views of the Editor of The Independent, while expressed in different language, largely coincide with the above quotations. He says that formal or outward prayer is not the only way in which the soul holds communion with God. "Prayer is an attitude of the soul towards God, . . . it is spiritual thought and purpose and resolve." "It is not different in its essential nature from faith and love. A man of faith is a man whose faith dominates his life. It is not that he is always saying to himself: 'I believe this or that statement that is made to me; but I believe in God, trust Him, love, honor and try to obey Him in all things, and so regulate my life that whether I eat or drink, or whatsoever I do, I may do it unto God.'"

"We live by breathing; but we are not always conscious of the exercise of respiration." "It is even so with prayer. It is the soul's confidence and spirit of communion with God." "It is a kind of communion which goes on within us, entirely independent of what we may be doing in other directions. Even while writing this article—yea at this very moment—we are conscious of a prayer going up to God that he will direct us in our writing, that our teaching may be true and helpful. Such prayer does not interfere with the flow of thought, but rather helps it on.

We pray while we are preaching, albeit the congregation will speak of the long prayer or the short prayer of the preacher before the sermon. The fact is, these were special acts of prayer; but the preacher was in prayer during the whole service. While he was speaking to the people with his mouth his spirit was making prayer to God, and sometimes with an agony of importunity which only God the Holy Ghost could inspire or know. The old anecdote of the housemaid who, as she swept the house, said in her heart, 'Lord, sweep my heart of all dust and uncleanness' while she laid the table for dinner, said, 'Lord, clothe my soul in fine and clean linen, even as this cloth is fine and white and clean; and even as I spread and furnish this table, so spread the table of thy delights for me always, and let me eat and drink at thy board'; who, when she washed her hands or face, declared, that she always prayed in her heart that God would cleanse her and make her every whit whole—this is to continue in prayer and be instant in prayer and to watch unto prayer.

"It is to the loss and damage of many Christians that this habit of continuing 'instant in prayer' and 'praying without ceasing' is not cultivated. No tongue can tell the spiritual benefit of such a habit. How it baffles Satan and keeps him at a proper distance! How it keeps the soul in fresh and loving communion with God! How it brings the Scriptures, full of light and life, always before the mind and heart! How strong it renders one in time of trial or temptation! How able it makes us for service, how patient in tribulation! Indeed, how it shields, protects and furnishes the whole life! Especially how it introduces the soul to such a personal knowledge of God and Christ that it makes all manner of skepticism and doubt of no effect to disturb one's peace! Let us 'continue in prayer, 'praying always, and watch in the same with thanksgiving.'"

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Shortly before 10 o'clock, on the night of Eighth Month 31st, an earthquake was felt in most of the States east of the Mississippi, and south of and including Connecticut. There were a succession of shocks, the severest of which was the first, occurring at the time above mentioned. The centre appears to have been under and near to the city of Charleston, S. C. It is believed that fully two-thirds of the buildings in that city were more or less injured, and that they will nearly all have to be taken down. About fifty persons were killed or mortally injured, and one hundred others more or less hurt. The loss of property is variously estimated from three to five millions of dollars. Many of the people have camped in the streets and public squares. Liberal donations in various places are being given for the benefit of the sufferers, and the U. S. Government is supplying tents, &c.

The town of Summerville, near Charleston, is "badly wrecked." The earth has been broken into fissures, and hillocks and depressions have been created where none existed before, and in one or two instances railroad trains were wrecked by the upheavals of the earth. The shocks were preceded or accompanied by rumbling noises and detonations, which added to the terror of the visitation, and sulphurous fumes were emitted from the earth. Water was also thrown up, and mudholes were formed on the surface, giving the appearance of volcanic action.

An official of the Coast Survey has been sent from Washington to Charleston to make soundings of the harbor and adjacent coast, in order to see whether any remarkable depressions or elevations of the bottom of the ocean have been caused by the earthquake.

Numbers of the colored people who work in the turpentine forests of North and South Carolina, being in dread of earthquakes, are quitting the forests and going home.

Underwood, our Consul at Glasgow, has made a report to the State Department, in which he warns American workmen, and especially American seamen, against going to Great Britain with the hope of finding employment. Every trade is overcrowded. Applications made on him by destitute American seamen for aid, average about four or five a week.

A telegram from Winnipeg to the Chicago Times says, that Foster, the Dominion Minister of Marine and Fisheries, has returned from British Columbia. While at Victoria he took depositions of members of the crews of the vessels seized by American revenue officers in Alaskan waters. From the evidence he made a memorandum to the British Government, calling upon it to make certain representations to Washington, to the effect that the seizures were illegal. The crews deposed that the vessels were not within sixty miles of Alaska's shores when the seizures were made. Foster says the American Government "has no more right to insist that Canadian vessels shall not go within sixty miles of the Alaskan shore, than the Canadian Government has to say American vessels shall not go within that distance of the Labrador coast, even though Russia when it owned Alaska, claimed sovereignty in the adjoining seas."

It appears that General Miles has at last succeeded in capturing the notorious Apache chief, Geronimo, with thirty-five of his band. They are reported to have voluntarily surrendered.

A despatch has been received in Chicago from the Mayor of Belleplaine, Iowa, relating a singular catastrophe. It appears that "an artesian well, four inches in diameter, burst when the depth of 180 feet had been reached in boring, and instantly a volume of water was forced into the air to the distance of several hundred feet. This gradually increased in size and volume until a stream of water fully sixteen inches in diameter was formed. Fifteen carloads of stone were emptied into the well, but these were forced upward as though propelled by the force of giant powder. Bags of sand were then hastily constructed, and cast into the well, but these, too, were hurled into the air."

There has been no rain in Jones and Stoneval counties, Texas, for fourteen months, and most of the settlers have left. Those who remain, about 400 families, live in a state of extreme destitution. It is believed that throughout the drought affected section, perhaps 3000 families are destitute.

A few cases of a disease resembling yellow fever have appeared at Biloxi, Mississippi.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 372, which was 9 more than during the previous week, and 25 less than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing 102 were under one year of age; 197 were males and 175 females; 41 died of consumption; 30 of cholera infantum; 26 of marasmus; 22 of typhoid fever; 19 of convulsions; 17 of old age; 14 of inflammation of the brain; 14 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels, and 11 of Bright's disease.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4 1/2's 110 1/4; 4's, registered, 125 1/2; coupons, 126 1/2; 3's, 101; currency, 6's, 126 & 136.

Cotton—sold in a small way to spinners on a basis of 9 1/2 cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum was quiet at 6 1/2 cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8 1/2 cts. for 110 test in cases.

Feed was abundant and dull at former rates. Sales of 1 car fair winter bran at $12.50; 1 car fair coarse do. do., at $13, and 2 cars good coarse do. do., at $13.50 per ton.

Flour and Meal.—The flour market quiet, but prices were unchanged. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania roller, straight, at $4.20; 125 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4.25; 375 barrels Ohio and Indiana, straight, at $4.50; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.75 & $4.90; 125 barrels Minnesota clear, at $4; 500 barrels do. patent at $4.80 & $5, and 375 barrels do. do. at $5.10. Rye flour was steady at $3.25 for new and $3.40 for old.

Grain.—Wheat was a shade easier; No. 2 closing at 85 1/2 cts. bid and 85 3/4 cts. asked. Corn.—No. 2 mixed closed at 49 1/2 cts. bid and 50 cts. asked. Oats were quiet but steady; No. 2 closing at 34 1/2 cts. bid, and 35 1/2 cts. asked.

Beef cattle were livelier at 3 a 5 1/2 cts. Fat cows were fair at 2 a 3 1/2 cts. Milch cows were scarce at $30 a $65. Veal calves were active at 4 a 6 1/2 cts.

Sheep were firmer at 2 a 4 1/2 cts. Lambs, 3 a 6 1/2 cts. Hogs were active; 7 a 7 1/2 cts. for western; 6 a 6 1/2 cts. for State.

FOREIGN.—The Killarney Branch of the Irish National League, has notified General Sir Redvers Buller of its readiness to give him every possible assistance, if the sole object of his mission in Kerry is to suppress crime and outrage. If, however, his mission is to serve landlords, collect rents and assist at evictions, he must depend on his own resources.

In the English Parliament, Lord Randolph Churchill has moved that precedence be given the supply bill.

The Parnellites and Home Rule Liberals, have been urging that the consideration of the situation of Ireland admitted of no delay.

Measures have been taken in Belfast, with the purpose of making rioting almost impossible.

The Italian cholera record for Eighth Month 31st, was 84 new cases and 23 deaths.

Prince Alexander arrived at Sofia on the 3d instant. He made a triumphal entry into the city, escorted by the municipal authorities of Sofia, who had gone two kilometres outside the city to await his arrival. He was received with addresses of welcome and artillery salutes. Prince Alexander ordered the release of all political prisoners, and reconstructed the Ministry. He addressed a letter to the Czar of Russia, in which he desired the co-operation of that personage. The reply to this letter manifested such an entire disapprobation of the Prince continuing to rule Bulgaria, as to induce him to publicly announce his intention of abdicating. Before leaving the country, he will establish a Regency.

An ordinary session of the Bulgarian Chamber of Deputies has been summoned to discuss the abdication. It is believed that the departure of Prince Alexander from Bulgaria is likely to result in civil war.

Advices from Ching-Too-Foo, the chief city of the Province of Sechuen, state that the natives of the eastern part of that province and those of northern Cochin China, have risen against the Christians, and are massacring them and destroying their property. This active persecution is attributed to the imprudence of English and American missionaries.

In Cochin China, alone, fifty Christians have been killed, their houses burned and their farms destroyed.

In Sechuen a general massacre of Christians is reported to be in progress, and they are killed wherever found. It is said that whole villages occupied by Christians have been destroyed, and that all lands occupied by the professors of that faith are being devastated. The Apostolic Vicar's residence in Sechuen has been burned to the ground. Not a piece of furniture, nor a book nor a paper was saved. The foreign Consuls barely escaped from Sechuen with their lives.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOLS.

These schools, under the care of the three Monthly Meetings of Friends of Philadelphia, will re-open in the new School-house 140 N. 16th St., above Arch, on Sunday, Ninth Mo. 13th, 1886.

The departments for Boys and Girls respectively remain under the care of their former Principals, John H. Dillingham and Mary W. Woolman, who are assisted by a corps of competent instructors. Two vacancies in the Girls' Department have been filled by the appointment of Jane J. Wetherell and Mary Anna Jones, who it is believed will form valuable additions to the working staff.

The Boys' Primary Department, so long under the efficient care of Susanna House, will be conducted by Elizabeth Warner. A Girls' Primary Department has been organized under the direction of Anna Yarnall, for some years an efficient teacher in the upper school.

The new School-house is well adapted for conducting a first class school; great care having been taken to provide all necessary comforts and conveniences. The heating and ventilation have been carefully attended to, and the cheerful and commodious character of the rooms, and the arrangements of the surrounding grounds are attractive. The scholars will have the benefit of Friends' Library, soon to be removed to a new building now being erected for its accommodation within the same enclosure as the School-house.

Children not members of our religious Society are admitted, and the attention of Friends and others is invited to these schools, which afford the opportunity for education free from the disadvantages which appertain to many seminaries. The terms are moderate, and our members who find the charges burdensome may be fully relieved.

The School-house will be open daily from and after the first of Ninth Month, from 9 A. M. to 12 M., and 3 to 5 P. M., when teachers will be in attendance to give information and receive applications for admission. Further information may be obtained from JOHN W. BIDDLE, Treasurer of the Committee, No. 119 S. Fourth St.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

During the summer the stage will connect on week days with the 7, 9, 3, 2, 47 and 455 trains from Broad St. Station to convey passengers to the school. Telegrams should be sent to West Chester via Western Union Telegraph Company, whence they will be sent to the school by telephone.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Eighth Mo. 18th, 1837. Yesterday — and self attended the little week-day meeting at Gwynedd. We had the company and labors of dear E. Evans; who was on a visit to her friends thereaway. Her labors will, I trust, long be remembered by the younger part of the meeting, for whom her concern seemed chiefly to be. She arose with the language of our Saviour to Nathanael, where he says: "Before that Philip called thee, when thou wast under the fig-tree, I saw thee." We may remember, she said, there was no mention made of Nathanael before this time; but we may see from it, that he was under the peculiar notice and care of the dear Master. No doubt his private retreat under the fig-tree was for silence and meditation, and to pour out his heart in prayer to the God of his life. But he was noticed by that Eye, which seeth the most secret places, and who does hear and regard the most secret petitions of his children, no matter how hidden they are. It is such as these, who are concerned very often to retire by themselves, and there pour out their hearts in prayer unto Him, that Jesus loves. She believed there were dear children of their Heavenly Father now present, who were under great discouragement, often looking back over their past lives, and remembering that a book of remembrance is kept, wherein every thought, word and action, is recorded, and by which in the last day, if not repented of, they will be judged. Was it not that there is forgiveness to be found, if we seek it aright, we should indeed be miserable. But our Heavenly Father stands ready to forgive all his penitent ones; and has promised, "though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be made white as wool." But when we have experienced forgiveness for past sins, and known something of the good way of life, then to go counter and disobey, it is much harder to find forgiveness. She knew of what she spoke, and could tell us from experience, that she never realized what real enjoyment was, till she gave all up, and filially followed her dear Master in the way of his leadings. How feelingly and earnestly did she plead with us! saying remember, dear children, the joy that is caused in heaven over one sinner that repenteth: not only the Father rejoiceth, but the angels too rejoice. Although the Christian path is not exempt from trial, yet how consoling is it to remember, that the dear Master trod it before us! He was a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief. He will lay no more on his children than He will enable them to bear. With more, very encouraging.

24th and 27th. Found it hard to attain a state of inward waiting. More of this is much wanting amongst us; and with none more than myself.

Ninth Mo. 3rd. E. Comfort was led to treat this morning, on "The grace of God which bringeth salvation, and hath appeared unto all men," &c. He was helped to open and make it plain to our understandings; especially respecting the teachings of the Holy Spirit.

10th. Our meetings to-day and Fifth-day spoiled I thought by being too short.

15th. A silent, but I thought, a good meeting.

18th. A renewed evidence seemed given this day, that we are not a forsaken people, though some of us have had to sit as in very low places. How sweet to such is a little food and nourishment, when it flows from the sanctuary! Methought this day, that our provision was blessed, and hungry souls satisfied. E. C. instructively spoke from, "No other foundation can any man lay, than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." This is the alone true foundation, that will stand in a day of trial; which day must sooner or later overtake us all. Those who were thus concerned to build, would very often be found waiting upon the Lord, seeking to draw nigh unto Him, and willing to be accounted as fools for his sake.

We can attain no good thing by our own wisdom and learning; for man of himself can make no progress in the good way; his wisdom being foolishness with God. The apostle declares, he had nothing of himself to glory in, but infirmities. And even those who have attained to the highest degree of religious experience, have nothing to ascribe unto themselves. A state of inward waiting, where a teacher, a leader, and an instructor would be found, was pressed upon us.

22nd and 25th. Week and First-day meetings. Surely there are none so surrounded with poverty as myself.

29th. Our Monthly Meeting held at Plymouth. A low suffering time, wherein my eyes were made to overflow in feeling my great weakness and utter inability to come at anything that is good. O, the darkness that has reigned for days past! The face of my Heavenly Father hid from me. May the secret, silent petition prove availing, and find acceptance.

Tenth Mo. 11th. Since last note have felt my spirit clothed with sorrow. The shortness and uncertainty of life has seemed so to impress me with the need of a preparation to meet the messenger of death, who has been making, within a few weeks past, inroads amongst us; a number in the younger walks of life having been summoned to their everlasting homes. O what will arouse, if these loud calls do not! May some of us who have been sleeping, as it were, the sleep of death, be awakened before the awful summons go forth, "Prepare to meet thy God."

14th. Had the company and labors at our little meeting of our dear friend Sarah Hillman, who set forth the excellency of waiting on the Lord. Quoting from the Psalmist, "Wait on the Lord, and be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thy heart; wait I say on the Lord!" To some who often sit in very low places, the heavens appearing as brass, the earth as iron, and their "heads wrapped about as with weeds," her language was very sweet. She seemed as though she could almost hear such bemoaning their situation! the feeble prayer of whose hearts was, "Ob! that thou wouldst bless me indeed, and enlarge my coast, and that thine hand might be with me, and that thou wouldst keep me from evil, that it may not grieve me!" To some in advanced life who were going bowed down, her language was very encouraging,—some who were ready to tremble for the Ark of the Lord. As these were concerned to keep their places, others would be raised up for helpers even in this place, and among the dear children.

Eleventh Mo. 5th. Being in the city, I attended Orange Street Meeting. It was held in silence, till near the close, when R. Shober appeared in supplication; returning thanks that our Heavenly Father had been near us. That the weary and heavy laden had been refreshed, and mourning souls comforted, &c. That every breath given us we might receive as a renewed mercy, who were yet spared as monuments of this love and mercy, &c. In the afternoon, attended Arch Street Meeting—silent and good; and later, the evening meeting held at the same place. S. Bettle ministered instructively respecting the conversion of Paul; also, in a feeling manner, addressed a state present, whose language he believed was, "Who shall show us any good?" These he desired to look unto Him from whom all good cometh; then would they find a leader and instructor who teacheth as never man taught, reviving also the Scripture, "The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord, and He delighteth in his way."

6th. Being still in the city, I attended their Quarterly Meeting; which was large and owned, I believe, by the Master of assemblies. William Evans was excellently engaged in testimony, respecting silent waiting on the Lord, particularly when thus met; not depending on man, poor man who is but dust. And let us remember, he continued, "God is jealous of his honor; He will not give his glory to another, nor his praise to graven images." Were there less dependence on the poor instruments, and more on the Lord, we should have more lively meetings. There would be more coming up to the help of the Lord—first the babe, then the young man, then the strong man in Christ—raised up from among the dear children. These were feelingly entreated to enter into covenant with Him, whose covenant was with the night as well as with the day; and who hath promised that seed time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, should not fail.

In our last meeting, E. Pitfield and E. Evans, were similarly led, and concerned for the younger part of the meeting; some in a particular manner, who were looking and depending too much on outward help, and not keeping close enough to their dear Master. How were we pleaded with, not to put our dependence on the poor instruments, or we shall find these streams would dry up; but rather be found, like Mary of old, waiting for the coming of her dear Lord. Assuredly to such as these He would come in his own time; and would raise up, and make them to stand forth for his cause.

For "The Friend."

A Trip to the Saguenay.

LETTER NO. 4.

Steamboat St. Lawrence, en route for Quebec, Eighth Mo. 4th, 1886.

Having quitted our pleasant quarters at Tadousac this afternoon, a few notes of our sojourn may be written as we pursue our homeward course.

A characteristic of these waters is the unusual height of the tides; stated by some to be 25 feet, but like some other matters hereaway, this is a little exaggerated, as 19 feet is more nearly the maximum measure. The currents are very strong and run for 45 minutes after high water.

The subject of tides is one that scientific men are pretty well agreed upon as to their primary cause; and for the exceptional phenomena, they also, as a rule, venture upon an explanation. Briefly stating the case, the school boy learns from his books that the waters of the oceans rise in a tidal heap or wave of 2 or 3 feet above the average level punctually, owing to the attraction of the moon, and that the wave follows the moon in its course around the earth, and that the sun also has a part in the tides, because when the sun is in line with the moon the tides are higher than when it is not. He is also instructed that when it is high tide under the moon, it is also high tide on the opposite side of the earth; and as the waters there are either pushed out or not pulled in, whichever way we choose to consider it.

This may not be precisely as a professor would put it, but the school boy is taught something like it, receives it in good faith, finds the high tides follow the moon, generally accepts the theory, and sometimes understands it. When this so-called tidal wave strikes the coast, very different results are seen in different parts of the earth, and something besides the moon has to be called in for explanation, as the highest shore tides are, as a rule, not those nearest the vertical line from the moon. The tides of Great Britain are said to be 50 feet, more or less. I have observed them at Prince Edward Island to be about 3 feet; further up the gulf at the Saguenay, for instance, 19 feet; in the Bay of Fundy 60 feet, more or less; on the rocky coast of Maine about 15 feet. At Isles of Shoals I have measured 12 feet, whereas at Portsmouth, opposite, it was only 5 or 6 feet, and the usual tides of the New Jersey coast are about 5 feet. Part of these unusual tides are said to be caused by the waters running into coves and piling up, and others because the coasts are rocky; but, there are low tides in many coves, high tides where there are no coves, and many rocky coasts and islands rising out of the sea which do not throw up the incoming tide unusually. The most satisfactory answers to queries respecting these high tides, and the cause of them—that I have had—came from mariners and intelligent men familiar with these waters, who simply said, they did not know.

The town of Tadousac is about half a mile from the steamboat landing, and consists of one street of half a mile, with moderate houses, stores, &c., on the land side, and a few nice cottages on the bay side of the street. The principal hotel fronts on the charming bay which opens out to the expanse of the St. Lawrence waters, here some 15 or 20 miles in width; and is flanked on the left with the high bluff, lined with the cottages mentioned, and on the right with a rocky point separating the bay from the Saguenay River.

Bathing, boating and fishing, are advertised as within easy reach for sojourners at Tadousac, but they need not be counted on for ordinary visitors.

One of our fellow boarders, a hale, hearty, elderly man, recounted to us the satisfaction he had in his daily morning bath at 7 o'clock, and the healthful results he experienced from that and the salt water he drank; but Laurentian waters, air in the fifties, no surf except in a storm, and a gravelly beach, go better with the sturdy Canadians than with those whose aquatic revels are mainly on New Jersey beaches.

Of boating a little may be done in the bay, close to shore, but when it is to be done in the swift currents of the St. Lawrence or Saguenay, the stranger had better not paddle his own canoe, if he wishes to confine his voyage to specific limits. Fishing is done, but principally by skilled men of sporting taste, who delight to ride off many miles to the small streams, and ply their lines till the shadows warn them of the evening's approach.

A number of yachts lay at anchor, excepting when their owners from the cottages were off on a cruise in them. The larger ones were of the American type, but the smaller and native ones have a rig peculiar to the country; the hind mast, (it cannot be fairly called mainmast, because it is not as high as the one before it), rises behind the tiller-post, and its boom extends over the stern rigidly set like an aft bowsprit.

An engraving of our hotel represents a semi-circle of small whales across the mouth of the bay, spouting like permanent garden fountains. No such exhibition came off during our stay, but we saw two or three of the grampus family, a large fish between a porpoise and a whale, which blew a misty spout with a perceptible noise like a whale on a small scale. The grampus is said to be 40 feet long; but none of that size favored us with a view of them. Abundance of white porpoise rolled along almost daily, and there are said to be many seals, but we only saw a few of their skins nailed up on shore for curing.

Our favorite resort was on the point of rocks separating the bay from the mouth of the Saguenay, commanding a view of the bay with its boats at anchor and the houses and cottages beyond; the expanse of the St. Lawrence, with its far distant shores, when the air was clear, and the lighthouse on the bar nearer at hand; and lastly and principally, the view up the Saguenay, closed in by a turn in the river like a deep bay, with stupendous rocky banks rounded by the elements and covered with the evergreens of the forest.

There was also a fine ride along the bluff of the bay, and the bank of the St. Lawrence and back, through a cultivated valley between two ridges—which probably in an ancient day had been the pathway of some majestic glacier.

For the most part the weather was fair, but the showers dropped at short notice, and two of our mornings were somewhat foggy. Fogs are an attribute of these regions; we often heard the fog-horn from distances that we could not see the fog, and certainty of connections cannot be counted on, for the captains are careful and will not run in a fog on the St. Lawrence; we heard of a traveller detained four days on this account.

A small family of three Indian men, three Indian women, three and perhaps more children, and three dogs, were camped on a little cove. The men were lumbermen in the woods in winter, but now were building canoes of Birch bark. It was interesting to see the canoe grow: first a piece of bark as long as the canoe and as wide as it can be cut, is laid on the ground, and on this a frame of the proper width of the canoe in the centre, sloping gently at first then rapidly, towards the bows, then straight to the points, is laid and heavily weighted with stones. The bark is then turned up around the frame and firmly held by stakes on the outside driven into the ground, and hickory strips on the inside which are lashed to the stakes. Strips of bark are sewed to the bottom piece where it does not reach the proposed gunwale, the seams are made water-tight with gum, the ribs bent to the correct shape, are with the sides, firmly sewed to the framework of the gunwale, and the longitudinal strips inside for strengthening are added. A finished canoe hung up in the trees showed beautiful lines, had been made to order, and I think for about sixteen dollars. One Indian was making a small canoe for a present for his little boy. The little boy appreciated his present, for what he could get for it; as he brought it down to the white traders at the hotel the next morning and desired to exchange it for 40 cents. A trader gratified him without prolonged bargaining, and the canoe sailed up the St. Lawrence, but inside of our trunk.

Few companies that travel now are complete without a camera, especially if one of the company is a young woman, consequently we had a camera with us, and tried to take the views of the vicinity; but the breezes and mists were not always propitious, and we did less than we desired in this instructive and useful art.

The sojourners of Tadousac, we presume, are mostly the aristocratic families of Quebec, and some from Montreal. Chance Americans call for a day or two, but most of the tourists are ashore only while the boats lie at the wharf for the tides.

For "The Friend."

In connection with the reminiscences of the late Daniel Pryor Hack and his grandmother Mary Pryor, published in the last number of "The Friend," the following anecdote may prove interesting.

During the time that Thomas Scattergood was on a visit to England, he felt that it was required of him by his Divine Master to speak to the King. This was greatly in the cross, and for a long time he kept his concern to himself. In this situation he became low-spirited, and a cloud seemed to envelop his prospects, which he could not penetrate. Home was shut from him, and he knew not when he should have permission to return thither.

Whilst in this tried situation, Mary Pryor came to see him, with this message from the Lord:—"If thou art faithful to what is required of thee, thou wilt soon be released from thy service in this country, and be permitted to return home.

Thomas gave up to the requiring, and obtained an opportunity of speaking to the King. So clear was the evidence of Divine authority accompanying his message, that the King respectfully uncovered his head, while it was being delivered.

Soon after this Thomas Scattergood found himself at liberty to return to his own home and family.

For "The Friend."

Hypocritical Religion.

I believe that the greatest calamity that ever entered the world since its creation, is sin; which was introduced by the enemy of all righteousness. And as he had no religion to disguise himself under, he entered under the deceitful cloak of a lying spirit, or teacher, teaching in opposition to the commandments of the great Creator of man. But now, since the religion of our holy Redeemer has got to be so popular in the world, he can more successfully enter the heart of the worldly man under the cloak of religion, or as a religious teacher, than in any other way. But the teaching still retains some of the same twisting, twining nature of the serpent in it, though artfully concealed from the view of the outward man.

But as the body, without the spirit of man in it, is dead, so religion and worship, without the spirit and life of God in it, are dead also, and they can only be made living by Him who is the resurrection and the life: for a stream cannot rise higher than its fountain. A profession may still retain the name of religion, after the spirit has departed from it; but no better name can be given it than either hypocrisy or idolatry. It may have a light, but not the true light, the light of revelation. It may have the spirit of man in it, to animate it, and to help in drawing disciples after it; but it cannot have the light of that Spirit which shines from "the greater light" of God's eternal day, and rules in heavenly things.

The superficial and formal worship and religion of the nominal professors, seem so much more congenial to the natural man, that they rule him in the darkness of his heart, until the light of the knowledge of the glory of God is not comprehended by him; so he turns away from it and seeks some more outward way, preferring darkness rather than light, because his deeds are evil. And while he, through disobedience to the true light, is led by the darkness of this world, he can neither see nor know his true spiritual condition, because darkness has blinded his eyes. While he remains in this dark and sinful state, how can he be instrumental in turning others to the way of light and salvation? But he may still retain his emotional and animal energy, and be zealous and active in promoting the superficial religion which pleases the sons of darkness.

The great object of true religion, and of the gospel of Christ, in all ages has been to point the sinner to the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world by a sacrifice of his life, and by leading us to the indwelling presence of his Spirit to assist us, through his grace, in overcoming the evil one, and destroying his works, and the sinful nature out of the heart, so as to make it a fit temple for his holiness to dwell in. This seems to be the prime object of all the rightly authorized instrumentalities belonging to our holy religion. Against this the enemy ingeniously and industriously fights. So there is a warfare in the heavenly-minded man, until victory is obtained, Michael and his angels, as we might say, fighting against the dragon; and the dragon and his angels fighting, but prevail not. Neither will they prevail, while we keep "the Lion of the tribe of Juda" in us as the captain of our salvation. For greater is He that is in us, than he that is in the worldly-minded man. And those who endure to the end shall finally be enabled to ascribe thanks to God which giveth the victory, through Jesus Christ our Lord; but not through the strength of man without the Spirit, like I fear far too large a portion of the present revival work is carried

In speaking of the false teachings, and of the uninspired ministry, which seem to prevail since the revival meetings have come amongst us, and got to be so prominent; I don't want to use any harder language, or any plainer words, than Christ did against the errors of the people, when He was clothed with humanity. For the servant is not above his master, nor the disciple above his lord. It is enough for the servant to be as his master. But we find, where He was speaking to the Scribes and Pharisees about their hypocrisy and deceit, He called them blind leaders of the blind; and said, they for a pretence made long prayers, and outwardly appeared righteous, while within they were full of hypocrisy and iniquity. So He called them a generation of vipers, and asked how they should escape the damnation of hell? Which the reader may see more fully by referring to the twenty-third of Matthew; and many other places might be cited from the Evangelists and other Scriptures, to prove that false teachers and false prophets should arise and show great signs and wonders, inasmuch that, if it were possible, they would deceive the very elect. And Paul says, that in his day, there were "false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ. And no marvel, for Satan is transformed into an angel of light. Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as ministers of righteousness." And a more modern writer, in speaking of the Pharisees and their worship, says, "They measured the worth of their religion by the multitude of its outward observances, however empty and idle most of them might be; and fancied themselves more righteous than others in proportion as they outstripped them in the mere show of devotion; though beneath it might be nothing but hypocrisy and pride." For it was in its whole nature ostentatious, self-righteous, and adapted to secure worldly admiration, and the praise of men more than the praise of God. They seemed more anxious to have "their names written in the earth" than in heaven, in the Lamb's book of life.

How is it now in our day of much religious activity and boasted enlightenment? And how is it with us as a people who profess more spirituality and better things? Do we not too much participate in many things which Christ pronounced woes against? Were we not called out of the darkness which ruled in the professors of religion around us, into the marvellous light of the gospel of our Lord, that we might enjoy more quietness and spiritual communion with Him? Let the enlightened reader pause and ponder and judge for himself.

I know that ever since my first recollection of Society affairs, which was perhaps about eighty years ago, weaknesses and imperfections would at times trouble us in our meetings. But our ministers and elders were more sound and attentive than now. And more vigilant in watching over us for good, and for restoring harmony. This was in North Carolina, where we had no stove or fire in our meeting-houses during the winters. But the heavenly fire of Divine love was more often felt to warm us. And our meetings were more spiritually alive and better attended, by both young and old than they are now, since they are so frequently stirred up by a human warmth and life, and a zeal without knowledge. Those were times of more simplicity and humility. But since then "they have sought out many inventions" in the way of religion and worship.

It was a good while after this before I ever heard singing, or the Scriptures read in any of our meetings as a part of worship. Perhaps the idea never entered the minds of Friends of that day that it required something more attractive than silent worship, to induce Friends to meet and worship God in spirit and in truth. And as to reading the Scriptures, they did not meet for that, but to witness the more sure prophetic Word to be near them (as they often did) and to be a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart. Many inventions have been sought out to supply the absence of the Spirit; but do these things take us any nearer to heaven? Or do they not take us more into the broad way of the world? The religion of the head is hypocritical; the religion of the heart is apostolical. The one exalts the natural man and gives him the glory; the other exalts the spiritual man and gives God the glory.

Before I leave the subject of hypocritical religion, I will briefly refer to the change which it has made here at Dublin, within the limits of my own observation. Before the revival spirit disturbed us, we had full and often favored meetings. A noted minister would come along, and our large house would be filled to overflowing. But after the meetings began to assume the character of our modern revival meetings, and the effects were more seen, the same eminent speakers have at times passed along, under appointments, but the house not, perhaps, half as full. Such as sympathized with them, are so warmed up as to show it for a few times in the size and noise of our meetings! then a reaction takes place, and our meetings, I think, are left in a worse condition than before. But these same noted and eloquent speakers are still passing along from place to place, where there is an opening to receive them. And we often have thunder clouds to pass along, stirring the elements with perhaps more wind than refreshing rain.

I will now close my remarks by referring the readers to I. P. where he says, "Babylon is built in the likeness of Zion, but by another spirit."

Dublin, Ind., Eighth Mo. 21st, 1886.

Time—The God who has created us in his unerring wisdom, has allotted to us the exact amount of time needed to do all that He expects us to do—not one moment too much, not one too little; each has its mission. If we put off something which we ought to do now, for some future occasion, we have lost an opportunity which it is forever impossible to retrieve. You may say, I can do it just as well some other time. Oh, my friends, you forget that "some other time" is intended for other duties, and you either have to leave those undone or neglect the first. Besides, the opportunity which you let slip by unimproved was the proper time when the work could be done most satisfactorily, and whatever you may do afterward in this direction will only be patchwork, and that often of the worst kind—when you take a piece out of a new garment to mend a rent in an old one.

A much greater proportion of the labor of human kind than is generally supposed, goes toward repairing that which has been lost or impaired by misuse or waste of time. Professions and trades are almost solely engaged in this work of doctoring up and reconstructing what has been disordered or demolished by inattention to the requirements of time. The members of which human society is constituted are largely dependent on one another. The failure of a single individual to be punctual in the discharge of his duties or obligations, may throw a whole community in confusion or alarm, or cause widespread disaster.—From the Herald of Truth.

Convalescent Children.—"As it taxes one's ingenuity to amuse and pacify little patients, I will mention two or three things I did for my boy when he was recovering from diphtheria, hoping the experience may be of use to some other mother. Of course, I soon exhausted stories, and the mild play with such toys as weak little hands can manage, and the old cry of "Oh mamma, what can I do?" set in again.

The walls of the sick room were of bare plaster—as all sick-room walls should be, for a coat of lime makes them all fresh and pure again—and when my weary child sighed, among his many sighs, for "something new in the room to look at," I hethought me of a roll of pictures saved from a year's numbers of a London illustrated newspaper. These I brought into the sick-room and pinned all about the walls. The effect was very enlivening. The room seemed suddenly enlarged—as if it all at once opened out upon all the quarters of the globe. There were broad landscapes and wild marine scenes, battle fields, Christmas firesides, noble portraits of horses and dogs, brave generals and fair women, pretty groups of children, and tumbling waterfalls. The small invalid was delighted. Then I brought him a long, light stick—a piece of inch moulding, it happened to be—with which he could point at the different pictures while he asked as many questions as he liked. This stick was an inspiration. It was like having arms six feet long, and the boy had great fun "visiting all around the world" with it, as he expressed it. As long as he staid in bed the first demand in the morning was—"Give me my poke-stick, mamma." As I had to be out of the room a good deal, I fixed a call-bell on the foot of the bed, and we arranged a code of signals that proved quite entertaining. Three taps on the bell with the "poke-stick" meant a drink of water; four taps, a clean handkerchief; six taps meant, "I am hungry;" eight taps, "what time is it?" and twelve taps signified that the pillows needed shaking up and the bed straightened generally.

After a while I attached to the stick a bit of string with a bent pin attached, scattering some old toys about the floor, and the invalid had a grand season of "fishing." It was amusing to see how shy some of the fish were, and what a time it was before they would consent to bite. And then the excitement of landing them in the bed—which was now a boat, of course—was immense.

I am sure these little beguilements helped on my boy's recovery, for they kept his "spirits" in a cheerful condition, and cheerfulness is a very helpful medicine.—E. H. Leland in American Agriculturist.

Oriental Postures at Meals.—Sitting in chairs at a table, according to our Western customs, has never been a practice in the East. Sitting cross-legged, or squatting, on the ground, or on mats or cushions, around a central mat, or basket, or tray on a low stool-like table, is the primitive method. In the days of Grecian and Roman supremacy, the more luxurious habit of reclining on lounges or piles of cushions, with the feet outward, while at meals, prevailed in many parts of the East. Leaning on the left arm, so as to leave the right arm free, a guest would have his head near, or upon the bosom of the person next to him, at his left. One coming from behind could wash or anoint the feet of a guest while the latter was at his meal.

ONLY A TRAMP.

For "The Friend."

Only a tramp, in the glare and heat
Of the summer sun in the dusty street.

Only a tramp, with a dingy pack
And a threadbare coat on his weary back.

Only a tramp, and soiled and brown
He made his way through the busy town.

Only a tramp, and Wealth and Pride
Looked "and passed on the other side,"

And childhood paused in its merry play,
And shrank from the passing form away.

"Only a tramp," the housewife said
As she turned away from his plea for bread;

"Only a tramp," but he felt the smart
Of the taunting words in his human heart,
And bitterly sighing he turned again
To his heartless journey and life of pain.

But there where the railroad meets the street
Was stayed the tide of passing feet;

And horror palsied the bravest limb,
And eyes with fruitless tears were dim.

For a truant baby boy had strayed
To the railway track, and calmly played

Between the rails with the pebbles white,
Piling them up in the sweet sunlight;

And the "fast express" was thundering down
At fearful speed to the busy town.

Fruitless the driver's skill to stay
The flying train on its headlong way;

Fruitless the shrill alarm to fright
The little one from his pebbles white.

But out from the crossing of the street
Dashes a man with flying feet.

Each silent watcher held his breath,
In that fearful race for life or death,

Till the truant babe was safely thrown Beyond the rails, as the train swept on.

The child was safe! but rods away
Bleeding and lifeless the rescuer lay.

Only a tramp! but forever new
Is our love for manhood brave and true.

And the mother, that night, who fondly prest
The living child to her grateful breast

Will ne'er forget as the seasons roll
That hungry tramp with a hero's soul.

I KNOW NOT.

I know not how the mavis sings;
How swells the wondrous lily throat
Of soaring lark; how nature rings
With its wild song and glorious note.

Nor how the ear the notes retain,
That fall with sweet vibrating sound,
Or how 'tis whispered to the brain,
Where life, and song, and soul are found.

I know not how the germ is hid
In tiny seed, in secret strength,
Or how it bursts its fragile lid,
And swells to flower and fruit at length.

Nor can I tell how plants drink in
The mystic draughts of heat and light, Transform the elements within
To lovely forms of beauty bright;

To golden, red, or purple tint,
The chastest white of lily rare;
All forms, all colors, without stint,
Those slender plants are made to bear.

And what directs that subtle force,
That moulds ten thousand varied shapes,
From slender blue bell, prickly gorse,
To passion flower, or clustered grapes?

And then the mind, so strangely wrought,
Perceives this wondrous nature's work,
But in the processes of thought
It cannot trace where life does lurk.

"Little Foxes."

For "The Friend."

[The following communication was received from a friend who feels desirous that the professors of Christianity should live in full conformity with its self-denying precepts; for without submission to those restraints which the Spirit of the Lord lays upon all, there can be no growth in grace. While we are conscious that there will probably be a difference of feeling and judgment among our readers on the subject treated of in this essay, we feel willing to give a place in our columns for the concern of our friend. It may encourage some to greater faithfulness, who have been led into things with which they were uneasy by the example of others, whom they deservedly esteem. It is well to remember the language of the Apostle in a case where the believers did not see alike—"Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind."—Ed.]

Those who have been brought under the convicting power of the Spirit of Truth, and who have thus been led into close, searching examination of their own hearts, thereby taking account of those things which stand in the way of their full acceptance with their Father in heaven, have I doubt not often been made to realize that it is "the little foxes that spoil the tender vine." Seemingly "little things," scarcely observable perhaps, and considered too trifling for serious thought, are brought to our view at times by the Divine Witness in the secret of our hearts, and the seal of condemnation set upon them. Happy is it for those who, yielding obedience to this "inspeaking word," give up and put aside all of those things, which it is thus shown them are objects of Divine displeasure. On the other hand as we turn a deaf ear to these gentle reproofs of the "Light within," allowing our human reason to override our consciences, the latter become "scared" as it were, and we so far lose our sense of the truth, as to have no scruple against engaging in things, which, when our hearts were more susceptible to the tendering influence of the "dew of heaven," we clearly saw to be wrong. And thus where parents and those who have the care of children, give countenance to improper and hurtful things, the rising generation coming up in the belief that what is allowed or practiced by those who are older cannot be wrong, such things become fastened upon society to its great and irreparable loss, and I doubt not to the injury of the cause of truth.

These thoughts have been suggested as I have taken a view of the condition of our society at the present time; and while we may truly rejoice that He who called our forefathers out of the formal, lifeless professions of the world, into "the worship of God in spirit and in truth," is opening the eyes of many in various parts of the land, and calling them back to first principles, it is cause for regret that even in those places where it might seem that the society was most highly favored, and where the ancient doctrines are still upheld by the body at large, "Little things" have crept in to so great an extent, that it may truly be said of us as it was of some formerly, "I have somewhat against thee."

It is not my purpose at the present time to point out the different things amongst us which may come under the above heading, but more particularly to bring to view a subject which has for sometime taken a deep hold of my mind. I refer to the very common practice among our young people, as well as some more advanced in years, of patronizing photograph galleries. I know that those who uphold this custom, adv what might seem to be, plausible reasons in its defence; indeed the writer must acknowledge that on two occasions in his life, he so far allowed these seeming reasons to prevail over his better sense as to yield to this temptation, and it is with sorrow that he must now confess that the pictures taken at these times being scattered beyond recall, will remain as witnesses of his unfaithfulness.

It may not always be possible for us to give clear cogent reasons for our feelings of uneasiness with an existing practice or custom, and yet so safely and surely does our Heavenly Father lead those who in confidence trust Him, that the secret intimations of His will, manifested through these feelings of uneasiness, are more to be regarded than all the arguments that human reason may adduce.

I believe that photographs have come to be household idols with many people in the world; and is there not danger that even moderate indulgence on our part may lead us to place our affections unduly upon them; and that they may thus stand in the way of that nearness to the "Father of Spirits" in which He will "teach us of His ways," and instruct us in the knowledge of His will? For "whom will He teach wisdom, and whom will He make to understand doctrine?—them that are weaned from the idols of the world, and withdrawn from its consolations."

In a recent conversation with a young woman she related to me, that some years ago she was solicited by a number of schoolmates to join with them in having their pictures taken in a group; she said she felt at the time a secret check in regard to it, but so far yielded to the entreaty of others as to go to the photographers with them, when to her joy she found he was not at home, and their purpose was for the time thwarted. She looked upon this as a great favor to her, and she experienced a deepening of conviction, so that she never afterwards felt liberty to yield to the temptation, believing as she remarked to me, "that to have done so would have been a double sin." I do not wish to enlarge upon this subject, but simply to ask of all, that they will submit (as I believe this young woman did) to be searched with the "lamp of truth" and see whether there is not in this practice a root of "pride and self-gratification," and whether it is not one of the "Little Foxes" that are spoiling our tender vine.

Theodoret reports of his own mother, "That in her younger years having a blemish in one of her eyes, which had baffled the arts of physic, she was at length persuaded to make her address to one Peter, famous for the gift of miracles, who lived near Antioch a very severe and ascetic course of life; and to render herself (as she thought) the more considerable in his eye, she put on all her bravery, her richest robes, her pendants and chains of pearl, and whatsoever could render her fine and splendid. No sooner was she come unto him, but the severe and uncomplimentary man at first bluntly entertained her with this discourse: 'Tell me, daughter, suppose an excellent artist, having drawn a picture according to all the laws and rules of art, should expose and hang it forth to view; and another rude and unskilful bungler coming by, should find fault with this excellent piece, and attempt to mend it, and draw the eye-brows to a larger length, and add more color to the cheeks, would not the true author be (and that justly) angry, that his art was disparaged and undervalued, and needless additions made to the piece by an unskilful hand? And so it is here: Can we think that the great Artificer of the world, the Maker and Former of our nature, is not justly angry, when you accuse his incomparable wisdom and perfection of unskilfulness and want of knowledge; for you would not add your reds, whites and blacks, did you not think your bodies needed these additions? And while you think so, you condemn your Creator for weakness and ignorance."

Carthage, Ancient and Modern.

Carthago delata est. These words are truer to-day than when they were first spoken. Carthage is utterly destroyed, and the few signs of human life it shows only tend to increase the sense of utter desolation. On one of the eminences of ancient Carthage stands the modern village of Sidi Busied. This village is held sacred by the Mohammedans, because they believe it contains the shrine of the French King St. Louis, who, they claim, became a Moslem immediately before he died of the plague, at the close of his disastrous invasion of Tunis. A mile or two distant from this spot is another eminence, the site of the citadel of ancient Carthage, where the Roman Catholics have a shrine to the honor of the same king over the spot where they say he died a martyr in the cause of Christianity against the Infidels. With the exception of these two "high places," consecrated to the worship of the same dead man by the votaries of two rival false religions, and a few summer residences by the seashore, the whole of ancient Carthage is ploughed as a field. It is laid utterly desolate. Even the ruins are gone. Nothing remains of them but some extensive underground cisterns, a few shapeless blocks of masonry scattered about, and the foundations of several temples and buildings which have been unearthed. All that the traveller finds there, when he comes to view the once proud Mistress of the seas, is the absence of everything.

The origin of Carthage is uncertain. The story that it was built by Dido, who slew herself because Æneas forsook her, is known to be only a poetic myth. All that is certain is that it originated in a colony from Tyre. Situated on one side of the Bay of Tunis, with the gently sloping hills surmounted by the "twin peaks" (Æneid, i. 162) of Hamman-el-inf on the other side of the Bay, and with the rugged mountains of Zarawan in the distance, ancient Carthage must have been one of the most lovely places in the Mediterranean.

Carthage was the greatest commercial State in the ancient world, and her commerce was carried on chiefly by sea. Her army was small, but she had an almost unlimited supply of money, which is called the sinews of war. Her influence was, on the whole, pacific and civilizing, but her commercial morality was at a very low ebb. Great Britain has without doubt succeeded to her commercial position, and, alas! also to her commercial maxims. In the judgment of God she fell before the military power of Rome, and in the fall we may see a solemn warning for ourselves.

It is commonly said that Carthage was destroyed by the Romans, but this is only in a certain sense true. They destroyed her national existence, but not the city. Scipio failed in his attempt to burn it, and twenty years later the Romans themselves restored and colonized it, and it soon became the second city in importance in the empire. Its magnificence remained unimpaired for several centuries after the Christian era. The native Church of Carthage was one of the largest and most flourishing in primitive times, and was rich in the blood of martyrs. Here lived St. Cyprian, the stern disciplinarian and bishop, who was himself "faithful unto death." Here lived the godly matron St. Perpetua, and the spot where she suffered martyrdom—the amphitheatre—has recently been laid bare to view. Here lived Mona, the praying mother of an abandoned son, who implored her bishop what more she could do for him, and received the answer, "Pray on: the child of so many prayers can never be lost." Here lived also that son, who afterwards became "the Father of the Western church," St. Augustine, the authority of whose writings our own Reformers considered second only to that of Holy Scripture itself. But after a while the light of the Christian Church was all but put out by the hordes of barbarians who poured into the country. Afterwards came the followers of the False Prophet, who killed or enslaved all the males and took the women as their wives or concubines, and thus in a very short time the whole country became Mohammedan. But it was not until the time of the Crusaders that the City of Carthage ceased to be. Then it was not destroyed but rebuilt. When the cannon of the Crusaders made the heights of Carthage unbearable for the Mohammedan inhabitants, they pulled down their houses, carried the materials about eight miles inland, to the other side of the salt water lake, which lay at the back of the city, and built Tunis.—London Record.

"Going unto the Tomb to Wail there."—Although the ritual laws of the Prophet forbid the wailing of women at funerals and at the tombs, they have never been able to break the force of immemorial custom. At an Oriental funeral, from ten to twenty women may often be seen walking behind the bier, with dishevelled hair, uttering weird, shrill cries of lamentation. The cry of lamentation has a peculiar and unmistakable intonation of its own; it has come down traditionally from ancient times, and it can be heard over the whole East. The custom mentioned in the text—that of going to the tomb to wail there—still exists in the East.

A Touching Incident.—There is one touching incident of the life of William Wirt. In his younger days he was a victim to the passion for intoxicating drinks. Affianced to a beautiful and accomplished young woman, he had broken repeated pledges and amendments, and she, after patiently and kindly enduring his disgraceful habit, at length dismissed him, deeming him incorrigible. Their next meeting after the dismissal was in the public street, in the city of Richmond. William Wirt lay drunk and asleep on the sidewalk, on a hot summer day, the rays of the sun pouring down on his uncovered head, and the flies crawling over his swollen features. As the young lady approached him in her walk, her attention was attracted by the spectacle, strange to her eyes, but alas! so common to others who knew the victim, as to excite little remark. She did not at first recognize the sleeper, and was about to hasten on, when she was led by one of those impulses which form the turning-points in human lives to scrutinize his features. What was her emotion when she recognized in him her discarded lover! She drew forth her handkerchief and carefully spread it over his face, unharmed away. When Wirt came to himself, he found the handkerchief, and on one corner the initials of the beloved name. With a heart almost breaking with grief and remorse, he made a new vow of reformation. He kept that vow and married the owner of the handkerchief. Wel, might he preserve the handkerchief as he did all his life, guarding it with jealous care.

To adopt the modes and fashions of the world, is to be unchristian-like.

For "The Friend."

David White of North Carolina, sends the following information:—

"Thinking that perhaps the readers of "The Friend" would be interested in knowing of the progress made by the Managers of Friends' School, New Garden, N. C., since the great calamity of the burning of King Hall, in 1885.

Just one year elapsed, and the new King Hall was so far completed that the faculty and pupils entered upon their duties in that building, which is admirably adapted to the uses for which it is intended. The insurance money on the old building, with donations and our own subscriptions by friends and others who responded in sympathy to our necessities, has nearly completed the building. We need a good deal of furniture, to supply the place of that consumed, in order to accommodate the increasing number of applicants who thus manifest the benefits of the school at this place."

New Garden, Guilford Co., N. C.
Ninth Mo. 6th, 1886.

When the last noble aspiration dies in the heart of a man; when the last lingering respect for innocence fails him; when he refuses to respond to any impulse save those which spring from the brutal nature or the carnal mind; when he ceases to be a ruler in his life, and is driven hither and thither at the bidding of unruly passions and tumultuous desires,—then indeed he has entered into the land of unending fire; then he experiences in himself the bitterness of the cry of Milton's Satan:

"Me miserable! which way shall I fly
Infinite wrath, and infinite despair?
Which way I fly is hell; myself am hell;
And in the lowest deep, a lower deep,
Still threatening to devour me, opens wide."

So too, conversely, every act which is prompted by the spirit of Christ belongs to the sphere in which Christ dwells, and takes hold upon his eternal heaven. The man whose mind is filled with the deep, true life of Christianity, knows that blessedness will be his lot hereafter, because blessedness is already with him now.

This consciousness of a present heaven and of present relation to the infernal, takes not a little from the declarations of Scripture with regard to the future world, but rather adds impressively to its note of warning. We are not more likely to question the reality of future punishment when we see the punishment of sin already begun in this life—when we see men and women in whom every note of their nobler nature seems to have disappeared, and who are, spiritually, torn in pieces by hate, remorse, ambition, and ignoble desire. These live, as it were, in the porch of doom. Nor are we less likely to believe in a future state of heavenly peace, when we see that the Spirit of Christ bestows upon the followers of Christ, even in this life, a peace which the world can neither give nor take away.—Selected.

Hints for Husbands.—The first duty of husbands is to sympathize with their wives in all their cares and labors. Men are apt to forget, amid the perplexities and annoyances of business, that home cares are also annoying, and try the patience and the strength of their wives. They come home expecting sympathy and attention, but are too apt to have none to give. Frequently they are morose and peevish, and give their attention to the newspaper, or leave the house, or seek the companionship of men at the club or the store, and sometimes the hotel, while their wives are left alone and sad, borne down with family cares, and longing for sympathy and affection. A single kindly word or look to indicate her husband's thoughtfulness would lift half the weight of care from her heart.

Secondly, husbands should make confidants of their wives, consulting them on their business plans and prospects, and especially on their troubles and embarrassments.

A woman's intuition is often better than all the wisdom and shrewdness of her "better half," and her ready sympathy and interest is a powerful aid to his efforts for their mutual welfare. Thirdly, men should show their love for their wives in constant attentions, in their manner of treating them, and in the thousand and one trifling offices of affection which may be hardly noticeable, but which make all the difference between a life of sad and undefined longing and a cheery, happy existence. Above all, men should beware of treating their wives with rudeness and incivility, as though they were the only ones not entitled to their consideration and respect. They should think of their sensitive feelings and their need of sympathy, and "never let the fire of love go out or cease to show that the flame is burning with unabated fervor."—Selected.

The Cattle Train.—Somewhere above Fitchburg, as we stopped for twenty minutes at a station, I amused myself by looking out of a window at a water-fall which came tumbling over the rocks, and spread into a wide pool that flowed up to the railway. Close by stood a cattle train; and the mournful sounds that came from it touched my heart.

Full in the hot sun stood the cars; and every crevice of room between the bars across the doorways was filled with pathetic noses, sniffing eagerly at the sultry gusts that blew by, with now and then a fresher breath from the pool that lay dimpling before them. How they must have suffered, in sight of water, with the cool dash of the fall tantalizing them, and not a drop to wet their poor parched mouths.

The cattle lowed dismally, and the sheep tumbled one over the other, in their frantic attempts to reach the blessed air, bleating so plaintively the while that I was tempted to go out and see what I could do for them. But the time was nearly up; and, while I hesitated, two little girls appeared, and did the kind deed better than I could have done it.

I could not hear what they said; but as they worked away so heartily, their little tanned faces grew lovely to me, in spite of their old hats, their bare feet, and their shabby gowns. One pulled off her apron, spread it on the grass, and, emptying upon it the berries from her pail, ran to the pool and returned with it dripping, to hold it up to the suffering sheep, who stretched their hot tongues gratefully to meet it, and lapped the precious water with an eagerness that made the little Barefoot's task a hard one.

But to and fro she ran, never tired, though the small pail was so soon empty; and her friend meanwhile pulled great handfuls of clover and grass for the cows, and, having no pail, filled her "picking dish" with water to throw on the poor dusty noses appealing to her through the bars. I wish I could have told those tender-hearted children how beautiful their compassion made that hot, noisy place, and what a sweet picture I took away with me of those two little sisters of charity.—L. M. Alcott.

A plant must live in the sunshine, a fish in the water, a man in the air, and a disciple of Christ must abide in Christ.

Natural History, Science, &c.

The Means of Contagion in Scarlet Fever.—Scarlet-fever can be communicated by infected milk, and, as far as we know, the milk has only to stand in the room where the disease exists or has existed to absorb the germs, which are so subtle, so light, and yet so tenacious as to float in the air and adhere to particles of dust.

We all know how much dust is constantly floating in the air; let a beam of sunlight pass through an opening in the shutter, and we can readily see how the scales of skin from the body, pieces of lint, etc., can carry these microbes, which may be thrown off in the mucus from the nostrils and mouth, or in the perspiration.

Not only are these secretions germ-carriers—that is contagious—and they have all been proven so by direct inoculation, but the passages from the bowels, as well as the urine, are so. In that way sewer-air may be a means of their conveyance; drinking-water also, as well as the vapor from soil on which these matters have been thrown.

The poison of scarlatina is, then either inhaled by the individual or is swallowed. It is then taken up by the circulation, and, finding itself surrounded by material which develops it, vivifies it, becomes rapidly reproduced, and the symptoms of the disease show themselves. This period between the reception of the poison and the appearance of the symptoms is called the period of incubation; this is known to be either from one to six days, in some cases longer.—Dr. J. M. Keating, in Babyhood.

Poisonous Honey.—At a meeting of the Agricultural Society of Dresden, notice was called to the honey imported from Trebizond, which is sometimes rendered poisonous by the bees frequenting the flowers of the Stramonium, a poisonous plant which abounds there. In America also, it is said that poisonous principles have sometimes been found in honey, especially that derived from the Southern Jessamine.

Fattening Ducks and Geese at Canton.—"Of all the multitudinous boats perhaps the strangest are the duck and geese boats, some of which shelter as many as 2000 birds, which are purchased wholesale at the great duck and geese farms and reared for the market. After seeing these boats, I no longer wondered at the multitude of these birds in the provision markets (Canton), where they form one of the staple foods of the people. Beyond the first expense of buying the half-grown birds, the owner of the boat incurs none in rearing them, as he simply turns them out twice a day to forage for themselves along the mud shores and the neighboring fields, where they find abundance of dainty little land-crabs, frogs, worms, &c. They are allowed a couple of hours for feeding and are then called back, when they obey with an alacrity which is truly surprising. This extraordinary punctuality is attained by fear of the sharp stroke of a bamboo, which is invariably administered to the last bird."—Wanderings in China by C. F. Gordon Cumming.

Effect of Mind upon the Body.—Bacon says:—"I had from my childhood, a wart upon one of my fingers; afterwards, when I was about sixteen years old, being then at Paris, there grew upon both my hands a number of warts, at the least an hundred in a month's space. The English ambassador's lady, who was a woman far from superstition, told me one day she would help me away with my warts; whereupon she got a piece of lard with the skin on, and rubbed the warts all over with the fat side, and, amongst the rest, that wart which I had from my childhood; then she nailed the piece of lard, with the fat towards the sun, upon a post of her chamber window, which was to the south. The success was that within five week's space all the warts were quite away, and that wart which I had so long endured for company.

Silk Glands of Moths.—In China, the silkworms taken from the full grown caterpillars of several species of large moths are used in making fishing lines and for other purposes. The two silk-glands at this period in the insect's life are full of the viscid white substance from which the cocoon is to be spun. They extend nearly the whole length of the body, lying in loops on either side of the alimentary canal.

The Chinese make a transverse cut across the back of the caterpillar, take hold of one of the loops, draw the gland out entire, drop it in vinegar to take off its outer coat, then stretch it to several times its original length and dry it. A durable filament is thus formed very much resembling cat-gut and much cheaper. When used as fishing line it is renewed and strengthened from time to time by being soaked in rice water. It has been satisfactorily used by Dr. Causland, of the English Presbyterian Mission at Swatow, as a ligature in surgical operations.

—Murder of G. C. Haddock.—G. C. Haddock was a Methodist minister, located at Sioux City, Iowa, who was shot in the streets of that city, about 10 o'clock at night on the 3rd of Eighth Month, on account, it is believed, of his active exertions in enforcing the prohibitory laws of Iowa.

In explanation of the occurrence of such a deed in that State, it is said, that in Sioux City the law prohibiting the sale of liquors was openly disregarded; that many of the business men of the town objected to its enforcement, fearing it might be a pecuniary disadvantage; and that G. C. Haddock had incurred the enmity of the looser classes by becoming the plaintiff in a large number of suits against the saloons. He had been out riding, and on his return, having left the horse at the livery stable, was shot from behind as he crossed the street, by some unknown assassin, and fell dead without speaking.

About two weeks before his death, he wrote a note to the Editor of the North Western Christian Advocate, in which he said,—“We are engaged in a desperate struggle here. It is dangerous for a man to take a radical stand for Prohibition. It is currently rumored that 100 men are under oath to burn the churches as soon as the saloons are closed. I have signed twenty-five complaints, and I believe that I take my life in hand by so doing; but somebody has to do so. I believe we will win eventually, though the fight will be long and desperate.”

The Christian Advocate, of New York, has since made inquiries which confirm the belief that the murdered man had no personal enemies, apart from his enforcement of the law. Its correspondents agree that the shot was fired with the knowledge and in the presence of several men, and that it was the understanding of quite a large number that, if he continued his work, he was to be disabled in some way. On the facts of this case it makes the following comments:—

“Wherever the prohibitory liquor law is enforced so as to stop the sale of rum wholly, or almost wholly, in a town or city where public sentiment is not in earnest, active sympathy with it, desperate measures will be resorted to by saloon-keepers. Ordinarily they hope to escape by perjury in the courts, by bribery of officials, or by bribery of one or more jurors; and, by the frequency of failures to convict, to tire out the prosecuting attorneys, even though they be not corrupt.

“But when these means fail, and the saloons are absolutely closed, among every few rum-sellers there will be at least one who will resort to violence, and in a large number there will be many who will either commit murder, or procure it to be committed, or terrorize the community by the burning of churches or the private buildings of those who are active against them. It has always been so, and has been particularly so in places rather larger than villages, but not so thoroughly organized as cities of considerable size.

“It should be understood that wherever saloons exist the elements whence mobs and murderers arise exist. They are causes themselves, and intensify all other causes. All good citizens should be on the alert to discover some means of suppressing this traffic, and, in the language of the Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, should ‘co-operate in all measures which may seem to them wisely adapted to secure that end.’”

—The Drink-Evil in India.—A correspondent of the Union Signal, writing from London respecting a largely attended temperance conference in that city, states that a letter was read from a minister in India, setting forth “that the Indians, formerly a nation of abstainers, were gradually becoming a nation of drinkers, through the national and social customs and the religious practices [referring to the wine-taking of the outward communion] of their British rulers. The consumption of intoxicants had been greatly increased by the desire of the government to raise a revenue through the native liquor traffic, which revenue had increased during the six years, 1877—83, by 23,000,000 rupees. The professed object of the government was to diminish the consumption of liquor, but the real effect had been the reverse of that. According to the present system, nearly every village had a liquor shop, and the natives called it ‘the government liquor shop,’ and believed they were conferring a favor upon the government by drinking the liquor it provided. The government sold the licenses for a particular district to the highest bidder; who did all he could to multiply the liquor shops and increase the sale of liquor. It was time, the writer maintained, either to restrict the number of licenses, or to prohibit the manufacture of drink. As to the native Christians, taking intoxicants was regarded as a sign of a profession of the Christian religion.”

—Funerals on First-Days.—The Funeral Directors' Association of Philadelphia have addressed a circular letter to the clergymen of that city, requesting them to use their influence in having funerals held on some other day of the week, except in cases where it is necessary they should be held on that day. They say, that day is often selected as a matter of convenience to the relatives or friends; and that it involves a large amount of labor upon funeral directors and carriage drivers.

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 18, 1886.

A letter from a friend, referring to the recent earthquake in this country, and especially to its destructive violence in some parts of the Southern States, says:—“The solemn events at Charleston, S. C., must have brought the realities of an eternal world very near to the view of thousands of our fellow countrymen.

We are so accustomed to regard the earth as solid and stable, that it is a very startling experience to find it rocking and quivering, and shaking down the walls we have erected on it. Perhaps there is nothing more calculated to make man feel his own helplessness, than thus to have his “foundations destroyed.” The accounts received from Charleston show that this effect was produced on the minds of many there; as we believe has been the case in all countries where severe shocks of earthquake have been felt. It would indeed be a blessed result of this visitation of the Almighty, if those who have felt their danger and their want of power to resist it, should turn in true humility and sincerity to that Divine Power, which controls all things, and submitting to his government, find a place of refuge from all commotion and disturbance. What a blessed thing it is for any one, who can adopt the language of the Psalmist—“God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble: therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed.” Though such an one must bear his share in the outward sufferings and losses of the community in which he lives, yet he may at the same time be sustained by the assurance that all things will work together for good to them that love God.

We have spoken of the earthquake as “a visitation of the Almighty;” and such we believe it may properly be called, even if such phenomena are rationally explained as the result of slow contraction of the earth, a readjustment of pressure and tension; or by the operation of other natural laws. For the laws of nature are nothing more than the effects of those properties with which the Divine, all-pervading, all-powerful Mind has endowed his creation; and it is not unreasonable to believe, that it is in accordance with his plans, that these outward occurrences should have also an influence in his moral government, by awakening careless mortals to a sense of their insecurity, and leading them to seek the protection of the Lord, when all else is felt to be insufficient.

The sufferings of our brethren at Charleston are a call to those elsewhere to do what they can to relieve their wants. There must be great need for help from outside to prevent the suffering and loss of life which otherwise will result from want of protection and of sufficient food. We hope that prompt and liberal efforts will be made to meet the demand.

We have received a copy of “Some Records of the Early Friends in Surrey and Sussex,” compiled from the original minute-books and other sources, by Thomas W. Marsh.

It is illustrated by a fac-simile of a page from the earliest Minute Book of Horsham Meeting, and by plates representing several of the old meeting-houses.

It is a valuable and interesting collection of facts throwing light on the early history of the Society of Friends in the part of England of which it speaks; and embracing in its scope the establishment of meetings for discipline, the methods of procedure in the treatment of offenders, acknowledgments, disownments, and marriages, the care taken to alleviate the sufferings of prisoners for Truth's sake, the testimony against tythes, the efforts to procure legal sanction for the substitution of affirmations in place of oaths, and other subjects.

It is also enriched with biographical sketches of a number of Friends who were members, or otherwise connected with the meetings in Surrey and Sussex.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The total exports of cotton from the United States during the twelve months which ended on the 31st of Eighth Month last, amounted in value to $207,907,711, against $198,494,350 during the corresponding period of 1885.

A letter to the San Francisco Bulletin from Seoul, Corea, says the deaths from Asiatic cholera, from the 15th to the 25th of Seventh Month, numbered 3140. “Since then, from 267 to 497 persons have died daily. Coffins could not be obtained and bodies were wrapped in sackings.”

Mayor Courtney, of Charleston, has issued a proclamation to the people of that city in regard to the situation there, announcing the organization of relief measures, and advising every one “to seek work in any and every way possible.”

The situation in Charleston continues to improve, many of the people have returned to their homes, and efforts are being made to patch up the damaged houses so as to make them rain proof. The bricklayers refuse to work for less than five dollars a day, and are now receiving that pay. The amount of relief money received thus far is $200,000.

A telegram from Akron, Ohio, reports that "the people living in the coal-mining regions, embracing four towns and quite a large range of country, were awakened at four o'clock first-day morning by low, rumbling sounds, accompanied by shocks of earthquake so distinct that houses were terribly shaken and articles on mantels were thrown on the floor." A little later in the morning "a very large meteor passed over the shaken-up portion of the country, travelling close to the earth, and throwing off heated particles every few feet. The meteor illuminated the country for a great distance, and is supposed to have struck the earth near the eastern part of the city, as the shock in that locality was distinctly felt immediately after the great fire ball passed." The people of the shaken region recall the fact that "several years ago the earth settled several feet without apparent cause," thereabouts, and they now fear that they will be swallowed up.

The spoiling of hitherto sweet and clear artesian well water in various places, is attributed to the earthquake.

A local option election was held on the 13th instant, in Winchester, Virginia, and it resulted in the success of the temperance ticket, who carried every ward, and have an aggregate majority of 169. The law will take effect on the 1st of Sixth Mo. next, and continue in operation for two years.

A telegram from Tolono, Illinois, reports great loss and suffering in that section from a protracted drought. "For three months the ground has not been wet two inches deep by rain. Unless there is a copious fall soon, there will be absolutely no water to be had except from the few tubular wells about the country."

White huckleberries were offered for sale in Norwich lately by a farmer of that vicinity. They are said to grow in only two places in Connecticut, a round hillock in a big swamp in Salem, and a similar place at Spring Hill, in Windham County.

A peculiarity of the older orange trees in Florida this season is that most of their fruit is borne in clusters in the tops of the trees, where the branches were most completely denuded of their leaves last winter.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 361, which was 11 less than during the previous week, and 17 less than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing 174 were males and 187 females; 43 died of consumption; 25 of heart diseases; 25 of cholera infantum; 23 of marasmus; 15 of convulsions; 14 of diphtheria; 13 of inflammation of the brain; 13 of typhoid fever; 14 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels, and 12 of cramp.

Petroleum was quiet at 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Flour and Meal.—The flour market ruled firm for choice springs which were in fair demand, but winters were abundant, dull and weak. Sales of 125 barrels Penna. family, at $3.75; 500 barrels Ohio, straight, at $4.35 a $4.50; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.75 a $4.85; 250 barrels Minnesota clear, at $4 a $4.12; 500 barrels do., straight, at $4.50, and 625 barrels do. patent, at $4.80 a $5. Rye flour was quiet at $3.25 for new, and $3.40 for old.

Grain.—Wheat was dull and lower; No. 2 red closing at 85 cts. bid and 85 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. asked. Corn closed at $\frac{1}{2}$ c. lower; with No. 2 mixed at 48 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. bid and 49 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. asked. Oats were dull and $\frac{1}{2}$ c. lower; No. 2 white closing at 34 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. bid, and 35 cts. asked.

FOREIGN.—C. S. Parnell has sent a draft of his measure to Gladstone. The first clause provides that leaseholders may apply to the Court to fix judicial rent; the second, that tenants whose rents were fixed a year ago may apply to the Court for a revaluation, and the third, that the Court, pending decision on applications, suspends evictions on payment into Court of one half the rent due. Many Gladstonians disapprove of the amount of the reduction. The Parnellites assert that the full values justify a demand of over fifty per cent. reduction. Parnell, in conference with John Morley, urged a reduction of 75 per cent., but, on Morley's advice, he limited the reduction to 50 per cent. Leaseholders are included in the bill.

The Government's response will be that Parnell's data are inaccurate; that the Dublin executive returns of market values for 1885-86 show that the reduction in prices in Ireland is less than in England and Scotland, ranging from ten to fifteen per cent. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach and Lord Randolph Churchill will deny that the bulk of the Irish tenants will be unable to pay their rents in the Eleventh Mo., or that a host of evictions are probable.

A cable despatch received in Boston on the 8th inst., reports that a terrible hail storm, accompanied by high wind, recently prevailed in Paris and its environs. It was most severe in the suburbs, where it destroyed trees, fruit and vegetables. Large trees were torn to shreds by the hail. The loss to glass and to gardens is estimated at $1,000,000. The Bois de Vincennes has the appearance of a forest riddled by shot.

A series of resolutions has been adopted by the commission appointed by the Paris Academy of Medicine to make an investigation and report on the danger to the well-being of the population from the increased use of alcohol. The Government is requested to take the most stringent measures to prevent the entry into France of artificially alcoholized wine. It is also asked that the number of taverns and wine shops shall be largely reduced, and that the laws for the repression of drunkenness shall be strictly enforced.

Prince Alexander of Bulgaria, has signed the deed of abdication, and has departed from Sofia. A compact mass of people witnessed Alexander's departure from the palace, and thousands lined the route taken by him through the town. The Prince stood up in his carriage bowing to the people and saying, "Good bye, my brethren." The populace were much affected. Tears sprang to many eyes, and hearty wishes were expressed for the Prince's speedy return.

A manifesto was issued by Alexander prior to his departure. It says: "We, Alexander, Prince of Bulgaria, being convinced that our departure will contribute to Bulgaria's liberation, having received assurance from the Czar that the independence, liberty and rights of our country shall remain intact, and that nobody shall interfere with its internal affairs, inform our beloved people that we renounce the throne, wishing to prove how dear to us are the interests of Bulgaria, for which we are willing to sacrifice that which is more precious to us than life."

The Novoe Vremya says: "Of all the signers of the Berlin Treaty, England alone appears inclined to oppose Russia's Bulgarian policy. Russia must know whether England's intention is serious, in order to prepare herself to take measures accordingly, as Russia will not be brought to a standstill by England's veto."

The Russian agent has received the Czar's reply to Bulgaria's proposal. The Czar says Russia will recognize the Bulgarian Regency, and assist the union of Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia, on condition that no acts of violence be committed. Russia advises that public opinion in Bulgaria be allowed to calm down before a new prince be elected to the Bulgarian throne.

The Russian agent has not yet communicated the Czar's reply to the Bulgarian Government, because the relations between the present Bulgarian Ministers and him are very strained. During the sitting of the National Assembly on the 13th inst., several of the deputies proposed that the Bulgarian Government send a telegram to the Czar, requesting him to communicate with the Bulgarian Government direct, instead of through the agent.

Up to Ninth Month 12th, the total number of cases of cholera in Italy, since the outbreak of the disease, is reported to be 45,000, and the total number of deaths 14,000.

Alfred B. Morrine, member of the Newfoundland Legislature, who is now in Halifax, says the Labrador fisheries are an entire failure, and that 65,000 people are to-day destitute, and will be entirely dependent upon the Government for subsistence during the fall and winter. "The total failure of the shore fishery this year renders 70,000 people destitute, only 20,000 of those depending upon them being prepared to stand the loss of a year's labor. The people have barely enough for present necessities and no means of earning a dollar. The only relief to this picture is the fact that the potato crop, the only crop raised on the island, is turning out well, and will yield about a peck per head of population." A. B. Morrine says: "This seems highly colored in view of the recent fabrications of starved stories among the Labrador Esquimaux, but it is the plain English of actual facts and inevitable consequences."

Colonel Gilder and his companion, Griffith, started from Winnipeg on the 9th instant, for the North Pole. They will go by water from Selkirk to York Factory. The outfit which they take consists of food, firearms and ammunition, scientific instruments, a hand organ, banbles for the natives, &c. Also two sledges, sixteen feet long and four feet wide. After leaving York Factory he will take as little as possible with him, because of the difficulty of carrying it along. He relies for sustenance mainly upon the game to be secured along the route.

DIED, at his residence in Newfane, Niagara Co., N. Y., Eighth Month 6th, 1886, WILLIAM BRACKEN, aged eighty years; a member of the Society of Friends from early life, and one who remained a firm believer in the doctrines of ancient Quakerism as professed by Barclay, Fox and Penn. This dear Friend emigrated from Yorkshire, England, when a young man, with no pecuniary means. After landing in America, by honest industry he acquired a competency for old age, and was blessed with the comforts of life. His friends have the consoling belief that, through the merits of a crucified Redeemer, his end was crowned with everlasting happiness.

Eleventh Mo. 7th, 1837. At the North Meeting, Enos Lee, a Friend from Exeter, had a short communication, lively and excellent. It was respecting the manna given to the children of Israel in their journey toward the promised land. "They who gathered much had none over, and they who gathered little had no lack." Although Moses was commanded to lead them, and wrought many miracles for them, yet he could not give them this bread. And so it is in a spiritual sense; we cannot give it one to another, but our Father which is in Heaven can, and will give it to all his hungering and thirsting children; but it must be our every day concern, to seek for it. Near the close of the meeting, E. Pitfield arose with saying, it was very unexpected to her to have any thing to communicate amongst us, but a word of encouragement dwelt with her for some now present, the language of whose hearts this day had been: "By whom shall Jacob arise, for he is indeed small?" She encouraged such as these to faithfulness in themselves, and to that required of them. Quoting, "Ye are my disciples if ye do whatsoever I command you." Such as do the will of my Father who is in Heaven, said the Son and Saviour, are as my mother and sister and brother. Oh, this sweet relationship, how precious! She said she had felt this morning a renewed desire for herself and for her friends, that we might more and more know of this communion. "The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal—the Lord knoweth them that are his."

8th. At Orange St. William Evans was excellent to parents, respecting the care of their dear children. "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much." He believed in no instance would it prove more availing, than in that of truly concerned parents on behalf of their precious children. Where a true heart-felt concern is maintained, how do the prayers of such parents ascend! desiring nothing so much for them as the Truth. Though these may not always see the desire of their hearts, yet continuing to intercede, he believed the prayers of such would be regarded. We may remember, he continued, that when our blessed Saviour was personally on earth, there were those who brought their little children to Him, that he should bless them: there were also those who endeavored to prevent them from so doing; but Jesus said, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not," &c. We may also remember how the Lord blessed the house of Obed-edom, because the ark of the testimony rested there! So it would be now if parents were only enough concerned to support in their families the testimony of Truth. Then we should find that the Lord would delight to bless such families. He was also excellent respecting parents setting a right example before their children. Then addressing the children, he desired, that we who were blessed with godly parents, might value our blessing and very often crave that He who had been the God of our fathers and grandfathers, would be our God; and lead us along through the many besetting difficulties which surround, and finally receive us unto Himself.

9th. Went from the city to Germantown, to our own Quarterly Meeting. And oh! saith my soul, may this season of favor not only be remembered, but tend to strengthen that which of late has been ready to die; as also afresh encourage to enter into covenant with my Heavenly Father, for whose bounty this week past, my heart has overflowed; and the language has been, "what shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits?" We had the company and labors of our friend Samuel Bettle, whose concern seemed to be principally for the youth. He arose with this language, which he said had dwelt with him early after taking his seat: "I am found of them who sought me not," &c. He reverted in a feeling manner to the days of his youth; endeavoring to impress upon us, how sweet it was to yield to the early visitations upon the mind! He believed there were those amongst us, who had in measure yielded, and had known and handled of the good word of life; but for want of following on to know the Lord, the work had been marred. They had "kept back part of the price," not being willing to make a full surrender; and thus bringing on themselves great poverty, darkness and distress, so as to be ready at times to exclaim, "Oh wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death!" These were tenderly pleaded with to part with all, and make a full surrender; and to enter into a whole-hearted covenant. Then he believed there were those present who will be made pillars in the Church, that shall go no more out. To those advanced in life, his language was very consolatory. Some in an especial manner, whose prayer was: "Now, also, when I am old and gray headed, O God, forsake me not," &c. After this, renewed strength was given to our dear friend to intercede for us, that there might be raised up from among the children, Davids as from the sheep coat, and Deborahs to stand as mothers in Israel. And then for the little companies who, when separated one from another and gathered in their little meetings, often feel very poor; that this might have a tendency to draw them nearer and nearer unto Thee, for Thou continues to be as near the few as the many, if only gathered in Thy name.

12th. In our own little meeting this morning, I was afresh made to feel the long forbearing and tender mercy of my Heavenly Father; and renewed desires were raised, to be a more willing and obedient child.

23rd. A silent, precious, good meeting, 26th. Do not know when I have experienced such darkness and distress, as for a while after assembling with my friends this morning! when relief was granted through tears. How was my heart poured out before the Lord, craving that He would be near and strengthen me to perform acceptable worship. Near the close of the meeting E. C. arose with, "Master, Master, carest thou not that we perish?" Thus were the disciples of their dear Lord permitted to be proved in not being able to bring their bark to their desired haven, till He arose who rebuked the winds and the waves. He believed this situation applicable to states now present; and encouragingly were they spoken to, that their faith should be strengthened.

Twelfth Mo. 3rd. Afresh given to feel my own nothingness.

8th. This day our dear friend, Samuel Bettle, had an appointed meeting at Plymouth; having a minute to visit the meetings in our Quarter. How my heart did rejoice when I heard it, it seems so long since we have had a visit of this kind. Many of our hearts, I trust, were prepared to receive him, and to return thanks where alone due. Samuel arose with: "Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men." It was under a fresh sense of the goodness of the Lord, that the Psalmist uttered this language: and, notwithstanding, he could at that time adopt it, yet he had his proving and stripping seasons to pass through. We find in another place that he was panting after God, saying: "As an hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God." We may also find that even the apostles had their seasons of proving; they found it needful to pray that their faith might be increased, pleading, "Lord, increase our faith." However short and simple this may appear, the Lord will hear and regard such prayers when they are the effusions of a heart sincerely desirous of serving Him. He treated instructively upon true prayer: bringing to our remembrance the many instances of our Saviour retiring to solitary places to pray; sometimes to the garden, at others to the sea-side, and in mountains alone; and even continuing, at times, "all night in prayer to God." He believed there were those in this little company who had been visited; but a whole surrender had not been made—a part of the price had been reserved. There had been a want of faith, true living faith, which would have removed mountains if only attained to. He craved that these might be brought back to Bethel and enter again into covenant; they would then be led along, step by step, through the green pastures and by the still waters. "It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth. He sitteth alone and keepeth silence because he hath borne it upon him." Silent worship was also treated upon instructively, and the Scripture revived:

"The hour cometh and now is," &c. Therefore let none present themselves before the Lord in a careless, indifferent state of mind. Not one would be cast off that was truly concerned to draw nigh unto God. Those wading under discouragement, who might feel few and very poor, were desired to remember that He would be in the midst of even the two or three, if gathered in his name. The meeting closed with solemn supplication.

14th. Often am I brought to feel, and afresh so this morning, my poverty and inability for anything good. Have been ready to exclaim this day: Can it be that ever one so poor, weak and foolish, can find acceptance with Him who is all purity!

A Trip to the Saguenay.

LETTER NO. 5.

Quebec, Eighth Mo. 5th, 1886.

Our boat stopping at Murray Bay last evening for two hours, gave us the opportunity to visit the place in the twilight, of which M. and I availed ourselves.

The calèche is like the old-fashioned chairs of forty and more years ago, with a narrow seat on the dasher for the driver. Our's had no top, which allowed us to have unobstructed views and full enjoyment of the evening air; and having a good Canadian horse, a French Canadian driver for my linguistic companion to practice with, good roads, semi-moonlight, semi-daylight, and a slightly foreign country, the drive was interesting and exhilarating. Canadian drivers are sometimes rather reckless, and though we have so far been favored with reasonably careful ones, we fear the charge is well founded.

A fellow-traveller on our passage down the river gave an amusing account of a lady and child who were being wildly driven, but to all remonstrances the Jehu only answered, "Pas danger, pas danger;" (no danger, no danger.) Presently, however, out went the lady with her child, and as they rolled down the hill the continued exclamations of the driver, "Pas danger! pas danger!" still reached her ears.

Murray Bay consists of a number of boarding houses, ranged for about a mile around the cove or bay; is backed by high hills, but hardly a mountainous country. And excepting for the scenery of the Saguenay is a more interesting place than Tadoussac for a sojourner. The place is popular for citizens of the upper cities, and for a few from the States.

We reached Quebec about 6 o'clock this morning; and after breakfast at our quarters, took passage with a good-natured and communicative Englishman for the points of interest in, on top, and around the city.

Quebec is a city that cannot be hid, and our driver commenced showing it to us by taking us to the celebrated Citadel, on the crown of the hill on which the city is built, where the prospects to be had are of more interest than the fortification; the views from the parapets, of the city and harbor below, and the hills beyond, being very fine.

The Governor makes the citadel his residence when in Quebec, and we had the pleasure of seeing him, as with some companions of note, a captain and two titled women, he was just entering his carriage for the steamer "Parisian" which lay in the river below us—steam all up and everything ship-shape and clean, ready to sail for the Governor-General's and all Colonials' "Home."

Visitors to the fortification are escorted around by a guard, who is careful to watch his charge. A youth who came in with us, getting a few yards from us, was admonished to keep in company. Sketching by stragglers being forbidden as a military precaution, probably a few lines of this letter, if attempted while resting at the ramparts, would have been enquired into; but we cared nothing for the fort, and were more interested in a docile little buffalo brought from Manitoba by returning troops, which was the pet of the garrison.

As the schoolboy reads, the city of Quebec was once contained within massive walls, but has long since outgrown them, so that there is more city outside the walls than within them. Some pride is taken in keeping the walls in repair, and the old gateways, with their narrow portals, have within a few years been replaced by handsome structures spanning the whole roadway, but they are not so antique-looking as the former ones, and have no gates.

A magnificent Terrace or Plateau, walled and railed and planked below the Citadel, accessible from the upper parts of the city from the street, and reached by an inclined railway from the lower, is a favorite resort for the breezes of the St. Lawrence and the fine views commanded.

A laborer in Quebec earns from 90 cents to $1.00 per day; pays rent $3.00 per month by two families taking a house at $6.00; buys birch wood at $2.50 per cord, and $4.00 for maple; pays a water tax of $1.50 and a personal tax of the same; and goes lumbering in the woods in winter. They are pretty comfortable in fair times, but business is now depressed in the Dominion, the commerce of the port has fallen off, and there is a moving away of the stevedore class particularly, taking place.

Our hackman was desirous for annexation, because he thought it would improve the business of hack driving and make matters more lively; but a manufacturer, though believing it would be beneficial in general, thought it would ruin Canadian manufacturers, as the States with their facilities for producing goods, would fill up the Dominion in a month. There are more people in the world than the man in public office of whom it was said, that he could not consider a public question without reference to how it would affect himself.

The winters of Quebec, I think we were informed, are of seven months' duration, and the snows become very deep. The statutes require the snow to be carted off the principal streets, so that not over one foot shall remain; but on the back streets, where this is not required, the streets become impassable for vehicles, the depth being five or six feet, and when the footwalks are thrown out, they are ten feet deep in the roadway, making a wall of snow along the curbs in some places higher than the first stories of the houses. Dangerous floods might be expected in such places, but we are told the melting is from the warming up of the ground, which receives the water for the most part.

The country roads, where the beaten trackway is narrow and like a canal, are dangerous travelling; a horse getting off the solid parts being liable to be lost in the soft snow at the side, requiring great care in passing.

Through with the city with its lions and hilly streets, our drive was next to the plains of Abraham and its monument, and thence to the Falls of Montmorenci, 7 miles down the St. Lawrence.

The stone roads of this part of Canada are made from limestone covered with river sand, forming an excellent roadway, very smooth for a turnpike, quite superior to the stone roads near Philadelphia, unless it be the Telford roads of late years—and much freer from dust than they are. What surprised me most, was that the stone was not broken particularly small, but there appeared an adaptability in the limestone and the sand cohering or running together, so to speak, neither breaking up nor grinding to powder.

The roadway was lined with continuous villages, with their steeple-houses at convenient distances, all of the same denomination, the Roman Catholic, which gives the appearance of unity of faith; but, "if the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness."

It is sad to contemplate whole communities like these who are taught to depend largely on outward ceremonies and on a human priesthood, and to rely on the efficacy of an earthly potentate in spiritual matters, instead of being turned to that Inward Teacher, nigh in the heart, "the Light of Christ." But there is consolation in the knowledge that it shines in all, whether they know what it is or not; and whether they cooperate with it according to their measure or resist; but what shall be said of the darkness of those, even in this our day, who with better teachings, and more enlightened associations, deny the very existence of this principle of which the Scriptures testify. "Pardon, respected sir," wrote Francis La Combe to Bishop D. Aranthon, so long as two centuries ago, "the feelings of a poor religious, who thinks he has known something of the inward life, if he drops a tear of regret at the desolation he witnesses. Sad and terrible will be the account which must at last be rendered for the opposition to a cause for which Christ shed his blood. Of what value is the church, and of what value are labors for the church, without the inward life, without the religion of the heart."

Our drive was in hours at which but few of the people were on the road or to be seen about their houses, which we much regretted, as one object of interest in travelling is to see the inhabitants of the land.

Persons better informed tell us that the country is thickly settled for a few miles back from the river, but the interior very sparsely; that the people are rather ignorant, and so kept by their religious teachers, and though they seem a sturdy race, they are stunted and not healthy, which has been attributed to the want of ventilation in their houses. The climate being cold in winter, they keep warm rooms and close them tightly, and consequently breathe vitiated air much of the time; and it is possible the virulence of small pox in Montreal may be attributed to the want of care in change of air in apartments. It would seem as if there was room for hygienic teaching among the poor people of the Province, but the field of labor in this line need not be confined to Canada, for there are many places in the States where intelligence in general is not wanting, where the idea of constructing buildings and heating appliances, so as to control the temperatures of the respective rooms independently of each other, and without curtailing the supply of pure air, is deemed superfluous.

The Falls of Montmorenci are very fine; a small river plunges over a precipice 254 feet to the bottom, and though on a minuter scale than the great cataract a few hundred miles west, is more easily comprehended by the mind. The river is utilized to some extent by carrying a portion of it in large pipes to some mills at a little distance, where it serves a practical turn at the wheels.

Approaching Quebec on our return, we were struck with the pretty effect of the noonday sun on the tin roofs of hundreds of houses ranging above each other on the hillside city, shining like the shimmering waves of a sunlit sea. At present Montreal and Quebec are using galvanized iron for roofs, and are painting their tin roofs more than formerly; but till within a few years, it was the universal custom to use tin for the purpose, and not to paint it. The bright tin will tarnish, but the process is slow, as the oldest roofs do not appear more rusty than would be the case near Philadelphia in a few months or weeks.

It is said the climate is dry, which is very plain, but why it should be so dry, probably few people know any more than they know why the tides of Quebec are two or three times as high as those of the Delaware. It cannot be for want of water surface, for besides the water expanse of the great river, the country on both sides of it is a great lake country, and though we do not remember seeing or hearing of fogs in Quebec and Montreal, we know that a very short distance below the former they are very prevalent, and the garrison at the Citadel complain of the severe north-east winds coming up from the gulf, which may be said to be the very father of fogs.

Though Quebec has had its labor troubles among its stevedores, which were probably the ill-advised outcome of sufferings which should have been ameliorated before producing contention, there is an air of being better governed and of more respect for laws and municipal regulations than prevails in American cities; and as this is apparently true of all the few places we have ever seen outside of our own country, the reflection is not entirely satisfactory as a matter of national pride. Certain it is, that unless a more righteous concern shall obtain in the United States to avoid making bad laws on the one hand, and to observe and enforce good ones on the other, the strides of the country to disorder, and all manner of iniquity, will continue to be very rapid, and at an increasing pace.

A ride in the afternoon gave us the country residences of the wealthy on the St. Foy road, and then we descended to the river road, preferring walking down the steepest part, because of greater safety than riding.

We saw the great lumber rafts and yards of Quebec; the cove where Wolfe is said to have landed when he crossed the river, and with his army scaled the cliffs, and flanked the fort and took the city; and pursuing our way through the poorer parts of the lower city, we climbed up the winding avenue to our quarters.

For "The Friend."

'The Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst, come; and whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely.'

On reading in the 51st number of "The Friend," dated Seventh Mo. 24th, a short article headed "Extracts from letters of our late friend Joseph Snowden," my heart was cheered and animated at the prophecy our departed friend had made, relative to the rising generation building up the walls; and, too, that in connection with it he had remembered the Scripture language, "I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy. And upon the servants and upon the hand-maids will I pour out of my Spirit saith the Lord." May this little article be the means of encouraging some to more dedicated faithfulness to their Lord and Master, in whatever He calls for.

Let them not hold back a part, or keep that which ought to be given as a sacrifice unto the Lord. He has been knocking long at the door of some of your hearts for an entrance, waiting to be gracious, and to teach and instruct you in the way that you should go, and thus to fit and prepare you for the different offices in the Church.

In reference to what our departed friend speaks of, alluding to building up the walls, I have remembered how it was with Nehemiah in his day, when he felt the need there was of faithfulness; so much in earnest was he, that his countenance betrayed him, inasmuch that the king said to him, "Why is thy countenance sad, seeing thou art not sick?" Nehemiah ii. 2. Then may some of us be more and more in earnest, and see what we are about, and on whose side we are; whether we are living too much at ease, not willing to take up the cross and despise the shame. To those who abide under the Lord's preparing hand, in time He will make known what He would have them to do. "But who shall abide the day of his coming, or who shall stand when He appeareth, for He is like a refiner's fire and like fuller's soap. And He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver, and shall purely the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness." Let none be discouraged because of the refining process, for the Good Master will not put more on any than He will give strength to bear. But it is his will that his children should be brought out as it were, from the things of this world, and be purified and fitted for his use; and so be changed from a state of nature to a state of grace. Therefore I would say again, let none be discouraged because of the way, but rather rejoice to be counted worthy to suffer for His name's sake, willing to own the dear Master in whatever way He calls for,—in appearance, words or action,—and then, if such as these will not forsake Him, He will not forsake them, but will inwardly support and strengthen in every time of need. Our Saviour himself testified, "him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out." What encouragement! The invitation is to every one the world over, no matter what his or her condition in life may be; the way is free to all, for he that will come may come, and take of the water of life freely. But the Master will not force any into his measure, but leaves us to choose our own way. Then let some of us choose more and more the Lord for our portion, and the God of Jacob for the lot of our inheritance; and be jealous of our God, the true and living God, and not make gods of any of our possessions, our persons or any thing that we have; for our God, He is God and He will not give his glory to another, and He has the right to rule and reign in our hearts, for we are created for purposes of his own glory.

And the words seem to arise, "Take off thy ornaments that I may know what to do with thee," and submit thy neck to His yoke, then mayest thou be enabled to say, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" and if so, by being attentive to the still small voice, it will be shown thee what to do; and by keeping close to this Guide, He will from time to time instruct and teach of his ways. And thus, by being faithful, there may be a looking forward to one here and another there, being fitted and prepared for the Master's use. The Lord will have a people formed for himself, and his testimonies cannot fail to the ground. E. C. C.

While order is of almost inestimable value, it is quite possible to slip almost insensibly into the habit of leaning on technicality to escape responsibility.

Indiana Reform School for Boys.

Having occasion to visit Plainfield in an astronomical capacity, I took advantage of seeing the State Reform School for Boys. Very soon after entering the institution it occurred to me that the school ought to be better known than I think it is. It is located about half a mile southwest of Plainfield, Hendricks County, Ind. The farm contains 225 acres in a high state of cultivation; and seems well adapted for such an establishment. The approaches are somewhat hilly and romantic. A number of fine springs supply an abundance of excellent water. About thirty elegant buildings, all brick but one, the ice-house, have been erected to accommodate the inmates and officers.

The institution was opened in First Month, 1868; 2,236 boys having been admitted since then. The average number last year was 421, without much variation through the year. The boys are divided into twelve companies, called families; each family being taught and controlled by an officer designated by the homely appellation of House Father. Boys are taken to stay till they are 21 unless reformed sooner. When they seem fairly reformed they may go home on Ticket of Leave. If they do well may stay, if not, go back.

Hundreds of boys who have been released hold honorable positions in society; demonstrating the success of the School and its management.

When boys enter the School they are taught the necessity of obedience and strictly required to observe it. Much care is taken to assign to each boy the kind of work he is best calculated to do. He is taught to be prompt in business; is not allowed to use tobacco, nor indulge in improper language of any kind. If one commits an offence he is talked to and shown the evil of it. This mode of punishment is generally sufficient. But if it fails other means are used. Strict order and a high degree of neatness are special elements throughout the institution. Great care is used to make every thing as pleasant as possible for the boys, and thus secure mutual affection. It is then much easier to govern. An extensive gymnasium is elegantly arranged for exercises during inclement weather.

A First-Day School—using the International Lesson—is held in the afternoon. Each boy learns and repeats the Golden Text; and is required to be familiar with the general meaning of the lesson. Each day before breakfast every House Father reads a portion of Scripture to his family. Only one institution of the kind in the United States is larger—that at Lancaster, Ohio. A number of teams are employed in hauling various material; and are driven and managed by some of the more trusty boys. Indeed, there are few kinds of work which these young folks do not perform. They make all their own shoes, coats, pants, &c., and they are kept well clothed. Last year they made 900,000 bricks; more than half of which, they used in making the finest barn in the state of Indiana.

The garden of 35 acres was efficiently managed by Warren Lawrence with his 40 boys. They seemed cheerfully employed in the expert use of rakes, hoes, wheelbarrows, &c. Weeds were very scarce. A few items of produce are: 12,000 cabbages, 3,500 dozen roasting ears of corn, 200 bushels of beans, near 300 bu. beets, 60 bu. peas, 360 bu. tomatoes, 270 bu. sweet potatoes, 250 bu. turnips, &c. Two bushels of peas, and the same measure of beets, or 30 dozen cucumbers, occasionally form part of a dinner's nutriment.

Two barrels of flour are worked into 400 loaves of bread every day. The First-Day evening lunch for each boy is one-third of a pie and a piece of ginger bread. The milk-room has flour and troughs of stone. Tin pans are used. A fine spring supplies cold water continually. A dozen boys with 24 buckets carried out 48 gallons of milk for dinner. At 11 o'clock the boys are all drawn up in line, about 500 feet long, for dinner parade, in charge of Dr. Givan, assistant superintendent. At the sound of drums they march a few rods to a certain place in the "court," from which every family divides off to its respective place of washing, &c. The wash-room has a trough, or sink, extending along the walls, and about a foot above it, a tube an inch or so in diameter is perforated with holes 2 feet apart. The boys are placed opposite these, then the tube is filled with water affording a stream for each boy to wash—using his own soap, towel, comb and glass. All meet in the great dining hall in perfect order, seated at long tables, and get still for a moment, then repeat a blessing of two or three sentences in beautiful concert. The officers and visitors now retire to a separate building, and all are refreshed with plain and excellent food.

A large three-story house, called the Main Building, is the officers' home. The south side is covered with luxuriant Virginia Creeper. From the top of the tower, 75 feet high, we had a fine bird's-eye view of the farm, Plainfield and surrounding country. Immediately west is the grand Court, with its elegant walks and shade trees. The Chapel is a little farther west. Beyond this, and north-west, the orchard resembles a small forest. The brick-yard is south-west; gas-house south-east. White Lick river meanders along the eastern side of the farm. A few rods north of the main building is a lake or reservoir 300 feet long, 100 feet wide and 10 feet deep. It is well stocked with fish which are readily enticed to the surface with bread, grasshoppers, &c. The water is supplied by springs; and having an outlet is always fresh. In winter great quantities of ice are gathered from this lake and stored in a fine ice-house near the west end. An extensive play-ground is north of the lake. The Chapel is an elegant building, 75 feet by 50. Visible truss-work supports the roof; no ceiling. John G. Blake is chaplain. The boys love him—"think the world of him." All meet here for worship. If a boy goes to sleep, or misbehaves in any way his number is written on the black-board, and he must stand up at his seat until the number is erased, or he is otherwise ordered to sit down. School is vacated, and farming and various trades, &c., taught, during the crop season. Only one-half of each day is occupied in regular school work during school season—the other half-day being employed at work, or exercise of some kind. This system is thought to be better for the boys than to spend all day in the school-room.

An ample dormitory contains 41 beds, one of which is occupied by a watch-boy, or reporter of what may be out of order. The boys' day-clothing is all taken and stored in a separate room. The windows are covered with strong wire netting to prevent escape or entry. The room is kept warm all night in cold weather.

W. DAWSON.

We owe much, very much, to those restraints and hinderings of every sort, in our home life, in our social life, in our occupation, in our limitation of opportunities, in our fear of immediate consequences of wrong-doing, that hold us back from the first steps ruinward—which we have it in our heart to take.

EVENING TIME.

BY HENRY BURTON, M.A.

The sun has set; his train of gold
Drops down the western sky;
A purple veil is on the world,
Stilling the curlew's cry.

The bat, like some old verger, stays
To lock the temple door;
Flapping about in crooked ways,
Glad that the day is o'er.

The busy clang, the noise, the whir,
Die in a silence deep;
A hush is on the oak and fir,
The poplars are asleep.

Like monks, within the chancel dim,
The hooded shadows pass,
To sing a silent vesper hymn
Or say a silent mass.

And Venus swings her burning lamp,
And signals on to Mars,
Till the deep sky is one vast camp
Of red or golden stars.

* * * * *
I near the western bound of life;
Fast drops the setting sun;
Behind me lie the toils and strife,
My task is all but done.

My locks are white with almond bloom,
Sweet prophecy of spring;
My winter's past, beyond the tomb
The Easter angels sing.

These wrinkles on my face and hands—
It always seems to me—
Are the wave-ripples on the sands
Telling of "no more sea."

A hush is over mind and heart;
The calm one's spirit feels
Who turns aside from street or mart,
And by God's altar kneels.

Life's day is gone; the evening star
Is glowing in the sky;
And heaven is near that seemed afar,
So bright it is, so nigh!

The shadows gather; I am old,
My day dissolves in night;
But lo! the sky is streaked with gold,
At evening-time 'tis light.

LITTLE BY LITTLE.

BY SUSAN COOLIDGE.

First the acorn, then the shoot,
Then the sapling with fine root
Which a baby's hand may pull;
See it stretch to seek and cull
All it needs of help and food,
All its hunger craves as good.

This way, that way, night and morn,
Go the little fibres forth,
East and west and north and south
Run they, gathering, as they go,
From the earth and sky and air;
While the trunk and branches grow,
Ring on ring, and day by day,
Taller, greener, and more fair,—
Slow, but ceaseless; in this way
Is the mighty oak-tree born.

First the baby, feeble thing,
Needing constant ministering;
Such a tender germ, and small,
If it is to live at all.
Then, as ardent youth awakes,
Reaching out, it seeks and takes—
This way, that way, night and morn—
From the earth and sea and air
All it craveth everywhere.
Be it poison, be it food,
All it longs to know and see,
All to try, or bad or good;
All the various tests of Fate,
Still dissatisfied to be Barred by any hindering gate,
Till the full-grown man is born.

Never oak but had its birth
In some acorn dropped to earth;
Never man but grew by these Imperceptible degrees.
Every hour of every day,
As it hurries on its way,—
This way, that way, morn and night,—
Every moment of each hour
Has its power to raise and lift,
Or its little hindering power.
Nothing idly passes by,
Naught too small to give its gift;
Bind their wings, then, as they fly,—
Till they bless thee, hold them tight.

Tobacco and Refinement.

BY PRESIDENT JOHN BASCOM, LL.D.

Many sages in various forms of philosophy, many saints in diverse phases of faith, have insisted on the conflict between lower and higher impulses in man, between the flesh and the spirit. The trio of evil influences in Christianity is still the world, the flesh, and the Devil. Certainly the use of tobacco belongs on the wrong side of this enduring struggle into which we all enter singly and collectively. It belongs to the flesh, and snacks, at times, of both the other two. This habit gains ground at the expense of emotional refinement and spiritual force.

It is difficult to understand how a refined man can accept the fellowship of a habit which adds so distinct an element of disgust and offence along the entire line of misery and vice. It is difficult to understand how a good man can be willing to endure this affiliation of sensuous and pernicious appetites; and how a clean man can be willing to unite himself to that great army of expectorants who defile the world in so many ways and places. No matter how carefully the process of refinement proceeds, it still leaves some traces of a disagreeable and truly vulgar kinship. Smoking is the least offensive use of tobacco; but one cannot smoke, and frequent the society of those who do not smoke, without bearing in his clothes the stale odor of his disagreeable habit. Much worse than this, he breathes it out in every expiration. The sweet air of heaven is turned by him each instant into a malodorous savor of an offering on the altar of appetite. He himself, in losing the purity of a pure breath, loses the sense of wrong he is doing his own life and the lives of others; yet he brings that sense fresh to every one who, with quicker sensibilities, approaches him.

This loss of the feeling of offence in an offensive appetite marks an important point in which the habit interferes with refinement and true courtesy. The smoker takes it patiently when a superior power sorts him out and hems him in, in a place set apart to this disagreeable indulgence as a smoking-car—bearing what traces of its low uses! But when he is left to himself, on the street, in a public place, in legislative halls, he assumes at once the precedence of his unkindly habit, and lets his neighbor make what shift he can to avoid the air which he sends forth from the recesses of his mouth, laden with disturbance to eyes, nostrils, and lungs. There is scarcely a smoker to be found that does not, at some time, in a careless way, put upon others the discomfort of his habit. How can it be otherwise? He is driven by an exacting demand, whose disagreeable effects are very much hidden from him. The smoker loses the power to see himself as others see him. If those who use tobacco were decidedly in the minority, the habit would be thought to be a strange, outlandish, outrageous perversion of the decorum of life; and in its open indulgence, a surprising trespass on good taste and delicate consideration. I think we shall see this to be so if we consider the effect the habit of chewing, or smoking even, would have on our estimate of a refined woman. The union is almost an impossibility. Yet there is nothing but the nature of the habit that renders the use of tobacco unfit in a woman. It is a superior purity and refinement only that banish it from such a presence.—S. S. Times.

For "The Friend."

With a feeling of that love which extends over land and sea, my thoughts reach to all who are mourning for the desolation and departures in our once highly favored Society. To these my heart goes forth in tender love, that would gather all into unity, into the bond of peace, the Truth, the Life. Let us mind that which keeps us humble and low, in a waiting, teachable state; and not be frightened at the word, "Wilburite," which some in these Western States are trying to fasten upon all who steadily adhere to the doctrines and practices of Friends. O! let us be willing to suffer like reproach to that which was abundantly heaped upon our forefathers in the Truth: knowing and believing that, if we steadfastly maintain our integrity and a willing obedience to the guiding grace in our own hearts, our reward is sure; for we shall feel the Lord's preserving care to be over us; and this will redound to our Creator's praise on earth; and, through his mercy, to our exceeding happiness hereafter.

This is written in that love which would gather into oneness, and restore the weak.

A Brave Boy's Deed.

The Story of How a Telegraph Lad's Good Aim Saved a Train.

A few weeks ago there passed away an old man of three-score or more, who had led a quiet and apparently uneventful life. From a little before his middle age he had been a follower of railroad work, and for years before his death a locomotive engineer. Some fifteen years ago an occurrence took place in his life that may have changed its whole current.

One stormy, snowy night in December a freight train accident occurred through the breaking of a car axle. The scene of the accident was on a portion of the road very crooked. The wreckers had been called out, and with them the young telegraph boy, whose duty it was to climb a telegraph-pole, making the necessary attachments with wires, clamps etc., and to assist in the working of other trains past the obstruction. This boy was entrusted with the important task of opening and operating an additional office. Sitting on an impromptu chair, built of fence-rails and stones, at the foot of the telegraph-pole, his duty was to stop all trains coming toward the obstruction and hold them until one of the tracks had been cleared. It was on a Saturday night, and but few trains—save the regular night express—were running. Clothed with unusual responsibility the lad sat through a terrible blinding snow and sleet storm, hour after hour, no shelter and no company save the constant tick of the little instrument that held him in communication with the outer world.

One o'clock has come. The night express should be there. Orders have come from the wreck, "Hold the express at all hazards." A glance at the watch tells the boy that he must take his lamps and meet the express as far above as possible. There were no air-brakes in those days. A heavy, blinding, cheerless fog had settled down like a thick cover over the deep cut in the rocks. The snow from above was still coming down in sheets. Plowing his way through the wet snow over the uneven surface of rails and ties, went the boy in the direction of the expected express, whose faint rumble could first be felt, then faintly heard. Planting himself firmly between the rails, the boy stood, a lamp in each hand, waiting to swing at the first burst of the headlight through the fog. Nearer and closer came the heavy train. One second, two, three, and the headlight commences to lighten up the banks and rocks of the curve. The fog lifts, the light gleams on the wet, shining rails. Swing goes the red lamp as the blinding glare of the powerful headlight shoots into sight at the upper end of the curve. Faster swings the red light. No answering blast of the whistle. The red light is on a desperate, almost despairing swing. No answer yet. The boy leaps over the outer rail into the ditch alongside, poising himself as he jumps, and as the great glaring monster is upon him his right arm puts an almost superhuman force into the last swing, the lamp leaves his hand and with a crash goes through the little glass door in the front of the engineer's cab, right into the face of our old friend the engineer.

The lad sunk back into the rocky fissures of the cut, the train rushes by him harmlessly, but with a terrible shriek of the whistle. The old chain-brake snaps like an overstrained muscle and away rushes the express past that clicking instrument, on, on, into the darkness, out of hearing and beyond recall. Slowly and wearily the boy plods his way over the ties to his post at the instrument, pondering over his unheeded efforts and the result. "Hold the express at all hazards!"—and where was that express? There, with his trembling fingers upon the key of the instrument, he sat trying to tell his superior officer at the wreck that his efforts to hold the express had failed. This he did without telling of the fate of that red light. Voices are presently heard through the darkness, and ere long the swaying of several lighted lanterns are to be seen as they come from the direction of the lost train. A few seconds later the eager, peering faces of the train men appear, and the boy recognizes the familiar faces of the conductor and brakeman of the express. The train had stopped, but only a few yards away from the wreck, and the men had come back to pick up the operator, whom they supposed was mangled and dead in the curve above. The engineer, they say, had been badly hurt by some of the broken brake-chain. The boy is grateful and happy because it is no worse. In a minute or so the engineer—our old friend—makes his appearance. Face covered with blood, which he had vainly tried to wipe away with bunches of greasy waste, a long cut just under the roots of his hair, told where he had been hurt. Throwing his arms around the brave boy's neck he whispered through his sobs of joy as the tears trickled down his blood-covered cheeks:

"I was asleep and you risked your life to save us all. Thank God, you threw it straight and true. I will be a different man from to-night."

'Twas so. The true tale has never before been told. That engineer's life was thenceforth a true, honest and sober one. The chain served as a pretext for the wound, and the fireman, who was nodding on his box, too, never knew the true history. Death long ago came to him in the discharge of his duty. And now that the shades of death have closed over our old friend, peace to his memory.

His occasional meetings with his operator friend were always gentle, kind and full of affection, and no mention was ever made of the attempt to "hold the express at all hazards."—Philadelphia Times.

"A Genius for Helping Folks."—"There is a man," said his neighbor, speaking of a village carpenter, "who has done more good, I really believe, in this community, than any other person who ever lived in it. He cannot talk very well in prayer-meeting, and he doesn't often try. He isn't worth two thousand dollars, and it's very little that he can put down on subscription papers for any other object. But a new family never moves into the village that he does not find them out, to give them a neighborly welcome, and offer any little service he can render. He is usually on the lookout to give strangers a seat in his pew at church. He is always ready to watch with a sick neighbor, and look after his affairs for him; and I've sometimes thought he and his wife kept house-plants in winter just for the sake of being able to send little bouquets to invalids. He finds time for a pleasant word for every child he meets, and you'll always see them climbing into his one-horse wagon when he has no other load. He really seems to have a genius for helping folks in all sorts of common ways, and it does me good every day just to meet him on the streets."—Christian Observer.

Men pay their tribute to virtue by their careful evasion of the plain facts about their personal vices. Many a man who does not scruple at doing a wrong, will resent the suggestion that he has done that wrong under its ordinary name. A man will feel justified, for example, in saying that which is not true about a matter that he is deeply interested in concealing; but he will not admit that he is "a liar." No, indeed! Even if he takes money from his employers who have trusted him, he is not ready to say squarely that he is "a thief." Far from that! Even if he were to kill a man in a duel, when he had tried to do it, he would not think it fair to call him "a murderer." Of course not! Indeed, there are very few persons who are willing to have their particular transgression called by its appropriate designation.—S. S. Times.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Somnambulism.—A writer in the Christian Advocate says, that the cure for this affection lies in the mental control of the patient over himself. "Descending from a long line of somnambulists," he has had experiences as well as unusual opportunities for observation. During the waking hours of the patient he must be thoroughly impressed with a sense of the danger. Among other illustrations, he mentions the following:

"Another case is that of a lovely lady—wife of one of the most successful ministers of the Missouri Conference. This lady, always an invalid, was an incorrigible sleep-walker, often covering distances and performing feats of which she was utterly incapable in her waking hours. For years she was obliged to sleep under guard or else with doors and windows securely fastened. She could never be trusted with her children or with younger persons. Her husband, who was always her devoted nurse, took upon himself the duty of caring for their little ones at night. When one of them was six weeks old he, one night, handed it to its mother to be nursed. Both parents, being greatly fatigued from loss of rest, fell asleep, when suddenly the mother started up and threw the infant from her to the middle of the floor, where it lay an unconscious heap. The father sprang to his feet exclaiming: "O, mother, you have killed our babe, you have killed our babe!" The mother's anguish was indescribable, but the shock was a complete cure. That infant is now ten years old, and the mother has never since made an involuntary movement in her sleep. She recently repeated the instance to the writer."

The Lick Telescope.—The object glass of the Lick telescope is now substantially finished, and the few astronomers who as yet have had the privilege of looking through it speak of it in the highest terms. The figure and color correction appear to be excellent, and it has of course an enormous superiority in light over everything preceding. The views it gives in dark nights of the brighter clusters and nebulae are simply magnificent, and the defining power is such that it easily splits the most difficult double stars, like γ Coronae for instance. The Clarks have, however, just met a serious check in the matter of the "photographic corrector," which they were preparing in order to fit the instrument for astronomical photography. The disk burst into three pieces on the grinding tool, and they will have to await the casting of another. The loss falls on the maker of the glass—Feil, of Paris. When the disk was first received, the tests by polarized light showed that the glass was suffering severe internal strains, probably due to imperfect annealing; and the Clarks notified the maker that they feared it would not bear working; he, however, thought it would, and told them to go ahead at his risk, which they did, with the result stated above. The erection of the instrument will not be delayed by the accident.—The Independent.

Sumac for Tanning.—Experiment has proven the value of our principal American varieties of sumac for tanning purposes, although the preference is usually given to the foreign product. The varieties most commonly employed in this country are: Rhus typhina, staghorn sumac, growing ten to thirty feet high; Rhus glabra, smooth or white sumac, growing two to twelve feet high; Rhus copallina, dwarf or black sumac, growing one to seven feet high, and a fragrant sumac, a dwarf sort often confounded with the copallina.

Sumac grows spontaneously in such large quantity in various sections of the country, on poor, rough, and abandoned lands and hillsides, that it has never been subjected to cultivation, though there appears no reason why the hardy sorts may not be cultivated. Of the varieties mentioned by Dr. McMurtrie in a report on sumac, made under the auspices of the Department of Agriculture at Washington, the Rhus glabra, or smooth sumac, was mentioned as the most valuable for tanning purposes, though the dwarf sorts are also employed.

In this country where sumac is prepared for the dyer and tanner, the leaves are collected and cured by country people, and sold and delivered to the owners of mills for grinding. This is done more extensively in Virginia than elsewhere.

Dealers in the raw material urge collectors of the leaves to observe the following rules: The leaf should be taken when in full sap, before it has turned red and begun to wither or has been affected by frost, to insure a maximum value for tanning purposes. Either the leaf-bearing stems may be stripped off, or the entire stalk may be cut away and the leaves upon it allowed to wither before being carried to the drying-shed; but care must be observed that these are neither scorched nor bleached by the sun. When wilted, they are conveyed to a covered place and spread upon open shelving or racks to dry.—N. Y. World.

Intelligence of Insects.—Charles Mackay, in a pleasantly written article in The Independent, mentions that when ascending Ben Lomond in Scotland, with two companions, they came upon a very large ant-hill, composed of twigs, leaves of the pine and similar materials. One of the party having lighted a cigar, carelessly threw the burning match on the hill, to the imminent danger of setting it on fire.

"In less than half a minute scores and hundreds of ants rushed upon the blazing beam—for such it must have appeared in their eyes—and, exerting their strength simultaneously upon it, endeavored to thrust it from their city. Many of them were burned to death in the gallant endeavor; but the survivors, nothing daunted, pressed forward over their dead or writhing bodies, as if conscious that there was no safety for those who still lived as long as the awful combustible was permitted to blaze and crackle in the midst of them. I was apprehensive that the whole mound, built as it was of dry twigs, would take fire; but the mists had lain upon the mountain and the valley, the air was moist, and the flame of the match burnt upward. Onward rushed the resolute firemen, score upon score, hundred upon hundred, till at last they rolled the match over and over and out of their precincts, charred and blackened and incapable of further mischief. We all more or less, mistrusted our eyes; and the youngest, most thoughtless, and therefore the most cruel, of our company, suggested that, if there were intelligence and design on the part of the ants in acting as we supposed they had done, there would be no harm in making a second experiment. No sooner said than done. Another match was ignited and thrown upon the heap, and again, precisely as on the first occasion, the ants rushed pell-mell upon the blazing intruder, to prevent a conflagration, which, had it taken firm hold, it would have been impossible for them to extinguish. Again some of the foremost champions of the public safety lost their limbs, and many more of them their lives; and again, by the mere force and pressure of numbers acting with a common purpose, the match was extruded before much harm had been done. I opposed myself to a third renewal of the experiment, and succeeded in persuading my companions, although not without difficulty, that enough had been done for curiosity and natural history; that the truly merciful man was as merciful to the smallest as to the largest of God's creatures: and that we had no right, in the mere wantonness of scientific observation, to take away the life which it was impossible for us to bestow.

The Eruption at Krakatoa.—Verbeck, who was deputed by the Dutch Indian Government to report on the volcanic outbreak in the Sunda Straits in 1883, estimates the amount of ejected matter to have been at least ten cubic miles. The velocity of ejection was greater than that of the heaviest ordnance, and the ejected material reached a height of thirty miles. A great atmospheric wave, starting from Krakatoa as a centre spread itself round the world, describing the whole circumference in about thirty-six hours.

—Progress of the Southern Colored People.—A copy of The Southern Letter, a small sheet issued at Tuskegee, Ala., gives some interesting information respecting the Normal School for Colored Students located there, which publishes it. Tuition at the school is free, and board, including every thing, $8 per month, payable partly in labor. The present attendance is 200. The corner-stone has been laid for an additional building, designed as a dormitory for the young men. The boys are now making the brick to be used in this, and it is expected that they will saw the lumber from timber on the farm and do the carpenter work.

When the school closed for its vacation, one of the students, a member of the Senior class for next term, owed the school about $15. He tried to obtain a summer school, but failed in this, owing to the lateness of the season. He did not, however, stand about doing nothing, but hired himself to a farmer at 50 cents a day, and has paid his debt.

Another young man, the paper states, "After walking from his home, a distance of thirty miles, arrived at the school a few days ago with five live chickens. He said that he wanted to enter the school, and wanted us to take the chickens as part payment of his board. The boarding department accepted the chickens, and the young man is now working in the day and attending night school in order to earn money with which to enter the regular day classes. This is the kind of young men that we like to encourage. They will make their mark."

It mentions also, on the authority of the Charleston News and Courier, that there are 1057 colored depositors in the Savings Banks of that city, and the total amount of their deposits is $125,000.

These are encouraging statements; yet there is a drawback in the report of one of their teachers, who has been making a two months' tour through five counties of Alabama, and who says: "Taking the people as a whole, I think that they are not doing nearly so well as they should be doing; in fact, I find thousands who seem to be making little, if any, progress at all. The system of farming under which the Negro has been working and is working, will not allow him to improve financially. The country Negro is industrious, but he has no executive ability, which leaves him a prey to the merchant who feeds him while his crop is growing. The average renter works on for years without accumulating anything, simply making a bare living. But in spite of the backwardness of the mass of our people, I find many who are doing well. I know more than a hundred colored men who own from 40 to 600 acres of land, and their farms are well stocked with cattle and mules."

—Papal Representative at Court of China.—The determination of the Vatican to appoint a representative at Peking is said to be disliked by the French Government which has heretofore regarded the Catholics in France as under its protection, and issued passports for those who desired to travel in that country. The London Times thinks the impulse for this movement came from the Chinese Government, which regarded the French protectorate as a possible source of trouble. "It gave a foreign government, with which China had been, all but in name, at war, almost limitless rights of interfering; and it made the Chinese authorities appear to disadvantage in the eyes of their subjects."

—Western Unitarian Conference.—The action of this body, which practically repudiated almost all connection with Christianity, does not appear to be approved by their brethren elsewhere, if we may judge from the action of the Board of Directors of the American Unitarian Association, which has resolved, "That we reassert our firm adherence to the objects for which the association was founded—namely, 'to diffuse the knowledge and promote the interests of pure Christianity,' and would regard it as a subversion of the purpose for which its funds have been contributed, as well as of the principles cherished by its officers, to give assistance to any church or organization which does not rest emphatically on the Christian basis."

—Temperance Legislation.—General Fisk, in thanking a senator for assistance in passing certain Indian legislation, excluding liquor from all Indian reservations, asked him if he didn't think he ought, for the sake of consistency, if for no other reason, to favor the exclusion of liquor from the territories as well. As it is, said the General, you exclude liquor from the reservations because it promotes Christian civilization instead of barbarism, and you allow it in the territories though it promotes barbarism, instead of Christian civilization.

—Saloon Influence.—It keeps workmen poor. It keeps our politics corrupt. It stifles progress, fosters pauperism, brutalizes husbands and fathers, breaks women's hearts, puts rags on the workman's back, disease in his body, and shame and despair in his heart. Yet, when labor is most disturbed, when the demand for advanced wages is loudest, when strikes are most frequent, when hunger and misery are most rife in the homes of the poor, the saloon flourishes still. There may be no bread at home, but there is always beer and whisky at the bar, and the men who consider themselves the victims of circumstances or the "thralls" of capital, squander their earnings and spend their savings in these dens.—Christian Advocate.

—The Newspapers.—The head-lines of our news sheets are a slander upon the civilization of our times. They systematically divert attention from that which is "pure, lovely, and of good report," by emblazoning the crimes that disgrace our humanity, and ignoring or hiding in a corner the grandest events of our time.—Selected.

—Agricultural Fairs.—A writer in The Christian Advocate complains of the changes which have taken place in these institutions, which have a demoralizing effect—such as the introduction of trotting and racing, as well as gambling, liquor selling, and vulgar side-shows. He thinks it the duty of farmers to withhold their encouragement from societies which make fast horses a prominent feature at their fairs.

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 25, 1886.

The holding of one of our country Quarterly Meetings, is often a very interesting occasion, not only from the mingling in religious exercise, and partaking together of that measure of spiritual refreshment which it may please the common Father of all true Christians to bestow, but also from the opportunity it gives of social intercourse, and the brightening of the chain of friendship.

Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting was held at Medford on the 15th and 16th of Ninth Month. In the public meeting for worship preceding the transaction of the business, the conversation between our Saviour and his disciples was brought to our notice, when the blessed Master put the query, "Whom say ye that I am?" and Peter responded, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God?" "Blessed art thou, Simon Bar Jona, for flesh and blood hath not revealed this unto thee; but my Father who is in Heaven." It remains to be true to this day, that all real knowledge of Christ and of religion must come from the immediate openings and revelations of the Almighty by his Spirit. This is the only source of that living knowledge to which our Saviour referred when He said, "This is life eternal, to know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." The Apostle queried, "What man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him?" and added, "even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God."

From this fundamental principle of the Gospel, it follows that all those who would partake of the redemption which is through Christ, and experience salvation, must diligently heed and obey the teachings of his Light in their hearts—even that blessed Spirit, the Comforter, which our Saviour promised to send, and which should lead into all truth. One of its promised missions was, to reprove the world for sin; and one of the first steps in the way of salvation is to listen to these reproofs, and then in humble obedience to follow the Heavenly Guide, which will lead out of all that is evil, and into the practice of that self-denial and bearing the daily cross, which our Saviour enjoined upon his disciples, and which remains to be the only way to the Kingdom of Heaven.

We were reminded that the first record of the ministry of our Saviour was in the language, "Repent ye, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand." "Repentance towards God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ, was the message of the Apostles, which Paul reminded the elders of Ephesus that he had testified both to the Jews and the Greeks.

In this meeting there was a harmonious exercise among those who took part in the public labor; and the solemn covering which was spread over those assembled may be regarded as an evidence that there were many present who in silence partook of the religious concern which others vocally expressed.

Such seasons of Divine favor are blessings which ought to be highly prized. They are calculated to encourage the burthen-bearers, as well as to stir up those less advanced in religious experience, to watchfulness and faithfulness. As one friend remarked in substance, after the meeting had concluded, we need not care in what estimation our Society was held by others, or what charges of lifelessness and formality might be brought against us, so long as the Head of the Church was pleased to favor us with such seasons of his life-giving presence.

In the meeting for business, when the answers to the Queries were read, it was reported that there were a few cases of sleeping in meetings. This called forth from a friend the relation of a dream which conveyed a lesson of instruction. The dreamer was one who had fallen asleep in a meeting, and in that state thought he saw an angelic form enter the house with a basket on his arm, from which he bestowed presents on those who were assembled. As he passed among the benches, distributing his gifts, he came to the dreamer, and looking on him said, "he is asleep," and passed on without leaving any of his blessings with him. The sleeper awoke, and such was the impression made on his mind, that he never after gave way to this weakness.

The Binns' Yearly Meeting and the Ordinances. It is well known to many of the readers of "The Friend," that some of the ministers belonging to the Binns' Body in Ohio, advocate the use of Water Baptism; and that this departure from the testimonies of the Society of Friends has stirred up several of the meetings which were in correspondence with that body to declare their disunity with any attempt to introduce into the Society a return to this outward rite.

A year ago there was an earnest discussion on the subject at the time of the Binns' Yearly Meeting; and this was renewed at the recent meeting held at Damascus, Ohio.

Some of the Quarterly Meetings had forwarded a proposition that the Yearly Meeting should reaffirm the doctrines of Friends as to outward ordinances. When this was introduced into the Select Meeting it was opposed, on the ground that it would be "a dwarfing ecclesiasticism," and that every one should be left to his individual liberty in the case. As an evidence of how far some of their preachers have wandered from the principles of Friends, and of what little right they have to a place among the members of the Society, it may be mentioned that several of them manifested, during the discussion, that they had little or no respect for the writings of Early Friends; and one of them expressed his determination "to teach and use the outward ordinances."

Finally a proposition was put to vote and adopted by a large majority, reaffirming "faith in the truth of Holy Scripture concerning the baptism with the Holy Ghost as the only saving baptism;" but not bearing any testimony against the outward ordinance. It was sent to the general Yearly Meeting, where the objection was made that the real question at issue was evaded by this re-affirmation, and it was proposed to add to it the following amendment, "And that the outward forms of Baptism and the Supper are not a part of the Gospel, and should be neither taught nor practised by our members." This amendment was voted down, and the re-affirmation adopted as it came from the Select Meeting.

Our readers are aware, that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting never thought that the members of the Binns' Body had sufficient cause for withdrawing from the Yearly Meeting of Ohio and organizing an independent body; and that in consequence it testified against the act, declined to recognize the new meeting as a co-ordinate branch of our Society, and continued its official connection with the other body in Ohio. Yet this does not prevent us from feeling a degree of sympathy for those of its members who retain an attachment to the doctrines and testimonies of Friends; and who must feel it a grievous thing that its recognized ministers should travel about undermining its principles, and that the Yearly Meeting has neither the power nor the will to restrain them.

The rejection of the writings of the Early Friends, already mentioned as having been openly made by some of the ministers of the Binns' Meeting, we have no doubt will shock the feelings of many, who have often had their spirits tendered and instructed by their perusal; and who can testify that except the Holy Scriptures, no other writings have been more effective in stirring up the pure mind, and awakening desires to walk in the way of righteousness and self-denial; or have more clearly set forth the way of salvation through the indwelling and transforming power of the Spirit of Christ.

Moorestown, Old and New, is the title of a book which we have received from the author, James C. Purdy. It is a local history of that pleasant village, and a description of its present condition. The author has been industrious in collecting from available sources a large amount and variety of information. Much of this is interesting to residents in the neighborhood, and especially to members of our religious Society; for that section of country was originally settled in large measure by Friends, and they have always been among its influential citizens.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Treasury Department has issued a call for fifteen millions of the three per cent. bonds. This makes fifty-two millions of these bonds called for redemption since Seventh Mo. 1st.

Our Consul at Victoria, British Columbia, reports to the State Department that "merchandise in considerable quantities from San Francisco, destined for Chicago and New York, is being shipped over the Canadian Pacific Railway.

On the 16th instant, the first National Convention of the Anti-Saloon Republicans was held in Chicago. Two hundred and eighty-seven accredited delegates were present. Resolutions were adopted declaring the liquor traffic a fruitful source of corruption in politics and a school of crime; that "the National Government should absolutely prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia, and in all the Territories of the United States;" that "the best practical method of dealing with the traffic in the several States is to let the people decide whether it shall be prohibited by the submission of constitutional amendments, and until such amendments are adopted by the passage of local option laws." They oppose the third party movement, and call upon the Republican organization to adopt their sentiments of the subject of the liquor traffic.

From late Statistics, the following facts have been developed in relation to the Liquor Traffic in this country: There are in the United States about 250,000 licensed and unlicensed places where intoxicants are sold; of these some 150,000 are kept by Democrats, and nearly 100,000 by Republicans; 100,000 men, women and children die drunkards annually.

A train passed through Las Vegas, New Mexico, on the 15th instant, conveying 400 Chiricahua and Warm Spring Indians from their reservation in Arizona to Florida. It was known that they had been supplying Geronimo with ammunition when he was on the "war path," and "there was no telling what moment they might break out." Hence the decision to remove them to Florida.

A despatch from Eagle Pass, Texas, says that a valuable deposit of bituminous coal has been discovered at the depth of ninety feet on land recently bought by the Southern Pacific Company from General Naranjo, on the west side of the Sabinas River. The vein is six feet ten inches thick.

It is reported from the cane-growing parishes of Louisiana, that the yield of sugar will fall about 15 per cent. below that of last year.

According to a telegram from Charleston, received on the 20th instant, "detonations and tremors" continue at Summerville, but they are growing less forcible and frequent, and the people are getting used to them and hopeful that they will soon cease.

Severe wind storms occurred on the 16th instant, in the West and Northwest. In Terre Haute, many large buildings in the centre of the city were unroofed, and their interiors damaged by rain. The aggregate loss is estimated at $45,000. The damage along the Wabash Valley is reported at $90,000.

A Niagara Falls excursion train on the Nickel Plate Railroad, was run into by a freight train in a cut near Silver Creek, New York, on the morning of the 14th instant, and the smoking and baggage cars were telescoped. About 18 persons were killed and 13 injured, several dangerously, if not fatally.

The Brooklyn bridge receipts on the 13th instant, were $2795.82, the largest taken in on a single day since the structure was opened.

A bird's eye view from Trinity spire, New York, would disclose, it is said, 16,000 saloons in sight—12,000 in New York, and 4000 in Jersey City, Newark and Paterson.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 320, which was 41 less than during the previous week, and 41 less than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing 161 were males and 159 females: 35 died of consumption; 24 of diseases of the heart; 20 of marasmus; 20 of typhoid fever; 14 of cholera infantum; 11 of convulsions, and 10 of inflammation of the brain.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s registered, 111½; coupon, 111½; 4's, registered, 126¾; coupons, 127¾; 3's, 101; currency 6's, 126 a 136.

Cotton was quiet 9½ cts. for middling uplands. Feed.—Choice lots of bran were scarce and wanted, but medium grades were dull. Sales of 1 car good western winter bran at $14 per ton.

Petroleum was quiet at 6¼ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Flour and Meal.—Flour was very quiet. Springs were scarce and steady, but winters were abundant and weak. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania family, at $3.75; 250 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4.20; 250 barrels do. straight, at $4.50; 500 barrels winter patent, at $4.65 a $4.85; 125 barrels Minnesota clear, at $4, and 500 barrels do. patent, at $4.80 a $5. Rye flour was quiet but steady at $3.25 a $3.30 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was dull, No. 2 red closing at 83 cts. bid and 83½ cts. asked. Rye was quoted at 56 cts. per bushel for No. 2 Pennsylvania. Corn.—No. 2 mixed closed at 47 cts. bid and 47½ cts. asked. Oats were dull but steady, No. 2 white closing at 34½ cts. bid, and 34½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were ¼c. lower, at 3 a 5½ cts. Sheep were active at 2 a 4½ cts. Lambs were active 3 a 6½ cts.

Hogs were fair 6 a 7½ cts. The receipts were: Beeves, 3500; sheep, 14,000; hogs, 5700.

FOREIGN.—Lord Randolph Churchill, replying to the directors of the Scottish Protestant Alliance; who recently severely criticised his answer to their remonstrances against the appointment of Matthews, a Roman Catholic, to the Home Secretaryship, says he must decline to enter the field of polemical theology in regard to the position of Catholics in a Protestant State. He adds that, if the views of the Alliance were pushed to a logical conclusion, they would involve the repeal of all those acts of Parliament removing the political disabilities of Catholics and the re-enactment of penal laws, which a vast majority of the British people are anxious to forget.

United Ireland suggests that, in view of the probable rejection of C. S. Parnell's Land bill, all the distressed tenants in Ireland resort to the workhouse. "While it is disgraceful," says United Ireland, "to enter the workhouse as a loafer, it would be in the highest degree honorable to occupy the workhouse as an encampment against landlordism.

The Marquis of Londonderry, the new Viceroy of Ireland arrived at Kingston early on the morning of the 16th instant. The Marquis was accompanied by his wife, Lady Londonderry.

When the couple departed from the railway station they were greeted with cheers, followed by groans. On arriving in Dublin they proceeded to the Castle, where they were welcomed by a large crowd of loyalists, who cheered heartily. There was also a hostile crowd there, which did its best to offset the welcome by cheering lustily for Parnell and "United Ireland."

On the evening of the 20th instant, a revolution was attempted in the city of Madrid, by a number of Spanish troops quartered in that city. It was led by Brigadier General Villa Campa. It was ill-planned and practically amounted to little more than a mutiny.

Martial law was proclaimed throughout the city as soon as the condition of affairs was clearly perceived by the Government. The émeute was a complete surprise to Madrid. Quiet was soon restored after the revolutionists were driven from the Southern Railway. A number of the insurgents were taken prisoners.

The next morning there was no appearance of a revolution or even of disorder.

A despatch from Vienna to the Times says there are rumors in diplomatic circles at the Austrian capital that recent negotiations between the three Emperors have resulted favorably and that there are now good prospects for an agreement shortly between Russia, Germany and Austria relative to common action in Bulgaria. In regard to the immediate future, the despatch says it is stated that Russia has yielded her plan of proceeding alone in Bulgaria, and intends now to treat the whole question on the basis of the treaty of Berlin and submit it to the consideration of Europe.

In an interview with Prince Bismarck, De Giers, the Russian Foreign Minister, distinctly promised that Russia would not occupy Bulgaria.

The Sobranje, as the Bulgarian Parliament is called, has voted a grant of $500,000 to purchase all of Prince Alexander's property in Bulgaria, retaining from the whole sum $186,000 with which to liquidate the Prince's indebtedness to the national bank. It has also adopted an address to the Czar praying for his protection over the independence and liberty of Bulgaria.

Mail advices from China and Japan received in San Francisco report that the total number of cholera cases throughout Japan since its first appearance this year is, according to the Japan Gazette, 59,000, of which 37,000 resulted fatally. The indications are that the epidemic is now abating. Intelligence from Seoul, Corea, says cholera is still raging in that city. According to official returns the fatal cases for Sixth Mo. this year were 38,600, out of a population of 250,000. Outside of the capital the epidemic is equally fatal. At Shinshu, Province of Keishodo, 5,000, and at Torai 6,000 deaths are reported to have occurred in one month.

DIED, at her residence in Barnesville, Belmont Co., Ohio, Fourth Mo. 22d, 1886, ESTHER WILSON, aged 54 years, a member of Stillwater Monthly Meeting, and widow of William C. Wilson, of whose death an account was published in "The Friend" of Eighth Mo. 14th, 1880. Her illness, though lingering, she bore with patience and resignation. This dear Friend was left early in life with the care and responsibility of raising her family of children; and as the close drew near, she was enabled to commit them to the care of their heavenly Father, adding, I have had but little to say, feeling that a few words fitly spoken were better than many; have had much time to think when alone, yet not alone for I felt my Master was with me. The Lord is my Shepherd! I shall not want. She has left to her family and friends the consolation of believing that she was gathered home to the heavenly garner of rest and peace.

First Mo. 3rd, 1838. The third day of a new year. Being in the city, attended the week-day meeting at Orange St. It was a good meeting. When I am in a state to do so, there is nothing here below I enjoy more. Wm. Evans ministered in a very solemn and awakening manner, calling our attention to the shortness and uncertainty of life. He said, time is short and very uncertain, and pressed upon us the need of a preparation for our final change; believing there were those present who had no time to spare. Such had long been visited, long had the Son of man been knocking at the door of their hearts to find entrance. But there had been a strong resistance and unwillingness to let Him come in and reign there. This state was loudly called unto; also a state which in days past had known much of divine favor; but for want of keeping close to the dear Master, and following on to know his will, a state of great strippedness had been dispensed. He revived the language of the Most High through the mouth of one of his prophets formerly, "I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals when thou wentest after me in the wilderness, in a land that was not sown, Israel was holiness unto the Lord," &c., enlarging further in a very impressive manner.

4th. Attended the week-day meeting at Arch St. It was held in silence, except a few words from H. Smith to the school children;—good and adapted to their capacities.

18th. A silent meeting. These are acceptable to our Heavenly Father so far as we are found offering spiritual worship. What a favor when strengthened to abstract ourselves from the busy cares of the world, and draw nigh in spirit unto Him, and view ourselves as we really are, poor depending creatures! Greatly do I desire to be found coming unto Christ, and laying all down as at his footstool; being willing to be counted a fool for his sake.

28th. Think I never was more sensible than this morning, of the sinfulness of presenting ourselves before the Lord as worshippers of Him, when perhaps the heart is far very far from Him. E. Comfort appeared deeply exercised for a state or states present amongst us young people. He spoke of the circumstance of the little captive maid who was brought out of the land of Israel and was made instrumental in healing the king of his leprosy, "Would God my lord was with the prophet that is in Samaria! for he would recover him of his leprosy." Said he believed that He who led captivity captive was still able, and would lead some now present if they were only faithful; causing them to be instrumental in showing others the way they may come unto their dear Lord and be healed of their maladies. But the whole heart was required, a full surrender must be made. This he believed was called for from some of us; and under a sense of this requiring he knelt down, and in a very solemn and affecting manner interceded on behalf of these. It was a very solemn opportunity.

Second Mo. 8th. Attended our Quarterly Meeting, where we had the company of our friends Thomas Kite, Sarah Emlen, Elizabeth Pitfield and Hannah Rhoads. Their company and labors, even in silence, were very comforting and precious. After a considerable time of stillness Thomas arose with, "Whom say ye that I the Son of man am?" Opening and enlarging instructively. After which different states present were feelingly ministered unto, and the youth sweetly remembered. Dear E. Pitfield followed, saying: This prayer, breathed by our dear Lord, had dwelt much with her since we had been sitting together, "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them unto babes." Enlarging upon which, she said, that to the babes in Christ, these mysteries would be revealed—those who were willing to part with all, and for His sake become as little children, &c. A time of silence followed, when dear S. Emlen arose; who, had she known how it was with me, could not have ministered more exactly to my state. Said, Since we had been sitting together, she had been led into very near and tender feelings with the dear children; some of whom she believed the dear Master had been long calling unto, &c. Said she believed it to be the design of our Heavenly Father, that some now present should be made preachers of righteousness in their lives and conversation. Then, addressing an individual, continued thus: I believe it to be time for thee to give up; and oh! be willing to part with all, even though it be a right hand or a right eye; and be sure to "make all things after the pattern shown in the mount." Ah! these words came home to me—all things to be made after the pattern shown, &c. How long hath there been a pattern shown me! but how have I turned away and shrunk from it! persuading myself it could not be this simple attire that was required, &c. But my Heavenly Father hath been pleased to grant this one more evidence that these are things required, and, too, a sacrifice comparable to a right hand or right eye. Be pleased, therefore, O Heavenly Father! to give strength sufficient to carry me through. Let me not appear to be what I am not; but deepen me more and more in true vital religion: for thou alone knowest what a poor weak creature I am.

10th. An appointed meeting at Plymouth this afternoon for our friends E. Pitfield, and H.

Rhoads. Hannah was first engaged in testimony, from the Scripture: "And the Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth, say Come. And let him that is athirst, come: and whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely."

It was some time ere Elizabeth arose; when she did, it was with saying, that soon after taking her seat amongst us, this welcome salutation saluted her ear: "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." She believed this blessed invitation was in store for some then present; and went on showing the happy state of those who had faithfully followed their dear Master, and who were now enjoying a rich reward. Another state was closely spoken unto, from the belief there were those present who were persecuting their dear Master; and to whom the plaintive language of the Saviour was in measure applicable: "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" Said, What will it profit if the whole world is gained and the poor soul lost! adding, time is very short. O! how did she plead with some present to close in with the merciful visitation, while the day lasteth. Prayer followed, and the meeting closed under feelings of much solemnity.

Those dear friends lodged with us. What a privilege it is to care for such! I feel with and for them, according to my little measure, in their baptisms and "death's oft;" having day after day in thus visiting meetings, to sit where the people sit; making the labor often hard. In the morning ere they left, they had a precious little opportunity in our family; in which our dear mother was very sweetly and encouragingly spoken to.

Third Mo. 15th. Greatly depressed. The time has fully come that sacrifices, long called for, must be made. How is it that nature clings so close!

25th to 29th. Silent meetings: as also our nine last have been. May it have a tendency to draw us into a more close communion with Him who still remains able to feed all his hungering and thirsting children. "Blessed are those that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled."

Fourth Mo. 1st. A little taste of the excellency of silent worship was given this morning. The feeble petition was raised, strengthen, O dearest Father! to follow Thee wheresoever thou mayst be pleased to lead, even though it may be unto death. Sacrifices thou art calling for, enable me to give up cheerfully. And, if I am to stand as one alone among my youthful companions, be pleased to forsake me not.

22nd. Returned last evening from the city, where I have been during the past week attending the Yearly Meeting. It has been a season of peculiar trials. Little sacrifices have been made and not without suffering, I hope for the dear Master's sake. Was it not for the sweet peace wofulsafed, fear I should have given out, for I have been the gaze and wonder of many. But all this I feel willing to bear, if my Heavenly Father will only be with me, and give wisdom and understanding that I so walk as not to dishonor his precious cause. O I am poor and ignorant; and without the help of his Holy Spirit, not one right step can be taken.

A Trip to the Saguenay.

LETTER NO. 6.

Profile House, N. H., Eighth Mo. 10th, 1886.

The remainder of our journey being for the most part familiar travelling ground to many, these letters will conclude with the few items herein.

As travelling without shopping would not be complete, we spent a portion of the morning of the 6th and of the contents of our purses for this purpose, the wares of a photographer being the most favored merchandise; and about 2 o'clock we crossed the St. Lawrence to Levis to take the cars for the States.

While waiting at Levis, a steamboat of pilgrims from St. Anne's, several hundred in number, disembarked, mostly of the poorer classes, but well dressed, accompanied by a liberal percentage of priests in their black-silk hats and long black coats, reaching to their ancles, apparently rather warm for summer attire.

St. Anne's is an island down the river, containing a "steeple house," with a shrine at which a marvellous cure is said to have been effected, and it is the practice of the people to make what they call pilgrimages to this shrine.

Our route by the Quebec Central Railway, lay along the beautiful valley of the Chaudiere River, a broad, swift running, clear and sparkling river; and after this we came upon a lake country of placid waters, with mountainous woods-covered sides.

At Thetford mines we were in an asbestos mining settlement, a rich field for this curious and useful mineral. The seams are three to seven inches in thickness, and have been thrown up to nearly a perpendicular position, and being of fine quality, the first workings are quite profitable; but as the seam is worked deeper, many tons of adjacent rock have to be removed for one of asbestos obtained.

We were told of a man who had purchased a property from a Banking Institution which held it as a collateral, for which he paid $1500, and from which he mined $900 worth of asbestos the first day. Sixty per cent. of gross receipts for one day seemed a liberal return, and as I mused upon the way in which many mining and oil producing enterprises had been conducted in my own country, I could but reflect what an opening for an unscrupulous person such a purchase as this might be deemed. Instead of honestly working out the asbestos, and selling it in the market as long as the yield was profitable, our unscrupulous speculator would probably seek a few confederates who would cheerfully contribute the original $1500 paid, for the purpose of getting in on the "ground-floor," and then a company would be formed, and thousands of shares of handsomely engraved stock be printed, and very likely a liberal amount of bonds be floated for working capital; and with the rich yield of the first few workings, a heavy percentage of dividends be skillfully handed out to give the stock the appearance of great value, and so enable the scheming operators to sell it at greatly inflated figures, even if at the twentieth part of its nominal par, to unfortunate men and women whose necessities for increased income or lust for excessive interest overcame their discretion. What matter to the speculators if the asbestos soon ran out, or as the seam ran deeper the yield did not pay the salaries and office expenses of the company—the real end would be attained, stock selling rather than mining.

The scenery of the lakes and hills along the border line of Canada has not become much known to tourists, but will probably ere long be developed, and houses of entertainment be established; as fish are still in abundance among the waters, and the mountain air is no doubt invigorating.

At Black Lake the train halted at a place not noted on the time table for its stopping, and looking out, a solemn company was observed at the baggage-car: weeping women, and men whose countenances were very sad, for the remains of a youth were being placed upon the train, who a few days before had left his college and came to this place for his vacation, and met his death by one of the circular saws at a saw-mill on the lake.

It was a touching scene, heightened by the presence of the bereaved mother, who had been summoned by telegraph from her home in New York, and was now returning, not with her living son but with only his mortal remains; and, as at Sherbrooke the body rested on a truck while the train was changed, we saw this mourning woman leaning on an attendant keeping silent vigil at its feet, we could have wept with her in her desolation for we knew her sorrow was great, but it did not seem kind as strangers to break in upon her grief. As they on whom the tower of Siloam fell were not worse than all they who dwell in Jerusalem, it is presumptuous in any to suppose that their death may not come by violence; and none can tell whether on leaving their homes for travel, the daily avocation, the call of duty or even on missions of kindness, they shall return to them as they left; but they only are safe "over whom the second death hath no power."

We left the train at Newport, at the foot of Lake Memphremagog about midnight, and at noon of the succeeding day resumed our journey, and towards evening were ascending the valley of the Ammonoosuc, in full enjoyment of its splendid scenery, the high hills, and the famous peaks of the White Mountains.

As a perch for the night we selected the Summit House on Mount Washington, over 6,000 feet above the sea; and as we climbed with measured pace that mountain railway, and saw the landscape fade away behind us, and peak after peak descend in quiet subsidence beside us, we had, according to our measure, a little appreciation of the majestic grandeur of these mountains, and perhaps a passing thought upon the power of Him who formed them.

Twelve years ago I ascended this mountain, and being younger and more enthusiastic, made fuller notes than on this occasion; which, filling into over appreciative hands, were published in volume fifty of "The Friend," page 347.

Tuckerman's ravine, reached from the summit by a long and fatiguing walk, taken only by the most active, is noted for retaining the snows of winter till late in the summer, and the curious arch formed underneath by the stream in its bottom working beneath it. Two weeks before our arrival, a tragic occurrence had taken place at this ravine, the arch having fallen upon two who were in the snow cave, one of whom was smothered before being extricated.

We remained on the mountain till the morning of the 9th, enjoying the varying scenes which the changing mists afforded; and having clear weather for the most part, but missing the usual snow-squalls so novel and so refreshing here. Descending to the Fabian House, we took the inspiring and magnificent ride through the Crawford Notch to Bartlett's, and returning.

The road being built along the side of the notch, far above the trees of the valley, gives from the observation cars about the grandest views of the mountain ranges, of all the splendid prospects to be had in this vicinity, so replete as every valley is with scenery; and though it is hard to speak lightly of the Concord coaches of former days, with their dashing teams of six in hand, and the enjoyment which the much scrambled-for seats on the top of the coach afforded—it must yield to that of the ride on this wondrous rail on the mountain's side.

Reaching this extensive and expensive, but comfortable hostelry in the Franconia Notch, in the afternoon we paid our respects of admiration to the Old Man's Face, lest an overshadowing mist should conceal him if our visit was deferred; and this morning we took the delightful ride to the Flume, on the well-kept road in the easy-going mountain wagon with its team of four, which, with the lovely woods and the mountain ranges above, have charmed the visitors here for many a year.

The flume is a cut or narrow chasm in a mass of rock, as if a wide seam or stratum had been removed, and at the bottom of the gorge a mountain stream of pure water courses along, and spreads out over the broad rocks beyond the flume in a beautiful sheet. Our old geography books had a picture of this flume, with an immense stone in the upper part apparently immovably wedged in upon either side, some fifty feet, more or less, above the stream.

The position of this stone has probably puzzled many thousands of visitors with endeavors to explain how it got there. The most natural conclusion was that it had dropped there; but where it had dropped from was still more puzzling, and probably very few ever thought of its floating there; but as we now know that it floated out, we may safely presume that it floated in.

In 1883, a heavy rain produced a landslide above the flume, and the mingled mass of water and earth and stones rushing down, completely filled the flume, swept out the great stone like a chip on the water—the whole mass debouching below, covering several acres with gravel and general debris for twenty feet, more or less, solving the problem but spoiling the unique feature of the flume.

Stopping at the Pool and taking the scow-ride with the good-natured captain who has paddled it for five-and-thirty years, and calling at the pretty basin by the roadside on our return, and in the afternoon mounting the rocky summit of Bald Mountain for the view of the Ammonoosuc and the peaks overlooking it, we reach the conclusion of our brief narrative of the mountain portion of our journey.

The retrospect of our fortnight's vacation tour brings to view majestic rivers, mysterious springs, enchanting lakes, inspiring hills, stupendous mountains. We contemplate the processes of nature, as the fulfilment of the Creator's will, when through the ages of the past these mountain masses were forming by slow accretions as the beds of ancient seas, or deeper still were part and parcel of our molten inner globe, till, in their appointed time, their upheavals came, and we now see them in the mighty ridges of the Laurentian Range, or these towering peaks of New Hampshire and Vermont.

Great and marvellous are Thy works!—is the theme of the angelic host, and must be that of every one who considers the power of Him who has measured the waters, comprehended the dust of the earth, weighed the mountains and hills; and remembering that He also dwells with the contrite in heart, and furnished redemption for the penitent, there may be a realizing of the truth that "Eternity is too short a time to sound the praises of his wondrous love."

Oliver Sansom.

The experience of Oliver Sansom, and the trials he met with in bearing a faithful testimony against the anti-Christian system of tithes, is so instructive that it seems proper to revive them for the benefit of the readers of THE FRIEND.

He was a native of Berkshire, England, born in 1636, and brought up in a religious way by his parents, who were members of the Church of England; "so that," he says, "even in my childhood, and more in my youth, there was a fear in my heart of offending the Lord; and I was restrained from running into the follies and vanities which I observed many others delighted in; but I did not know then that power which restrained and preserved me, and which inclined my heart after the Lord."

"In the year 1657 I was invited to a meeting of the people called Quakers, whither I went, and there heard one of them declare the Truth. And he testified of and directed to that very thing which I so greatly wanted—the inward principle—the Light within shining in the heart, and discovering the darkness there; which, when I had heard, I came to be fully convinced and satisfied in myself that that was the Truth and the way of God, which was a matter of great joy and comfort to me."

Though the way of life had been thus shown to him, yet, through fear of offending his father, he says, "I submitted to go to the public worship again to hear the priests as before." The result of this want of faithfulness in his case was the same as it always has been and always will be—he went backward in a religious sense. But the gracious visitations of the Almighty were not withheld; and his righteous judgments pursued him in his wanderings. Having been visited with some sickness, which left him in a weak and miserable condition for many months, he says, "I cried unto the Lord beseeching Him to raise me up again, that I might praise his name and become as a monument of his mercy in my day and generation. And the Lord was pleased to hear my cry, and did grant my request, and restored me again to health, for which I gave hearty thanks unto Him, and praised his blessed name, and did often seek Him in secret; but through the workings of the enemy upon the weak part in me I could not as yet confess Him openly. Yet I abstained from my former vain courses and was much reformed in my conversation."

"While I thus walked, somewhat like Nicodemus, having a secret love and regard to the Lord in my heart, but not daring through weakness and fear to follow Him in an open profession of his Truth, I altered my condition in the world by marriage."

"Not long after I was married it so fell out, or was so ordered, that upon occasion of outward business which I was then in, I was much alone, my wife for the sake of convenience, and at her father's request, continuing to live with him; yet all in much love and with mutual satisfaction."

"That solitary season the Lord made precious to me and of great advantage; for I had a book which was written by Isaac Pennington, the title whereof was 'The way of Life and Death made manifest, and set before men,' &c. That book was of great service to me, the Lord at that time visiting me afresh and opening my heart and clearing my understanding, so that I plainly saw how I had been ensnared and prevailed upon by the enemy of my soul to fly the cross, which was to be taken up by all that would walk in the way of Life. And hereupon fervent desires were raised again in me and earnest cries were poured forth to the Lord, that He would be graciously pleased to pardon what had been amiss, and to forgive and pass by my great transgressions in having so long disobeyed Him; and in great humility and fear I promised that if He would be pleased to afford me the assistance of his Holy Spirit, I would henceforward give up and forsake all to follow Him."

"Now I had lingered so long that the times were grown more stormy and tempestuous than before, which made it seem more difficult and hazardous than it would have been had I been faithful and answered the requirements of the Lord when first He reached unto me. And now persecution coming fast on, many Friends being in prisons, and sufferings growing sharp and great in most places, I could no longer keep back or conceal myself; but a necessity came upon me to show myself, and take my part and lot with the sufferers that suffered for righteousness sake. Thus were the bonds and sufferings of faithful Friends made a means to confirm and embolden me to profess the Truth and right way of the Lord."

"Towards the latter end of the year 1663, I went with my wife to dwell at a place called Boxford, near Newbury, in Berkshire, where I had some estate in copyhold lands given me by my father. And I went diligently to Friends' meetings, but my wife continued for a time to go to the priest's worship. And I had earnest desires and breathings for my wife, that she might be gained and brought to the knowledge of the truth; in order whereunto I did not only myself walk in much love and tenderness towards her, but did often prevail with ministering Friends to lodge at my house, that she might have opportunity to observe their grave and weighty deportment and godly conversation, and to confer with them about the things of God. And the Lord was pleased to hear my prayers on her behalf, and to bless the endeavors which were used for her; so that after some time she came to be convinced also and publicly to own the truth, and deny the priest and his worship."

The priest of that parish was one James Anderton, who endeavored to persuade Oliver to leave the way into which he had now entered, and to return to the Church of England. But failing in his efforts, he became a bitter persecutor. His enmity was the more aroused because Oliver had become fully satisfied that both his ministry and maintenance were wrong, and had told him that he could no longer pay him tithes or wages for conscience sake. He charged the priest not to meddle with any of the increase that God gave him, for if he did, he should look upon it as stealing. But the priest not only endeavored to collect his tithes by taking his proportion of the hay, grain, and other produce of the land, but manifested his ill-will by stirring up the neighboring Justices of the Peace to tender him the oath of allegiance, and to fine him for not attending at the Parish place of worship, and otherwise to annoy this righteous man, and deprive him of his property and liberty. Meeting Oliver in the street, he called him a heretic because he could not own the letter of the Scriptures to be the only rule of faith and life, neither could own his sacraments, as he called them. Before this, Oliver had written some queries, the tendency of which was to show "that the saints of old, before the Holy Scriptures were written, had, and all men since, even where the Scriptures have not yet come, have a sufficient rule to guide them in their respective duties both to God and man; and that that rule was the Divine Light, shining in their own hearts and consciences." So excited did he become, that he said, "if the law of the nation did command it, he would be one of the first that should set a fagot to a heretic's tail." Although, for want of power, he could not go to fire and fagot, yet, as often as he had power, he ceased not continually to pursue and do what mischief he could to his neighbor.

Westtown.

Shall we proceed at once to build the girls' wing?—this, by a recent decision of the Committee must depend on our obtaining the requisite means.

I feel that the readers of "The Friend," many of whom are shareholders in this important undertaking, interested alike in its completion and successful working, should know just what their servants, the Committee, propose.

There will remain an unexpended balance applicable to the new wing of about $15,000. The Committee upon a careful review of the whole subject, and with the experience they have already obtained as to cost &c., have concluded that it would be entirely safe to proceed with the erection of the west or girls' wing, thus completing the original design, upon the receipt of $40,000 additional subscriptions. This amount will not complete the structure, but it is thought that with this in hand it would be entirely prudent to go forward with the work.

In asking for further help from those who have already contributed so liberally, and in appealing again to those who have not yet responded, the Committee are solicitous not to go beyond the proper feeling that each must be his own judge of pecuniary ability, as also of the objects upon which he should bestow his means.

There are, however, many considerations which appeal strongly to all who want to subservise the important interests ever held dear by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. That the old school building had served out its purpose, and must yield its place to the new, was a conclusion deliberately and patiently arrived at. The work of replacement was begun and has been carried forward in much unity of purpose and of feeling: the ultimate object of it all has been kept steadily in view; and to-day, a retrospect of the work done, and the urgent need that remains for the better accommodation of the girls, give the committee great hope that when our patrons acquaint themselves with the facts as they are, there will be a commendable willingness to continue their liberality, and a fresh stirring in the minds of others to communicate to the necessities of a work which I hesitate not to say is promotive of the best welfare of the youth of our Society, and designed to perpetuate to future generations the benefits of an education in accordance with the principles of Friends.

The opportunities for such an education are becoming fewer annually—the lax discipline of college life is creeping gradually into nearly all high grade schools—"The idolatry of culture" is fastening itself more and more on succeeding generations—habits of life are fostered quite at variance with the example and benign precepts of the Saviour, and erroneous notions of character, of the true objects of life, and of the place and way for obtaining peace and happiness, are early stamped upon the youthful mind.

To avoid all this as far as possible, in order to the more ready entrance of the good word of life, remains to be a living concern with Philadelphia Yearly Meeting; and "the religious guarded education" of the youth of the society in all parts, is to-day with them an object of primary importance, and for which cause I trust it will be found they are willing to endure sacrifice.

We miss from among the list of our contributors, the names of some of our wealthiest members, whose liberality cannot be questioned, but whose interest in Westtown is not. If these would inquire into the objects sought after, near and ultimate; would inspect for themselves on the ground, what has been done, and what remains yet to do; would weigh well the differences in discipline prevailing at different schools; I think they might warm a little towards an institution their fathers reared with a given purpose, and which has been nursed from that day to the present in a remarkable degree of preservation from un-Friendly encroachments.

As ideas continue to recede from the position heretofore occupied by consistent Friends, Westtown must lose in popularity when she avoids music, theological teaching, ministerial training, exciting revival methods; when she maintains a discipline more rigid than others, and enforces simplicity in dress and a scriptural language among her pupils. If those who possess wealth wish to secure to themselves and their posterity blessing therein and not curses therein, they will be found co-operating with all and with every thing that withstands the seen and unseen encroachments of the world's mind. The ladder of fame reacheth not to heaven.

Hoping to encourage some to go out and see for themselves, I would remind them that a cordial welcome and ample opportunity to inspect, will at all times, except on First-day, be accorded them.

SAMUEL EMLÉN.

Rochester.

For "The Friend."

Rochester is on the Genesee River—and seven miles above Lake Ontario. The falls of the Genesee are beautiful, and there are three of them, the upper, middle and lower. The town is very beautiful, being embowered in trees and mostly refreshed by the west wind. The breeze from this direction blows over Lake Ontario, and reaches Rochester laden with moisture and coolness. The town took its name from Nathaniel Rochester, an English gentleman from Baltimore. He settled there with a colony of English people in 1812.

Being on the Genesee River, the water facilities and other advantages have made it a prosperous town. The stores are good, and the streets are clean and well paved. The water supply is brought from Hemlock Lake to a reservoir on the top of a hill, and in the midst of the basin a fountain is playing from morning to night. The water is pure, soft, and very abundant.

The Upper Falls are quite picturesque, and the river there is wide. On the middle falls are situated the factories; and the breweries for which Rochester is famous.

The Lower Falls empty into the river from a height of 100 feet, and the banks are covered with the greenest verdure. The rocks on either hand show the same formation as Niagara, with the addition of red sandstone. The action of water is plainly seen, and the river has cut its way back for a quarter of a mile.

The "City of Rochester" plies up and down the river, and smaller craft laden with pleasure-seekers leave the boat-landing at intervals of half an hour. The two objective points are Charlotte and Sea Breeze. Charlotte is on the Genesee River, where it empties into Lake Ontario. Sea Breeze is several miles distant.

It was moonlight when we returned from a second visit to the Lake, and as we neared the landing, the moon shone down over the forest-clad banks, and the little boats with lanterns in their prows, passed ours, with merry parties on board, who were going out to spend the evening on the water.

Our dwelling, pro tempore, was on Monroe Avenue, and the walks and rides on every side were varied and interesting. The people were sociable.

IN SICKNESS.

BY SUSAN COOLIDGE.

When the world is dark and sad,
And I do not care to play,
And the happy times I had
Seem to melt and fade away,
And the merry sounds without,
Where the other children are,
Every laugh and call and shout.
Falls as with a heavy jar
On my hot head and hot cheek,
And I frightened am, and weak,—

Then the only thing that is Comforting and cool and bright,
Is to lie and think of this,
As my mother said I might,—
That, when children keep their beds,
Sick and sorrowful and drear,
With sick hearts and aching heads,
Then it is that God draws near;
Then it is He comes and stays
All the weary nights and days.

Friends and nurses may forget,
(So she says,) or fall asleep,
But the great Lord never yet
Failed his loving watch to keep.
Close He holds my little hands,
Though I do not see Him there;
Close beside my bed He stands
Listening to my every prayer.
All the night-time dark and long
God is there, so kind and strong.

All my pains and aches He knows,
Every time I fret or cry,—
For the Lord's eyes never close;
Now He helps me silently,
Whispers thoughts to make me brave,
Soothes my terrors with a touch,
Tells me He is strong to save,
And He loves me—oh, so much!
And I think, since this is true,
I should patient be; do not you?

THE CHRYSANTHEMUM.

Welcome in our leafless bower,
Where December's breath has come;
Welcome, golden-anthered flower,
Ever fair Chrysanthemum!
Like an old friend's pleasant face,
Though the earth is void of grace,
And the very birds are dumb—
Cheerful, gay Chrysanthemum.

Thus may I have round me when Age's frost my heart shall numb,
Friends as warm and constant then
As thou art, Chrysanthemum!
May I find, though youth be past,
Hearts that love me to the last—
Eyes that smile, though winter come,
Bright as thine, Chrysanthemum.

ONE AT A TIME.

One step at a time and that well placed,
We reach the grandest height;
One stroke at a time, earth's hidden stores
Will slowly come to light;
One seed at a time, and the forest grows;
One drop at a time, and the river flows
Into the boundless sea.

One word at a time, and the greatest book
Is written and is read;
One stone at a time, and a palace rears
Aloft its stately head;
One blow at a time, and the tree's cleft through,
And a city will stand where the forest grew
A few short years ago.

One foe at a time, and he subdued,
And the conflict will be won;
One grain at a time, and the sand of life
Will slowly all be run;
One minute, another, the hours fly;
One day at a time, and our lives speed by Into eternity!

One grain of knowledge, and that well stored,
Another and more on them,
And as time rolls on your mind will shine
With many a garnered gem
Of thought and wisdom. And time will tell,
"One thing at a time, and that done well!"
Is wisdom's proven rule.

—Golden Days.

The Prisoner of Glatz.

Dr. W. F. Besser, pastor of Waldenburg, in Upper Silesia, in his Practical Commentaries, relates the following incident, which is undoubtedly authentic, as it occurred not far from the place where he resides.

In a cleft of a mountain range in Upper Silesia, through which the wild and raging Neisse forces its passage down to the Oder, stands the impregnable Prussian fortress of Glatz, a natural fastness, almost unequalled in the world, begirt with mountain-peaks like walls, and fortified yet more by human skill. The valley itself is shut out from the rest of the world; and one who is enclosed by the massive walls and gratings of the castle is an exile from the world, as if buried alive. Woe to the man imprisoned in Glatz! Everything calls out to him, "No hope remains for thee! no hope!"

Here, in the second decade of this century, lay the Count of M—, hitherto petted and followed; now hopelessly immured behind bolts and bars. By treason against the realm, and especially by personal violence offered to Frederick William III, of Prussia, he had drawn down the rage of that monarch on his head, and was condemned to solitary imprisonment for life. For a whole year he lay in his frightful, lonely cell, without one star of hope in either his outer or inner sky; for he was a sceptic. They had left him only one book—a Bible; and this for a long time he would not read; or if forced to take it up to kill time and relieve his consuming weariness, it was only read with anger, and gnashing of teeth against the God it reveals.

But sore affliction, that dreadful and yet blessed agent of God, which has brought the Good Shepherd many a wandering sheep, was effectual with the Count M—. The more he read his Bible, the more he felt the pressure of the gentle hand of God, on his forlorn, hopeless heart.

One rough and stormy November night, when the mountain gales howled around the fortress, the rain fell in torrents, and the swollen and foaming Neisse rushed roaring down the valley, the count lay sleepless on his cot. The tempest in his breast was as fearful as that without. His whole past life rose before him; he was convinced of his manifold shortcomings and sins; he felt that the source of all his misery lay in his forsaking God. For the first time in his life his heart was soft, and his eyes wet with tears of genuine repentance. He rises from his cot, opens his Bible, and his eyes fall on Psalm L: 15, "Call upon Me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee; and thou shalt glorify Me." This word reaches the depths of his soul; he falls on his knees for the first time since he was a child, and cries to God for mercy; and that gracious and compassionate God, who turns not away from the first movement of faith towards him, heard the cry of this sufferer in the storm-beaten dungeon of Glatz, and gave him not only spiritual but temporal deliverance.

The same night, in his castle at Berlin, King Frederic William III. lay sleepless in bed. Severe bodily pains tormented him, and in his utter exhaustion he begged of God to grant him a single hour of refreshing sleep. The favor was granted; and when he woke again he said to his wife, the gracious Louise, "God has looked upon me very graciously, and I may well be thankful to Him. Who in my kingdom has wronged me most? I will forgive him."

"The Count of M——," replied Louise, "who is imprisoned at Glatz."

"You are right," said the sick king; "let him be pardoned."

Day had not dawned over Berlin ere a courier was despatched to Silesia, bearing to the prisoner in Glatz pardon and release. The prayer of penitential faith had been heard, and deliverance was granted by the providence of God.

And the God of our fathers still lives; he hears the cry of His children, and many times He answers even before we rightly call upon Him. Now, as in ages past, the Lord looks down from heaven to behold the sighing of the prisoner, and to loose his bonds; and still, as of old, the king's heart is in the hands of the Lord, and He turneth it, as the conduits of water are turned. Let us make Him our refuge, and confide in His power with an abiding and unshaken trust.—From "A Guiding Providence," by H. L. Hastings.

Speak Pleasantly.—The habit of speaking in pleasant tones to the sensitive hearts within our care is of the utmost importance. If we would have them learn to speak gently and kindly to all, we must teach by precept and example in their early years, while their minds are so elastic as to be led to pattern after the influence which surround them.

I will relate a little incident of my own experience. I was unusually busy one morning, preparing for company to dinner.

My little son of four years was amusing himself with his playthings about the room.

He, too, seemed hard at work building bridges, block-houses and churches. He was continually coming to me, asking questions and requiring assistance. After a little time I noticed he had left his play, and was back against the wall under the table, sobbing as though his heart would break.

I said "Georgie, dear, what is the matter?" No reply.

When I repeated the question, the answer came between broken sobs, "You didn't speak kind to me."

"Well," said I, "don't cry; come and tell me about it."

So he came to me; I took him upon my lap and asked him to tell me just what I had said. Years have passed since then, and I have forgotten all but the impression it made. A few pleasant words, the tears kissed away, and he was comforted and happy, and soon at play again; but I had learned a lesson never to be forgotten.

He is now grown up, and I would no more think of speaking unpleasantly or unkindly than I would to company who might be visiting me. On the other hand, a rude, selfish, or unkind word never passes his lips.

For "The Friend."

When I look over the Society of Friends, whose name bespeaks goodwill, friendliness, and unity of feeling, I see in the different Yearly Meetings the disunity and divisions throughout the length and breadth of our once highly favored Society. Some are seeking to find an easier way than the way of the cross, and more in accord with other societies and with the world. Some have gone so far as to deny in their preaching that the light of Christ shines in the heart of the sinner until he is converted and changed, thereby denying the Lord that bought them by denying the gift He purchased for every man. And some have gone into other doctrines and practices entirely inconsistent with those ever upheld by Friends. A few, on the other hand, have run into a heated zeal which has consumed their patience, so they felt prepared to withdraw even from Friends who have faithfully withstood the innovations; and too many have become ready to bite and devour each other.

O Friends! is not this nature too prevalent among us? Are we not apt to let that unruly member lead us into words which, if we loved our neighbor as ourselves, we should not speak? If we knew our friends better, we might often find them as earnestly concerned to know and to live in the truth as we are. Then let us take Jesus for our example, who, when he was reviled, reviled not again. He overcame by love. O friends, let us try and see what love will do for us to restore and heal this disturbed feeling with those who are one in doctrine, and let us become more like sheep, who enjoy having companions, and flock together in quiet goodwill, paying attention to the Shepherd when he calls. Let us get more into that love which can forgive trespasses, and draws together: which says, come with us, brother, come, sister, for truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with His Son, and we will do thee good; come, let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, and He will teach us of His ways, and we will walk in His paths. Jesus said, "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another, by this shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye have love one unto another."

Finally, brethren, farewell! Be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace, and the God of love and peace shall be with you.

ROBERT KNOWLES.

Iowa, Ninth Month 14th, 1886.

Robert Southey, the poet, once wrote to a friend: "I have told you of the Spaniard who always put on his spectacles when he was about to eat cherries, that they might look bigger and more tempting. In like manner I make the most of my enjoyments; and though I do not cast my cares away, I pack them in as little compass as I can, and carry them as conveniently as I can for myself, and never let them annoy others." There are Christians who seem to follow exactly the opposite plan—put on their spectacles when they look at their troubles, to make the troubles look bigger, and pack their enjoyments away in as small a compass as possible.—Selected.

Poison Generated in Fermented Milk.—Dr. Vaughn of the University of Michigan has detected in fermented milk the presence of a very poisonous alkaloid which he had previously found in certain specimens of cheese. He obtained crystals of the same substance from a sample of ice-cream which had caused violent sickness in those partaking of it. The formation of this poisonous alkaloid, through some organic change in milk and its products, is supposed to be the explanation of the numerous cases of poisoning which have occurred during the present season from partaking of ice-cream.

Humble-bees in New Zealand.—At a recent meeting of the Entomological Society of London, it was stated that success had crowned the efforts which had been made to introduce and naturalize in New Zealand the humble-bee; for want of whose aid in fertilizing the flowers, the clover in that country had before failed to perfect its seed.

Astronomical Notes.—The great glass for the large telescope of the Lick Observatory is about completed, and is pronounced by several competent examiners excellent in material and figure. It is 36 inches in diameter, and is the largest object glass in the world. The four surfaces of the two lenses of such a glass have to be so accurately ground that all parallel rays striking it are brought to the same point at the focus, and so adjusted to each other that the separation of light into colors by one lens is, as near as may be, counteracted by the other. This requires great skill and patience, a combination of qualities probably not possessed by a score of men in the world. It is, therefore, no slight addition to the already well established credit of Alvan Clark's Sons, of Cambridge, Mass., that a successful result has been reached. The problems almost equally difficult, but of a different order, attending the mounting of the telescope and the manufacture of the dome are in the hands of Warner & Swasey, of Cleveland, and it is expected that the telescope will be in place early in the season of 1887. It is to be placed on the summit of Mount Hamilton, California, where a large equipment of instruments is already accumulated.

As to the possibilities of such an instrument in such a situation much can be expected. A large telescope has two advantages over a small one. The first is, that it gathers more light; hence the Lick glass will undoubtedly bring into view many stars and nebulae, and details of nebulae never before seen. The second is, that it allows greater magnification. There is a provisional understanding among astronomers that the highest power capable of being used on a telescope will not exceed 100 for each inch of aperture; that is, a good telescope of eight inches will bear, under the best possible circumstances, a magnifying power of 800; one of 12 inches, of 1200, and so on. Applying the same rule to this glass it would magnify an object 3600 times. This would enable the moon to appear as if it were only about 70 miles distant and were seen with the naked eye, a view which would bring into sight objects no larger than many of our buildings. The atmospheric disturbances would modify this very seriously at our altitude, but these are supposed to be reduced to a minimum on the choice site on Mount Hamilton.

The moon from its nearness has always been a favorite object of telescopic study. Its mountains are readily visible with the lowest power, and the configurations of its surface. Its plains and mountains (not land and water, for water does not exist,) have been repeatedly mapped. The largest of these maps, 72 inches in diameter and drawn to scale, was made by Dr. Schmidt, of Athens, and recently published at the expense of the Prussian Government. The mountains are often craters, consisting of a ring, with small peaks in the centre. There are also streaks over its surface about 2 miles wide and sometimes 150 long, which are probably cracks caused by the moon's cooling filled up with some lighter colored substance, or they may be old watercourses. There have been many announced changes on the moon's surface, but it is not certain that they are anything else than changes of shadows caused by the relative positions of sun and moon. It is not proved that the moon is anything but a cold and dead mass of rocks.—I. S. in Public Ledger.

The production of Joint-diseases in Children.—The causes of joint-diseases in childhood are frequently obscure, but this much is certain, that the rough handling which children receive at the hands of ignorant parents or careless nurses has much to do with the matter. Stand on any street corner and notice how children are handled. Here comes a lady with a three-year old girl; she is walking twice as fast as she should, and the child is over-exerting itself to keep pace; every time the child lags the mother gives it a sudden and unexpected lurch which is enough to throw its shoulder out, to say nothing of bruising the delicate structures of the joints. A gutter is reached; instead of giving the little toddler time to get over in its own way or properly lifting it, the mother raises it from the ground by one hand, its whole weight depending from one upper extremity, and with a swing which twists the child's body as far around as the joints will permit, it is landed, after a course of four or five feet through the air, on the other side.

Here is a girl twelve years old with a baby of a year in her arms. The babe sits on the girl's arm without support to its back. This would be a hard enough position to maintain were the girl standing still, but she is walking rapidly and the little one has to gather the entire strength of its muscular system to adapt itself to its changing base of support, to say nothing of adjusting its little body to sudden leaps and darts on the part of its wayward nurse.

Musk-rat Houses.—Besides the extensive burrows in which, during the greater part of the year, the musk-rats live, they often erect in autumn quite elaborate structures in swampy ground, or occasionally in shallow and quiet waters, where they can find safe anchorage, as for instance to a stump. These winter-houses, as they are usually called, are conical in shape, and generally about three feet in diameter at the base and two or three feet in height. The materials used in their construction are long, coarse grass, bullrushes, twigs, and some of the larger limbs of shrubs. I have never discovered any evidence that, beaver-like, they gnaw off saplings of water-birch for the purpose of using them in house-building, but that they do so, at times, has been asserted by many. The materials gathered are closely cemented with stiff, clayey mud, which the musk-rats procure from the beds of streams, often burrowing beneath the sandy superstratum to secure it of the proper consistency. When sun-dried, these structures are very strong and will bear the weight of a full-grown man. The walls are generally about six inches in thickness, and are very difficult to pull to pieces. The interior consists of a single circular chamber, with a floor that is ingeniously supported on coarse sticks driven into the mud, after the manner of piles, and among them are laid horizontally many others, thus making a strong but open foundation, upon which are placed small twigs, stiff mud, and over all a layer of soft grasses. This interior is arranged after the dome is completed. In the centre of the floor is an opening, leading by several paths, below the water-level, and extending to the nearest higher or comparatively drier ground. Through these the musk-rats make their escape, if the home be disturbed. While the exterior of these structures is quite irregular and apparently rudely or carelessly put together, it is evident that this exterior is designedly arranged in this manner to make the home appear like a stranded bunch of trash, transported thither during some sudden rise or overflow of the stream. The interior, however, of these structures is usually neatly furnished and smoothed, and with its lining of soft materials, the entire structure bears no little resemblance to an enormous bird's nest turned upside down.—C. C. Abbott's Rambles about Home.

Earthquake at Cimarron, Colorado.—About the last of the Seventh Month, an earthquake occurred in the Mountains between the branches of the Cimarron River, whose effects are described by the Montrose Messenger:

"The disruption covers a space of a mile in width by two-and-a-half or three miles in length. Great fissures rent the rocks extending hundreds of feet into the bowels of the earth. In the place of a deep gulch wherein a lake formerly rested was a great mound 175 to 200 feet high with the lake's basin on top of it, tipped to the southwest at an angle of 45 degrees, as dry as a bone. Trees in the thickest groves were tangled and interlocked, but not upturned. In other places they had disappeared from sight. Rocks appeared on the surface, that had never before seen the light of day, and others had sunk to oblivion.

The first man who visited the spot found twenty-five or thirty head of cattle near the middle of the eruption, and they stood trembling in every limb. They could not be driven, coaxed or scared from the place. Great fissures surrounded them on all sides.

He went after assistance and soon arrived with several other cattlemen, who filled up some of the smaller cracks, cut trails and felled trees for the cattle to walk over and then tried to drive them out. They would not move, and they only succeeded in driving them by leading the horses before the cattle, over the improvised trail. When the cattle were once again on solid land they were glad enough to go.

In one place the rocks had been split and one side of the chasm left by the earthquake seemed to have settled, while the other arose and finally the action was reversed and the lower side shot up fully 100 feet higher than it had been before. This was indicated by the erosion on the rocks, the limbs cut from the trees on the high side, and other conclusive evidences of the heaving and settling process that must have taken place."

Meteor seen in New Hampshire.—On the eighth page of "The Friend" of Ninth Mo. 18th there is printed an account of a remarkable meteor which was observed near Akron, Ohio. One of probably a similar character was observed by the writer of this, on the evening of the 6th inst., as he stood near the large, spreading pine—the "wood giant" of Whittier's later verse—which is a little south of and overlooks, Lake Assniam, New Hampshire. The brilliant, aerial visitant started apparently near the bright star Arcturus, in the constellation Boötes, in the north-west, and, moving in a considerable curve toward the south-west, passed through about one-fifth the circuit of the heavens. It burst into a number of luminous fragments, but no report was heard. The time was about twenty minutes past eight; the moon shined brightly. A person sitting in the lighted parlor of the boarding-house a furlong away, observed the bright light from the meteor pass swiftly over the carpet. J. W. L.

—Indian School at Tunasassa.—At a meeting of the Indian Committee held Ninth Mo. 14th, it was stated that the new school building, to take the place of that destroyed by fire last winter, was rapidly approaching completion. The plastering had been completed, and part of the painting and most of the wood-work. It was expected that arrangements would be made to open the school at the usual time, about the first of Eleventh Month.

The abundant apple crop of last year had rendered cider very plentiful in western New York; and the facility with which it could be obtained had been a disadvantage to some of the Indians, one of whom had recently been killed on the railroad while intoxicated.

A letter had been received by one of the Committee from the President of the Seneca nation, expressing uneasiness with the practice of leasing their lands to white people. In view of the tendency of this practice to gradually dispossess the Indians of their homes, and of other evil results which follow from it, it was thought proper to make an effort to arouse the Senecas on both reservations to greater care on this subject.

—New Buildings at Westtown.—At a meeting of the Committee, held Ninth Mo. 18th, it was stated that the centre and eastern wing were now completed, and that the heating arrangements and the apparatus for electric lighting were in process of construction. As it was uncertain when these would be completed and their working satisfactorily tested, it was decided to open the school at the usual time after the fall vacation, in the old building. It was thought by several of the committee, that it would be practicable, during the session, without much interruption to the working of the school, to transfer the family into the new building, if that should seem advisable.

The cost of the improvements thus far, including the removal of the building used for the boys' classrooms to a new site, the erection of a new barn, the heating and lighting apparatus which had been contracted for, &c., was about $208,000. After paying this, there remained about $15,000 applicable to the erection of the western wing designed for the girls, besides some conditional subscriptions in respect to which there was some uncertainty. As the authority to build given by the Yearly Meeting was conditioned on the money being raised by voluntary contributions, which precludes the incurring of any permanent indebtedness, or drawing upon the invested funds, it was decided not to proceed with the remainder of the buildings until additional subscriptions to the amount of $40,000 were obtained.

—Water Baptism.—Information has been received, that on the next First-day after the close of the Binns' Yearly Meeting in Ohio, two of its ministers, D. B. Updegraff and A. H. Hussey, baptized with water three other ministers, Seth and Huldah Rees and Phebe Hoyle—thus putting in practice the liberty accorded to its members by that body.

—Opposition to Tithes in Wales.—The opposition to the payment of this unjust impost appears to be spreading in Wales. Meetings have been held in different places among the farmers, to deliberate on plans for organized resistance; and to agitate for the repeal of the system. Two hundred and fifty farmers in one parish have refused payment. The clergy in the districts affected are reported to be firm in insisting on the payment. If these farmers hold the same views as to the unchristian character of the tithe system which were held by our early Friends, and which enabled them to submit to the sacrifice of property rather than violate principle; and if they will be equally conscientious and faithful in their testimony against it, we believe their action would have a powerful influence in hastening the day when the laws of the land would no longer require a man to support a religious system with whose doctrines and modes of worship he had not unity.

—A Chinese Convert.—A letter from J. Macgowan of China, gives the following interesting instance of faithfulness to conviction of duty in a Chinese doctor, who for twenty-six years had been an opium eater. "Ten years ago he got a copy of John's Gospel. He at once gave up idolatry, but took no steps to become a Christian. Last year a native Christian induced him in a conversation to become a worshipper of God. He was told he must give up his opium. He had the opium-eaters' belief that death would result from an attempt to give it up. After some hesitation he at length resolved, 'From this instant I will give up my opium and never touch it again.' He suffered terribly. One evening his wife thought he was dying, and bought some opium to save his life. Though racked with agony he would not touch it. After ten days of terrible suffering he was a free man. He continued the practice of his profession and preaches the Gospel wherever he goes."

—Spreading Religious Knowledge in India.—"I have lying before me a first book, or primer, in the Telugu language. It begins with the alphabet of five hundred and thirty-nine characters, and goes on to syllables and easy sentences. Among the easy sentences are these: 'There is but one God.' In that sentence the foundation of the Hindu system is undermined. 'God is a spirit. He has no body,' no visible form. Idolatry receives a stab; for how can an image represent him that is without visible form. 'God is holy. In him there is no sin.' If his is received by the young minds as true, the legends of their impure gods are swept away. 'God's love.' This is a new conception to the Hindu mind. They fear, they dread their gods, and make offerings to them to avert their wrath; but they have no thought of God as a loving father. 'God so loved us that he sent his own son to save us.' Here the young Hindu receives his first idea of a loving God reaching down to save sinful man. Thus, mingled in with other matter, come these germs of saving truth, and on the back cover of the book is clearly printed, in large type, the Lord's Prayer, that all may learn it, and many not yet Christians owe to use it. These first books are sold at from one to two cents each, and so much better are they prepared and printed than the native first books, and so much cheaper, that hundreds of heathen school masters introduce them into their schools, in spite of their Christian teaching. On one occasion I sold thirty-five copies to a single heathen schoolmaster, to supply his younger pupils. Eighty thousand copies of this one little book, in the Telugu language alone, have been already sold. Probably twice that number in the Tamil language, and many hundreds of thousands, yes, millions, in all the languages of India together. These primers are followed by Christian first readers and second readers and other school books, all pervaded with Christian truth; all sold for cost, or less, to heathen, who will buy."—J. Chamberlain, in The Independent.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 2, 1886.

In the Life of Oliver Sansom it is stated that we was greatly helped in the early days of his conviction, by reading a tract written by I. Pennington, entitled, "The Way of Life and Death Made Manifest," and which is placed at the beginning of his collected Works. This statement has led to a recent perusal of the tract, and to the consequent belief that its general tenor clearly sets forth some of the distinguishing views of the Society of Friends as to the way of salvation.

In it, I. Pennington speaks of the great apostasy from its primitive condition which overtook the professing Christian church, and of the means of restoration therefrom. The glory of the primitive Christians, that indeed which made them living members of the Church of Christ, was the possession of the Spirit, Light, and Life, which comes from Christ; as the Apostle said, "Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates?" As they abode under this Divine life and power, they remained within the fold of Christ; but as they relaxed in their watchfulness and faithfulness, false prophets entered in among them, wolves in sheep's clothing, who had the form of godliness, but not the power, "Scripture words and practices, but not the spirit of life from which they came." Among the signs of this apostasy he enumerates the following:

Losing the true rule of the Christian, which is the law of the Spirit, that Paul said, had set him free from the law of sin and death—the unction from the Holy One—the anointing which teacheth all things—the Light of God's Spirit, which is a certain and infallible rule—and substituting therefore the Scriptures, and such an understanding of them as man can derive from study, and thus honoring and bowing before the work of his own brain.

Losing the true worship, which is in the spirit, and which is performed only in the presence, power and guidance of the living Word; and performing acts as worship in man's own time and will, and according to his own understanding and apprehension of things, and not from the rising up and guidance of the infallible life of the Spirit in him.

Losing the true faith which gives victory over the world, the true hope which arises from the presence of Christ in the heart, and the true peace which springs from reconciliation with God by having that removed which causeth His wrath, and the wall of separation in the heart broken down by Christ, and the heart made pure by Him; and trusting in a faith which consists in believing an historical relation, a hope springing from it, ("He that believeth shall be saved.") I believe, therefore, I shall be saved), and a peace which comes from a misunderstanding of Scripture while wickedness still lodges in the heart.

Losing the true ministry, which was the immediate gift of Christ, who bestowed of his spirit on those whom He sent forth, and to each one of whom He appointed his work and service. "They did not minister a literal knowledge of things to the understanding of man; but they led men to the Spirit of God, and ministered spiritual things to that spiritual understanding which was given them of God," as it pleased the Spirit to give them utterance. But in the apostasy, the ministry is from the will and wisdom of man, with the meanings and deductions his wisdom can draw from the Scriptures; and that to which he ministers is the understanding part in his hearers, which is fed, while their souls are kept in leanness.

The only way of recovery from this apostasy is by returning to and abiding in the Spirit of Christ. And the first step in religion is to know the Spirit as it appears in the heart, convicting for sin; and then to turn to this and follow its leadings. "To know this, and be joined unto it, is a joining of the creature unto God, by somewhat of Him that comes from his Spirit, and so is a true beginning of life eternal." God is Light, and He gives a measure of his own light to draw from darkness; and he who believes and follows this, is led by it unto God, from whom it came.

"He that believeth is come to the well of salvation, and draws living water out of it."

The ministry of Friends in the beginning was largely occupied in calling on all to turn to this Spirit in them; for they were fully convinced that without walking in obedience to it, no system of doctrinal belief would avail aught to procure man's salvation. They cautioned their hearers against depending on their own understanding, reasoning, or knowledge of Scriptures; well knowing that he who would enter the kingdom of God, must receive Divine instruction as a child; and that it is often easier for publicans and sinners to own truth and enter into life, than for self-conceited professors to lay aside their notions, and give up their hearts to the power of life.

Precious as are the Holy Scriptures, and profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for instruction in righteousness, when opened to the understanding by the Spirit of Christ; we believe there is need at this day for the same caution which Friends felt in the beginning, against trusting too much to an outward knowledge of them; and especially that none should make such knowledge the foundation of their ministry. And we would be glad that all our members could hear and heed the words of Isaac Pennington, "O! that thou mayst fully feel, and be joined to the Seed of life, the Seed of the kingdom which our Lord Jesus Christ in the days of his flesh, did not disdain to be a preacher of. My religion, which I now daily bless my God for, began in this Seed; which, when I first felt, and discerningly knew from the Lord, my cry to Him was, O this is it I have longed after and waited for! O unite my soul to thee, in this forever! This is Thy son's gift from thee, thy Son's grace, thy Son's truth, thy Son's life, thy Son's spirit!"

We have received from "The Interstate Publishing Company," Boston: 30 Franklin Street, three small educational works, sold at 60 cents each.

One is "Entertainments in Chemistry," designed for young students. In this the author, Prof. H. W. Tyler, has described a series of simple experiments, which can be performed with very few chemicals and very little apparatus, yet form a good introduction to a knowledge of this valuable science. The book mainly deals with some of the most abundant and important of substances—such as the oxygen and nitrogen of the air, carbonic acid, hydrogen, sulphur, &c.

Another is called "Through a Microscope," and, like the preceding, is written in simple style. It gives information respecting the instrument itself, the manner of using it, and some of the interesting objects it brings to view. Both of these books seem to us to be useful.

As to the third of the series, "The Making of Pictures," we do not feel competent to express an opinion.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Acting Secretary of the Treasury has issued a call—the 143d—for the redemption of fifteen millions of the three per cent. bonds.

Several of the National banks, in view of the calling in of the three per cent. bonds, have given notice of their principal basis of their circulation, have given notice of withdrawal from the system, and that others are trying to have their called bonds retained as a basis for circulation, preferring to forego interest altogether rather than risk buying 4 per cents and 4½ per cents at the present high premium. The ruling always heretofore held by the Treasury Department, that when bonds cease to bear interest they become unavailable as a basis of circulation, has lately been contested by some of the banks, and the question has been referred to the Attorney General for an opinion. Until this decision is rendered, the Department will adhere to its practice. U. S. Treasurer Jordan said recently to a Washington Post reporter: "I do not expect any contraction of the currency to result from future calls of three per cent. bonds, although I do not expect that more than twenty-five per cent. of the called bonds will be replaced by the national banks with four and four and a-half per cents. These bonds cost too much in the market, and there would be no profit to a bank in currency secured by bonds for which so much would have to be paid." The Treasurer thinks that another twelve months from date all the three per cent. bonds now outstanding will be called in and redeemed, if the revenues of the Government continue as at present.

The Indian Agent at the San Carlos Agency reports that the removal of the Warm Spring and Chiricahua Indians "is a cause of rejoicing to the Indians left there, who are relieved of their fears of attack, and are afforded a better opportunity for acquiring habits of industry."

A telegram from Lancaster, Wisconsin, reports the formation of a co-operative colony, which is to emigrate to Topolobambo, Mexico, Tenth Mo. 1st, on a grant of 15,000 acres of land from the Mexican Government. It will number about 2000, and be co-operative in every respect. Mexico grants the colony many concessions.

The total number of immigrants who arrived in the United States during the eight months which ended on Eighth Mo. 31st, was 254,679, against 240,917 during the corresponding period of 1885.

The total value of the exports of merchandise from the United States during the twelve months which ended on the 31st of Eighth Mo. 1886, was $649,909, -157, against $571,598,496 during the preceding twelve months.

Severe earthquake shocks were felt on the morning of the 21st ult., in Charleston, Summerville and Columbia, South Carolina, and Augusta and Savannah, Georgia. In Charleston many persons ran out of their houses and remained in the streets. "Detonations or explosions" were heard at Charleston and Summerville, and "subterranean thunder," lasting several hours, at Columbia. At Savannah hundreds of people were awakened from sleep. A colored man was injured in Charleston by a falling wall.

On the night of the 24th, two slight earthquake shocks, accompanied by detonations, occurred at Summerville, South Carolina. Another shock was felt in Charleston on the 27th, at 5 o'clock P. M. No damage was done beyond the shaking of loose plastering. The same shock was felt at other places in South Carolina, and in Georgia.

The orange crop of Louisiana is reported to be an almost total failure, owing to the severe freeze last winter. "It usually averages from thirty to fifty millions a year, but will not be one million this year." It is said that "the worst of the matter is that the trees are so badly injured that it will take nine years of propitious weather before the crop will be a full one again."

The severest hail storm ever known at South Bend, Indiana, visited that city on the evening of the 22nd ult. "Hail stones ruined all the tin, iron and slate roofs in the city, while over 10,000 lights of glass were broken at the Oliver Plow Works, and 12,000 in the Studebaker Wagon Works. Hardly a factory, business house or residence escaped damage. The Olivers estimate the damage to their works at $10,000. The total damage in the city will probably reach $60,000. Several people were injured, none dangerously."

The deaths in this city last week numbered 354, which was 34 more than during the previous week, and 17 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing 200 were males and 154 females: 41 died of consumption; 24 of heart diseases; 23 of measles; 17 of cholera infantum; 16 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 16 of old age; 14 of inflammation of the brain; 13 of typhoid fever, and 12 of convulsions.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½ 112½; 4's, registered, 127; coupons, 128; 3's, 100 a 100½; currency 6's, 126½ a 136. Cotton was quiet but firm at 9½ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum ruled steady at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Bran was scarce and firm at $14 a $14.50 per ton for winter.

Flour and Meal.—Flour moved slowly and favored buyers. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania family, at $3.75; 125 barrels choice Ohio, clear, at $4.25; 125 barrels good Ohio, straight, at $4.25; 250 barrels choice do. do., at $4.50; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.60 a $4.80; 125 barrels Minnesota, straight, at $4.25; and 625 barrels do. patent, at $4.75 a $5, the latter hard to reach, except for favorite brands. Rye flour $3.25 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was dull and weak, closing with 81½ cts. bid and 82½ cts. asked. Corn was inactive and ½ c. lower, closing with 46½ cts. bid and 46½ cts. asked. Oats were quiet and a shade weaker, with 34½ cts. bid, and 35 cts. asked.

Beef cattle were firmer, at 3 a 5½ cts.

Sheep were active at 2 a 4½ cts.

Hogs were firm at 6 a 7½ cts.

The receipts were: Beeves, 2700; sheep, 11,000; hogs, 6000.

FOREIGN.—In the British Parliament on the 21st instant, C. S. Parnell's land bill was rejected by a vote of 297 to 202.

On the 22d, Lord Randolph Churchill gave notice of the intention of the Government to introduce early next session measures for considerable modifications in the present method of conducting public business in the House of Commons.

The announcement is accepted as portending further repressive measures against the Parnellites.

On the 25th, Parliament was prorogued until Eleventh Mo. 11th. The Queen's speech closing the session is nearly all devoted to Bulgaria, Afghanistan and the Colonies. The Irish question is referred to in the following words: "I have directed the issue of a commission to inquire into the circumstances which appear to have prevented the anticipated operation of the recent acts dealing with the tenure and the purchase of land in Ireland."

Six persons, including three Glasgow magistrates, were suffocated to death on the 25th, while viewing a monster blast at the Lochfyne-side quarries, near that city. Seven tons of gunpowder were used in the blast. It is estimated that sixty persons were temporarily overcome by choke-damp, and many had convulsions. Several of them are still in hospitals and one of them has died. Some of the injured were hurt by falling rock, and a few are in an extremely critical condition.

All of the officers implicated in the recent attempt at revolution have been condemned to death.

General Villacampa, the leader was found concealed in a mill near Mobjeas.

Zorilla, the leader of the Spanish revolutionists, in an interview published in the Pigoro, says the late uprising in Spain was premature, and declared that in the revolt which will take place at the proper time, many of the generals in the Spanish army will support the revolutionists.

The Italian Government is much annoyed at the new attitude of the Pope towards the Jesuits and his restoration of their privileges. It has decided to intervene and rigidly enforce all laws against the Order. The effect will be a complete expulsion of Jesuits from Italian territory.

A despatch from Constantinople dated Ninth Mo. 24th, says: It has been finally settled that Sir William White, now British Minister at Bucharest, will succeed Sir Edward Thornton as British Ambassador here. Sir William White is considered a strong diplomat, well versed in Eastern affairs, and able to counteract Russian intrigues with the Porte.

The latest advices from the interior of Africa say that Dr. Junker, the explorer, was at Msalaha, south of Victoria Nyanza, and was about to start for Zanzibar. Emin Bey was still at Wadeley, and was in urgent need of more ammunition and supplies. The King of Uganda had foully murdered all the English and French converts, and the missionaries were in great peril, and implored assistance.

A deposit of copper ore, said to be four miles in length, 1500 feet wide and 200 feet deep, has been discovered near Sudbury Junction, Ontario.

Athens, Ninth Month 27th.—Semi-official journals here, commenting on the statement that Lord Idlesleigh has been endeavoring to bring about a rapprochement between Servia, Bulgaria, Greece and Turkey, say that his efforts are too late. The breach between those States, they say, has become so wide that no diplomatic skill can close it. "Although Greece will regard with unwillingness Russia's presence in the Balkans, she cannot ally herself with Turkey and Bulgaria without first securing her present and future interests, and that will be impossible while Bulgaria is allowed to increase at the expense of other nations, and while Greek claims on Turkish provinces remain unsatisfied. If Turkey and Bulgaria desire an alliance with Greece they must offer tangible advantages."

A packet containing a specimen of bread made of oatmeal and the bark of some tree, was found lately, stowed away with some ancient registers in the Hungarian county of Marmaros. The packet bore this inscription: Quantitas panis Marmatici in penuria. A. D., 1786 (quality of the Marmaros bread in the year of want, 1786). The county authorities have directed the specimen to be preserved in the local museum.

DIED, at Marshallton, Pa., on the 26th of Eleventh Month, 1885, ADELINE GLOVER, in the 60th year of her age, a member of Bradford Monthly Meeting of Friends. She was naturally of a cheerful disposition, and although an invalid for many years, endured her afflictions with much patience and resignation. A short time previous to her last sickness she remarked that she thought she would not live long, and expressed satisfaction at the prospect of being released. During her sickness she said, "I feel resigned to live or die. If I have any choice I believe it is to go." Her last illness was of short duration, and was attended with extreme suffering; but her friends are comforted in the assurance that, through redeeming love and mercy, she has been permitted to exchange a life of suffering for one of eternal rest and peace.

Fourth Mo. 29th, 1838. A day of close trial, owing to making an appearance at our little meeting different from what I have been doing. How is it there is such a shrinking from owning my dear Master! Is it not for want of more true love to Him? The language of my heart this day has been, "Thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love Thee." But then comes the fear of making an appearance without the sustaining life, to the dishonor of His precious cause. E. Comfort was excellent in testimony. Great was his exercise and concern for us young people. He arose with, "We have it recorded in the scriptures of truth, that 'Because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold.'" He thought it was a day in which it did greatly abound; and seemed to feel and impress upon us, the need there was for us all, especially for those in the younger walks of life, to be daily on the watch. Said, he had not language to set forth his silent travail from time to time for us; some of whom, he believed, had been deeply tried, almost ready to say within themselves, "It is vain for me to serve the Lord. For the proud are called happy; they that work wickedness are set up; yea, they that tempt God are even delivered. Greatly did he desire, for the encouragement of the tried ones, that they might dwell deep, keeping close to their dear Master, and living in his fear. Then in the day when He maketh up his jewels, He will spare these as a man spareth his own son who serveth him.

Fifth Mo. 24th. "Will the Lord cast off forever? will He be favorable no more? Is his mercy clean gone forever? do his promises fail forever more?" This language hath dwelt much with me, after a day of great strippedness and poverty, particularly during our little meeting this morning; wherein I was led to look narrowly and seriously into my motives for making the change I have of late in my dress. Whereupon it still feels to me that these were things that were required. If it be for a further exercise of faith and love to my dear Master that I am thus tried, may I not be found making my escape in the winter season.

29th. Our Monthly Meeting, held at Plymouth. Soon after taking my seat was my heart made to overflow under a sense of the goodness of our Heavenly Father, who still condescends to remember his poor little dependent ones! which, if it be but with a crumb of bread and a drop of water, how sweet and refreshing! known only to those who have experienced a long season of drought.

Sixth Mo. 3rd. Do not think I ever felt more prepared to go to meeting and sit down in quietness than I did this morning. But on gathering into stillness, again was I left to feel my weakness! None knows but my Heavenly Father what I have passed through of late! this semblance of worship without life, it seems as if I could not live under. I have endeavored of latter times to be found in the path of simple obedience. If there is that remaining which is offensive in Thy holy eye-sight, be pleased to make it known, and give strength to lay it aside.

10th. Our last two meetings have been seasons of refreshment; during that on Fifth-day last, very unexpectedly, was I brought into a state of quietness and stillness; a quietness I have not witnessed for many days. For such had been the poverty wherewith I was surrounded, that I have been ready to exclaim: "Oh wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death!" but a little strength was given this day to intercede, that the clouds which have surrounded, might be dispersed; and that I might be given to see and know all that was required at my hands; and be enabled to give up that which is for the fire. For there are seasons when I feel as though I would be willing to part with any thing, to gain the love and affection of my Heavenly Father, and to feel an assurance that He really loves me, and that I am his child. How does this sweeten the toils of life! how does it enliven when tired and worn out with the busy bustling cares of the world! Trust I have known something of this feeling: but O the fears that I shall not walk worthy. Our little meeting was a precious one. E. Comfort was lively in testimony from, "Blessed are the poor in spirit for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are they that hunger and thirst," &c. Sweetly encouraging us young people for whom his concern was.

14th. How often a day of strippedness follows one of favor! great poverty was mine this day.

24th. The prayer of the poor publican hath dwelt much with me: "Lord be merciful to me, a sinner." E. C. excellent in testimony; reviving the language, "To thy tent, O Jacob, and thy tabernacle, O Israel." God is the tent of all the true Israel. Unless there is an abiding in Him, the true and living vine, we can receive no nourishment from Him. Although we may have been engrafted into Him, and received for a time true and living virtue, if there is not a concern kept alive therein to abide, we shall find ourselves become as withered branches. What we have known in days past, will not nourish now; we must seek daily for fresh supplies. If this be not our concern, we shall become comparable to the vineyard planted in a fruitful hill, which was fenced about, the stones gathered out, and it planted with choice vines. But when the time came for it to bring forth grapes, it brought forth wild grapes. What was the command that went forth against this vineyard? the hedge was to be taken away, and it was to be eaten up; the wall was to be broken down, and it trodden under foot and to be laid waste; it was not to be pruned or digged; and there was to come up on it briars and thorns, and the clouds were commanded that they rain no rain upon it. Presenting ourselves before the living God without a preparation of heart was feelingly spoken to. I know this is too much the case with me. Were we only all what we ought to be, what refreshing times should we have when thus assembled! there would be that felt which would be as a savor of life unto life, and death unto death; and we should experience our meetings to become in a signal manner the place of His presence and power.

31st. Think I never felt more like one alone, than I did on taking my seat with my young friends in meeting this morning. How is it the appearance I am making remains such a cross! could I only live up to my profession I believe it would not. Again and again am I led to query, has it been to appear better than my contemporaries that I have made this change? then, in answer, I can appeal in sincerity of heart, I trust, Thou knowest all things! Thou knowest, O Heavenly Father, it was in compliance with thy blessed will long made manifest, that I was made willing to take up the cross and bear my little portion of suffering. Strengthen and enable me never to be ashamed of owning Thee, no matter how low the creature be laid.

Seventh Mo. 7th. E. Comfort deeply exercised for the careless and indifferent. He feared there were those amongst the young people, who were slighting the day of their visitation; and thus crucifying unto themselves the Son of God afresh. The mercy and loving kindness of their Heavenly Father had been great toward them; and his long forbearance in visiting them both immediately and instrumentally again and again. If they still continued on in the road they were going, the day would come when these things would rise up in judgment against them. With more, very impressive.

12th. During the forepart of our meeting this morning, I experienced great strippedness. So much so, it seemed as if it could not be that I have ever known anything that was good; but toward the close had more comfortable feelings. Gratitude flowed in remembering the kindness of our Heavenly Father, who is so loading us outwardly with his bounties; so blessing us in basket and in store! Who can look around on the fields which are now white "already to harvest," and not feel gratitude to flow for his continued mercies? Surely we cannot feel sufficiently thankful! I have desired we may be made sensible of the obligations we are under to so kind and good a Parent.

15th. At our little meeting we had our friends William and Elizabeth Evans. The company of such dear friends to sit with us is very strengthening and encouraging. Both were engaged in testimony. E. from, "When my father and mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up." He careth for such as these who cleave unto Him. Said, Oh what a blessing it was, how strengthening to a dear child when brought under conviction, if they can go to their parents and "ask bread" and receive it, not a "stone." Desired us who were thus blessed to be sensible of and appreciate the favor; and in true-hearted concern for ourselves, crave that He who had been the God of our fathers and grandfathers would be our God. Enlarging further from the blessing of Israel on his sons, viz: "The God before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac did walk, the God which fed me all my life long unto this day, the angel which redeemed me from all evil, bless the lads." William's concern seemed much in unison with Elizabeth's, only he warned against resting satisfied or contenting ourselves with being the children and grandchildren of concerned parents. This would do but little for us unless we were concerned for ourselves. He pressed upon us the necessity of individual faithfulness, as something wanting amongst us. He showed plainly that if we were only what we ought to be, what refreshing seasons and meetings we should have! the precious life would be more felt to rise into dominion, flowing as from vessel to vessel. And when any felt themselves constrained to speak of the goodness of the Lord, we should be in a state to receive.

22nd. Renewed desires were felt, that I may be more concerned to "work while it is called to-day." Could we only keep in remembrance that each day is bringing us nearer to our final close, surely it would stimulate.

For "The Friend."

A Visit to Berks County, Pennsylvania.

Feeling the need of some relaxation and recuperation, we started lately for Wernersville, Berks County. Perhaps notes of a few incidents of the visit may prove interesting to others, as they did to ourselves.

The journey up the river Schuylkill, as far as Reading, was over ground formerly traversed by us on foot, many, many years ago, but so much has the hand of busy man changed the appearance of everything save the unchangeable hills, all was new to us. In days gone by, the German, or rather the Pennsylvania Dutch element strongly permeated the population of the Schuylkill Valley, and the simple, hardworking inhabitants would often answer our questionings with a shake of the head and "Nicht yersthe," and even now, in the cars the conversation was carried on by some of the way passengers in, to us, an unknown tongue. In our early days we remember seeing twenty-eight reapers in one field cutting grain with sickles, and each alternate reaper was a woman. To-day is to be seen one man driving three horses, through a field, attached to a complicated machine which leaves the grain behind it bound in sheaves ready for the barn!

We entered the large, busy city of Reading, and, as way passengers, left at the depot to await another train.

After again starting it took but a short time to reach Wernersville and find ourselves in a German-looking town, neat and with something old-fashioned in its appearance, more readily felt than described. A stage awaited us, the pleasant face of the driver of which, as well as the tones of his voice, bespoke the German blood of his ancestors. Familiar with the hill country of our State, we were hardly prepared to see the landscape so thoroughly mountainous as we found it.

The roads were good, but so hilly that our Jehu thought the walk of his strong, heavy-built horses was a sufficiently rapid gait; our city ideas of travelling finding little response from him. Less than an hour's ride brought us to our intended place of sojourn, Sunnyside, where our hosts, the Prestons welcomed us.

Our place of boarding has been well named "Sunnyside." Built on the side of a steep mountain, looking from the main piazza directly south, the sun visits, in its daily passage, three sides of the fine structure, from two of which were extensive and interesting views. These overlooked a long reach of country; Lancaster valley being directly before us, stretching from Reading on the one hand, to Lancaster on the other; the prominent feature of the scenery being hills covered with chestnut, walnut and coniferous trees, with the main valley, as well as the tributary ones, under cultivation and fertile. The ripening crops of rye and wheat, with the beautiful green of the young corn were very attractive. The occurrence of red barns, and well built ones too, indicated the thrifty German blood of Pennsylvania. Why they are so fond of that color for their buildings we cannot tell, but they do greatly use it. Several towns, with their groups of houses could be seen, and our eye never tired noting the varied features of the landscape: farm and forest, mountain and vale, made Lancaster Valley always an attractive place to look upon. The passing of rail-road trains was an interesting feature. The smoke of the locomotive indicated the distant train and just as the cars would be dimly discernible they would disappear behind some hill we had not recognized, distance having blended it with others beyond. The city of Lancaster, over thirty miles distant, is lighted with electricity, and of a clear night the twinkling of the lamps was distinctly visible.

A haze seemed mostly to rest on the mountain tops, sometimes obscuring the different features of the landscape, to our annoyance, as we vainly endeavored to localize some farm building, hill, or mountain peak, but all was beautiful and attractive. How much they lose who have not learned to love nature in her varied beauties.

One day's incidents must not be forgotten. There was, beside the main buildings, a cottage situated 60 feet higher up South Mountain, in which we had our lodging. Early one morning, on stepping out on the piazza we were surprised to find we were overlooking a blank. A dense cloud had so enveloped everything that even the main buildings below us were invisible. The whole of that day was a continued source of interesting changes. At times the clouds would lift somewhat and hill tops would be brought to view; and again they would form in some valley and roll up till all would be again enveloped. These clouds hung heavily over us all day, but about four o'clock in the afternoon a thunder-storm set in, and from that till nine o'clock the sound of thunder seemed seldom out of our ears, the reverberations of peal after peal from peak to peak being very remarkable—neither were flashes of lightning many minutes at a time invisible. The storm passed many miles south of us and proved the cause of much damage to the country in its track. The whole of that day was one to be remembered.

Most of our rambles were solitary ones. The hill-sides were remarkably steep, so that it was often difficult to make our way over them, for besides being clothed with forest, the surface was often covered with rocks, lying loosely on the ground, making insecure foothold for the wanderer. The soil beneath this stony covering was said to be readily cultivated, and the foot of these hills, where the steepness was less forbidding, was often under cultivation, the fields fenced in by stone walls, the clearings of the land. In these fields the German left-handed plows moved freely, there being no stones to interfere with their working. A copious spring of clear, soft water, which was entirely free from limestone in its composition, furnished abundantly all the wants of our family.

We did not find as much of animated nature as would have been pleasant to us. A few insects fluttered about, and from the cottage we could watch the gambols of the red squirrels, which from not being disturbed were remarkably at home, chattering and scolding from morning to night. Occasionally a striped ground-squirrel might be seen, and abundance of rabbits presented themselves in the woods. These seemed to be the four-footed denizens of the place, while but few birds were noticed save the ubiquitous crow, a chance flicker, some robins and numerous night-hawks. In one of our rambles we came upon a large, formidable-looking snake, nearly walking over it. The reptile looked at us, showed its teeth, gave a low hiss and stood on the defensive. We looked quietly at it and it soon settled its head back again; so we mutually agreed to be at peace, it took its rest and we passed by without disturbing it. It was a large grey one unknown to us.

On the highest peak of the South Mountain stands a tall observatory. This commands the Lebanon Valley for a long distance as well as a southern view over Lancaster Valley and beyond as far as the Welsh Mountains. Northward a richly cultivated country lay before us, we judged for fifty miles. The diversified landscape was of never-tiring attractiveness, while beyond, the Blue Mountains marked the horizon, the different Gaps in which, known to our youthful days, we imagined we could recognize correctly: perhaps some of them we did. The scene recalled the familiar Chester Valley, but was much more extensive. There were at our feet the buildings of other places of summer resort, but the varying shades of field and forest had more attractions for our eye. Of such a scene one scarce could tire. The general quiet outline of the distant Blue Mountains owed their uniformity, doubtless, to the blending of their remoteness, but the hills immediately around us came out most distinctly in their individuality: some rounding symmetrically, while the greater abruptness of others gave varied character to the landscape.

The family of visitors gathered at Preston's was a very interesting one to us, the absence of fashion giving much of a home feeling that too often is lacking at places of summer resort. The social meetings, either on the piazza of a morning or in the parlor after tea, were really enjoyable times to most of us. On First-day morning our hosts gathered us in the parlor, and the reading from the Bible of a few chapters, followed by some words of a religious nature by one of the visitors, indicated the appreciation of the day.

A little group of children had its attractive features to us, and we soon found ourselves on familiar terms with them. One of the amusements consisted in gathering thistle-heads and making balls of their downy part. The little ones became quite expert at this and the balls hanging from the windows in various parts of the house were interesting proofs of their skill. The thistles were of a larger variety than those that grow around Philadelphia.

Our time for return came quite soon enough, and we bade adieu to Sunnyside and its inhabitants with a feeling of a willingness to prolong our stay, or to renew our visit at some future time.

For "The Friend."

Oliver Sansom.

Hitherto the sufferings of Oliver Sansom had been principally from restraints of his property, and the annoyance of being brought before Justices and Courts on account of his faithfulness to his religious profession. The time had now come in which he was to suffer in another way. His Memoir says:—

"On the 25th of this Tenth Month, 1665, as I lay in bed in the morning early, I heard as it were an audible voice which said unto me, take no care for thy business; for thou must go to prison for three months. Thereupon I presently arose, and related to my family what I had so plainly heard; and we all thought that if I went to prison it would be for not paying the priest, he having so often threatened me. So I let it pass for the present being given up in my mind to suffer, if the will of the Lord were so.

"Three days after a ministering Friend came to my house to visit me; and I desired him, if it stood with his freedom, to have a meeting there that evening; because several of my neighbors had told me that if ever there should be a meeting at my house, and they had notice of it they would come to it. The Friend consenting I sent my servants, both man and maid, to acquaint all my neighbors therewith, both in that town and also in a village which was near, and I bid them deliver their message thus; that if they had any desire to hear the Truth declared, they might come to my house at such an hour that evening. There was not one family, besides the priest's, but was invited. For I thought the priest would prove a troublesome guest; and therefore neither he nor any of his family were invited. But most of my neighbors came, especially the men, and the room was full, and the Friend declared the Truth for near the space of an hour to the great satisfaction of the people."

The priest during this time was at his home with his family and some others, amusing himself with playing cards. But hearing of the meeting, he came with his company to break it up; and the next morning made complaint of the meeting having been held to William James, a Justice of the Peace. Fines of twelve pence each were imposed on those who were proved to have been present. When they came to Oliver, he says, "because I could not promise as the others did, that I would go no more to meetings, and to confess myself guilty as an offender in that which, in the sight of God and all just men was no offence, they fined me five pounds; or to endure three months imprisonment, as for the first offence (as they called it) upon the Act for banishment And I not consenting to pay the fine, was committed prisoner to the county gaol at Reading, for three months.

"Now did I call to mind, and thankfully acknowledge the goodness of the Lord unto me, in fore-showing me of this three months' imprisonment by that voice which I had heard as I lay in bed, three days before.

"Within four days after my imprisonment, the said Justice James sent his warrant for my man-servant whose name was William Cowless, and committed him to the house of correction at Abingdon, for four months, calling this his second offence upon the Act for banishment; for he, having been taken at another meeting, had been committed not long before to the house of correction at Reading, and was but lately discharged from thence."

"I had not been long in the prison before I fell sick and continued ill and weak for about two weeks' time.

"And now, not being so mindful and regardless as I should have been of that warning and charge which the Lord had so wonderfully given me, not to be thoughtful in my imprisonment of my outward concerns at home, as I began a little to recover I let the cares thereof enter my heart, taking thought what my poor wife would do with my business, my man being in prison as well as myself, and she left destitute of fit help. Wherefore having obtained leave of the keeper I went privately home, that I might be helpful to my wife in advice and counsel at the least.

"But the journey being too hard for me, eighteen miles on foot, in the winter season, and I but weakly, I took cold again and my sickness returned and was very sore unto me; so that I was nigh unto death. Then cried I unto the Lord for help, beseeching Him to give me a little strength, that I might be but enabled to get to my prison again, and then I should be satisfied to die, if He had so appointed. Oh! it was a sore trouble and exercise to me to be thus out of my place; and to be so seized with sickness as not to be able to return back again; whereby instead of being assistant to my wife I was but a hindrance to her, and brought great grief and trouble on her, seeing me in that weak condition, like to die, and she could not have the help of her neighbors because she was afraid to let them know that I was at home lest it might bring blame upon the gaoler. But after two or three weeks' time it pleased the Lord in his tender mercy to abate my illness and give me some strength, and then I got privately back to my prison again. And glad I was when I got thither; intending for the future never to do the like again, but to rest satisfied in my sufferings, and to resign up all unto the Lord, who saves all those that put their whole trust in Him.

"It was weightily upon me to record this passage as a thankful remembrance of the Lord's mercy and goodness to me therein; and I desire it may be a caution to all tender Friends who may have the knowledge of it, to cast all their care upon the Lord, and lean solely upon Him, whatever their exercise and suffering may be."

"When my three months' imprisonment at Reading was at an end I was discharged and went home. But I was not long suffered to enjoy my liberty there. For on the first day of the Fifth Month, 1666, I being with other of my friends peaceably assembled at the house of Bartholomew Malam in Lambourne Woodlands, to wait upon and worship the Lord, we were violently haled out of our meeting by armed soldiers of the trained band under the conduct of Charles Garrard their captain, and many of us carried to Lambourne before Humphrey Hide, Thomas Garrard, and Charles Fettplace, called Justices, who committed eleven of us to prison, viz: seven to the house of correction at Abingdon, and four, whereof I was one, to the common jail at Reading for three months, upon the Act for Banishment; where I continued a prisoner very near fourteen weeks."

A letter which he wrote to his wife during this imprisonment instructively sets forth his sense of the sustaining presence of the Lord, and his concern that he and his wife might be preserved in willing submission to all that the Lord might please to befall them. In it he says:—

"My dear wife: These are to let thee understand that through the goodness of the Lord I am very well in health, and at present feel not the want of anything; for I know the living God to be my Shepherd who doth guide and lead me in the green pastures of comfort, joy, and peace; so that satisfaction is by me daily enjoyed and witnessed. Dear heart, feel me in that living spring from whence our refreshment and daily satisfaction comes, and be steadfast and immovable, always having the eye of thy mind inwardly open in pure fear, watching over thy thoughts, words, and actions. Oh dear heart, my true breathings often to the Lord have been, that we both may be preserved faithful and single to the Lord; that in all trials and sufferings that at present do or ever hereafter may attend us; I say my earnest desire is, that we may not look out, nor murmur at the Lord's dealings with us, but that we may always be given up to do or to suffer what the Lord shall be pleased to exercise us withal; knowing that we are the Lord's, and He may do with us what pleaseth Him, and assuredly He will not suffer us to be tempted or tried any further than He will give us strength to bear and endure as we stand faithful to what He makes known to us."

During Oliver Sansom's subsequent imprisonments, (for he was frequently immured in prison for his testimony to the truth), he appears to have been favored with a comforting feeling of the Divine approval which made hard things easy, and bitter things sweet. On one of these occasions he was kept a close prisoner in Reading gaol for more than two years, "in all which time," he remarks, "I never saw my own habitation, nor indeed as much as desired it; but rested satisfied in the will of my Heavenly Father; being willing to drink that cup which He had appointed me."

After his release from this imprisonment, he thus writes respecting it:—

"How can I proceed without mentioning a little of the Lord's goodness and mercy, which He was pleased to show unto me in that time of my solitude and lonely confinement by myself! The Lord was pleased graciously to visit me and wonderfully to break in upon me in that needful time, to the overcoming of me with the sense of his heart-tendering love, which made me in secret say, surely the Lord brought me hither, on purpose to show kindness to me. And through the breakings in of the power of an endless life into my heart at that season, my God did both mightily tender and enlarge my heart, and also open my mouth and gave me utterance, to show forth his praise and to declare of his goodness openly in the assemblies of his people. O blessed and praised and magnified be his worthy and honorable name for evermore! who raiseth the poor from the dust and the needy from the dunghill, to tell of his goodness and to proclaim the exceeding riches of his love to the children of men."

Well might William Leddra exclaim, the day before his execution at Boston,—"Alas, alas, what can the wrath and spirit of man, that lusteth to envy, aggravated by the heat and strength of the king of the locusts which came out of the pit, do unto one that is hid in the secret places of the Almighty? or, unto them that are gathered under the healing wings of the Prince of Peace?" For his happy experience was, that "The sweet influences of the morning Star, like a flood, distilling into my innocent habitation, hath so filled me with the joy of the Lord in the beauty of holiness, that my spirit is as if it did not inhabit a tabernacle of clay, but is wholly swallowed up in the bosom of eternity, from whence it had its being."

For "The Friend."

Canadian Friends.

About the second of last month I received the enclosed communication, and after coming to a judgment relative to its meaning, visited Friends of the three Quarterly Meetings, and informed them what I thought was its proper construction, and most of those consulted thought best to accept the terms offered, and after reaching Toronto, I wrote the following:

Toronto, Ninth Month 14th, 1886.

Dear Friend,—Thy letter of the 2d received, and I have seen leading Friends concerning it, and they are disposed to agree to the proposal if they understand its meaning aright: that is to say:

1st. That the Yearly Meeting properly, meaning thereby the Yearly Meeting-house and grounds should belong in equal shares to both parties, for Yearly Meeting purposes, and should be used and enjoyed equally, at times to be mutually agreed upon, and to be repaired and maintained and cared for at equal expense. The Pickering Monthly Meeting to have the same use of the house as at present, including the burying ground.

2d. That all other properties of the Friends, whether Quarterly, Monthly or otherwise, including burying grounds, should henceforth be used and enjoyed as at present.

3d. If anything should be realized out of the College property after paying incumbrances, the same to be divided equally between the parties.

4th. The appeal to the Supreme Court to be withdrawn, and both parties to bear all their own costs of the litigation.

If the above should be thy understanding of the proposition, I will take the necessary steps to have it carried into effect.

Sincerely thy friend,
ARNOLDI HAIGHT.

This answer was handed to one of their committee, who after reading it aloud in presence of two Friends, with myself, said it was the meaning of their proposition. Their committee met us the next day, and I asked them if we had given the true meaning of their proposition, and they answered in the affirmative.

The first point touched upon was the burying ground—they wished the right to use it as heretofore. I asked if they would concede the same in regard to West Lake, and these points were freely conceded.

The plan proposed by us in relation to the Yearly Meeting-house, did not meet with their approval, and they left us to talk the matter over, and we concluded to make an offer that we thought would be satisfactory, which was to give or take $1200 for the property; but this did not meet their views, and after some consultation among themselves, they said we had valued the property too low, and they would give $2000 in cash for it if we would pay a share of the costs of the Court of Appeal. We then told them according to the two offers, it was allowing them $800 to do with as they thought proper; and we thinking, after they had admitted that our meaning of their proposition was correct, which says that each party was to pay their own costs, that any more conversation might be unprofitable, bid them farewell, and came away.

I may say in conclusion, that we are willing to have the matter settled according to our answer, or our offer of $1200 to give or take the property.

ARNOLDI HAIGHT.

The communication referred to is as follows:

[Minute 52.]

"The action of the Representative Meeting in reference to the litigation, has been laid before this meeting. We accept the same, leaving the case in the hands of the committee appointed (Dorland vs. Jones), who are continued, giving them full authority to propose, and, if possible, effect a settlement on the basis that has now been laid before this meeting. Such proposal to be submitted to our counsel for approval."

The above taken from the minutes of Canada Yearly Meeting of Friends for 1886.

Toronto, Ninth Month 2d, 1886.

Arnoldi Haight, Newmarket.

Re Dorland vs. Jones.

Dear Friend.—In accordance with the enclosed paragraph taken from the minutes of the Canada Yearly Meeting of Friends, held at Pickering, by adjournment from Sixth Month 25th to Sixth Month 30th, 1886, we hereby offer to divide the Yearly Meeting property with the Yearly Meeting of which Adam Spencer is clerk, provided the appeal to the Supreme Court in this case be withdrawn, and this be accepted as a final settlement of all matters in difference between the two bodies. It has been the desire of our Yearly Meeting, from the first, on Christian grounds, and in keeping with the well-known principles of Friends, to avoid litigation; and it is this desire which prompts us to make this proposition, notwithstanding the fact of the strong unanimous decision of the Court of Appeal in our favor.

We send this to thee, as we have been given to understand that thou art chairman of a committee appointed by your Yearly Meeting in this case, and trust it will be received in the same spirit in which it is sent, "without prejudice."

Sincerely thy friend,
SAMUEL ROGERS,
Chairman Com.

TRUST.

I cannot see with my small human sight,
Why God should lead this way or that for me.
I only know He saith, "Child, follow me,"
And I can trust.

I know not why my path should be at times
So strangely hedged, so strangely barred before;
I only know God could keep wide the door,
But I can trust.

I find no answer often when beset
With questions fierce and subtle on my way,
And often have but strength to faintly pray.
But I can trust.

I cannot know why suddenly the storm
Should rage so fiercely round me in its wrath;
But this I know, God watches all my path,
And I can trust.

I may not draw aside the mystic veil
That hides the unknown future from my sight,
Nor know if for we waits the dark or light.
But I can trust.

I have no power to look across the tide,
To know while here the land across the river;
But this I know, I shall be God's forever,
So I can trust.

BY THE STREAM.

Sweet tangled banks, where ox-eyed daisies grow
And scarlet poppies gleam;
Sweet changing lights, that ever come and go
Upon the quiet stream!

Once more I see the flash of splendid wings,
As dragon flies flit by;
Once more for me the small sedge-warbler sings
Beneath a sapphire sky.

Once more I feel the simple, fresh content
I found in stream and soil
When golden summers slowly came and went,
And mine was all the spoil.

I find amid the honeysuckle flowers,
And shy forget-me-not,
Old boyish memories of the lonely hours
Passed in this quiet spot.

O God of nature, how Thy kindness keeps
Some changeless things on earth!
And he who roams afar and toils and weeps,
Comes home to learn their worth.

Gay visions vanish, worldly schemes may fail,
Hope prove an idle dream,
But still the blossoms flourish, red and pale,
Beside my native stream.

THE LIGHT THAT IS FELT.

A tender child of summers three,
Seeking her little bed at night,
Paused on the dark stairs timidly,
"Oh, mother, take my hand," said she,
"And then the dark will all be light."

We older children grope our way
From dark behind to dark before;
And only when our hands we lay,
Dear Lord, in Thine, the night is day,
And there is darkness nevermore.

Reach downward to the sunless days,
Wherein our guides are blind as we,
And faith is small and hope delays:
Take Thou the hands of prayer we raise,
And let us feel the light of Thee.

—John G. Whittier.

To the Members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

The Committee who have charge of the Boarding School at Westtown, having now arrived at an important stage in the progress of the erection of the new buildings, find it necessary to appeal again to the members of the Yearly Meeting for further contributions to enable them to complete them.

The central building and east wing for the boys' use are now nearly finished. The boiler-house and chimney required for the steam-heating apparatus and laundry, the machinery for electric lighting, and the pipes and other apparatus required for the introduction of heat and electric lights into the new buildings, are in progress, and are expected to be ready for use by about the 1st of the Twelfth Month. The barn on the north side of the central building being situated near where it was necessary to locate the new boiler-house, had to be taken down, and a new barn erected, further northward. The West Wing for the girls' department has not yet been contracted for. The work thus far done and in progress, has cost or will cost when complete, nearly as follows:

The Central Building, contract price,	$66,200
The East Wing, contract price,	64,000
Alterations and additions for Central Building and East Wing,	2,839
Warming and ventilation of Centre and East Wing,	14,701
Plumbing and water works, in Centre and East Wing, about	7,000
Electric lighting and fixtures for Centre and East Wing, about	5,588
The boiler-house, chimney stack, and laundry,	15,000
The removal of old barn, and building new one (with carriage sheds), about	4,000
The removal of Industrial Hall, and refitting same,	7,763
Sundry charges now on Ledger for work and materials,	1,205
Estimated cost of grading, draining, and laying roads and walks,	5,000
Estimated cost of sundry items of work in refitting, after placing pipes, &c., in new building, for heat, lights, &c.,	1,500
Architect's commission and fees, about	9,390
Insurance of new buildings, about	2,000
	$206,186

Subscriptions have been received up to Ninth Month 18th, 1886, to the amount of $222,595; Interests on deposits, $5608.36, making total, $228,203, of which $8,110 is conditionally subscribed. Deducting from these subscriptions the amount expended or yet due, as above, leaves a balance of $22,017.

It is estimated that the cost of erecting the West Wing, inserting the pipes for heating it, electric light apparatus, plumbing and water works, &c., will probably amount to $71,000, so that we still require the sum of about $50,000, in new subscriptions, to complete the whole work.

It is highly important that the Committee should obtain at least $40,000 of this sum within the year 1886, as they have concluded not to proceed with the West Wing until that sum is pledged, in addition to what has been subscribed prior to Ninth Month 18th. They desire to contract as early as practicable for taking down the old building during the coming winter season, and for the erection of the West Wing on its site as soon as the spring of 1887 opens, so that it may be ready for occupancy by the girls by the autumn of that year. This cannot be accomplished if the promise of sufficient funds is delayed much after the middle of the Twelfth Month. We feel that it would be inequitable to deprive the girls of the privilege of the new accommodations for two years more. Whilst the new building remains in an incomplete state, it causes considerable inconvenience to those engaged in conducting the School, and it is obvious to all that this period should be as limited as possible.

The Committee are precluded from using the invested capital belonging to the School for the purposes of the new building, and do not wish to incur any debt in its construction not provided for by voluntary contributions. They, therefore, would urge upon Friends who have not yet subscribed to consider what may be their duty in advancing the interests of this Institution, which has been the means of educating so many of them and their children, and will, when this improvement is made, be so well prepared to accommodate the youth of the present and future generations with a comfortable home, and all the requisite appliances of scholastic training.

To those who have already contributed, we desire to express our grateful sense of the liberality shown by them, and, without pressing any to give beyond their means, we would suggest that, if the project so well carried forward to its present stage is to be perfected in the near future, there must be some repetition of their bounty by many of its patrons.

We hope a generous and early response may be made to this appeal, and $50,000 be subscribed before the present year expires, so that the West Wing and the whole work may be completed in the year 1887.

The entire amount of each subscription will not necessarily have to be paid by the donors in the next year if it is not convenient to do so. They may, if preferred, be made payable in instalments running over the next two years.

Nothing less than the united efforts of all the members of our Yearly Meeting who are able to spare anything from their means will be adequate to accomplish the undertaking now in hand. None should feel excused because they cannot give as largely as others. Small contributions will be welcome from those who cannot afford more.

Westown Boarding School is the joint property of all our members. The Committee have to interest in it beyond others, and they feel that, in thus soliciting the funds to place the School upon a prosperous basis, they are but advocating the substantial benefit of their constituents.

On behalf and by direction of the Committee in Subscriptions,

CHARLES RHODES,
WILLIAM EVANS.

Adventures of a Diver.

BY GEO. E. WALSH.

In certain localities along the Atlantic coast vessels are wrecked nearly every winter. Half submerged reefs and hidden rocks extend far out into the ocean in these places and make it exceedingly dangerous for vessels to pass.

When a craft is once sunk in shallow water efforts are made, as soon as practicable, to relieve her of her cargo. This can be done in one way only—by using the diving-bell or diving-dress. The wrecking vessels, after making their soundings in the vicinity of the disaster, place buoys directly over the wrecked craft, which greatly helps the divers in their work. If strong ocean currents flow near the vessel considerable risk and danger to life is run by the divers. The rope secured to their belt may be parted at any moment, and they left to the mercy of the waves. In case of such a mishap their heavy dress would instantly carry them to the bottom, and the air-tube being disconnected by the violent jerk, all chance of escape would be cut off. When the steamship "Oregon" was wrecked off Fire Island last winter, the diver, after encasing himself in his air-tight dress, attempted to descend to the vessel's deck by way of the steamer's rigging. He had not gone far before he encountered a current nearly strong enough to tear him from his hold, and, dreading lest he should lose his life if he proceeded, he returned to the surface. A rope was then passed around his belt, which his companions on the wrecking steamer could regulate at will; and, thus doubly secured against danger, he once more attempted the descent. When he reached the steamer's deck he found the water comparatively quiet and free from all currents, while just above his head it was flowing in a swift tide.

But vessels often sink in fifty fathoms or more of water, when their masts do not approach within many feet of the surface. If strong under-currents then flow over them the diver has additional difficulties to surmount. He must first reach the bottom of the ocean at some distance from the wreck, where the influence of the flowing water is not felt, and then carefully walk along the bottom until he reaches his desired object. If he finds the water quiet around the vessel, he may work for hours at a time without coming to the surface; and the only annoyance he experiences is a slight pain in the ears and above the eyes, which increases with the depth of the water.

The experiences of a diver are many and interesting. After he has once reached the sunken vessel, whether by being lowered straight down from the wrecking craft or by walking along the bottom of the ocean to avoid currents, he must search through the hull of the ship as though she were floating upon the surface of the water. To do this he carries a small lamp with him, which gives out a peculiarly brilliant light when under the water, and makes the surrounding objects glisten with all the colors of the rainbow. Care must be taken that the air-tube does not get tangled up in any way, or cut by friction against the side of the vessel. Unfortunate divers have frequently lost their lives by this means, when exploring the intricate passages of a vessel at great depths below the surface of the water. Danger is also experienced from heavy pieces of timber, boxes, barrels, and even dead bodies, which are often floating around in the hold of a sunken vessel. A diver, once telling of the trouble that he had in exploring a wreck, said that he was constantly annoyed by several heavy chests which kept moving about with every swell of the sea. One came so near to his diving-bell that he was forced to give it a violent push, which sent it against the opposite wall of the small cabin. Instantly it rebounded and came within an inch of the diver's head-dress, which it would have quickly broken had it struck it. But by dodging in time the chest passed harmlessly over him, and the next moment it collided with another similar chest. The force of the collision broke one of the hoops of the huge box, and the next moment a glittering pile of newly stamped gold coins rolled out upon the floor of the cabin. The chest had been used as a sort of treasury box by the captain, and all of his valuables were locked up in it. Besides gold and silver pieces of money, rich jewels and precious stones escaped from the brass-bound chest and presented to the diver's gaze a rare sight. The light from his small lamp, shining through the water, made the golden heap seem brighter than ever.

The diver when walking under the sea is permitted to see some of the most beautiful and picturesque scenes that the eye can imagine. For thirty feet below the surface of the ocean the solar rays are distinctly visible through the watery mass, and all objects are distinguished for several hundred feet around. Beyond that, the tints darken into fine gradations of ultramarine until they fade into vague obscurity.

In the midst of submarine wonders, and under the arbors of rich plants and flowers, the diver unhesitatingly makes his way. His large head-dress has three small glass bull's-eyes, through which he can see on every side, and enjoy the beauties of his lonely walk. His hands are perfectly free, and his diving-dress interferes with the freedom of his actions but little. The twenty-five pounds of lead which are fastened to the soles of his shoes becomes unnoticeable in this denser atmosphere, and he walks with a perfect freedom, only taking care to direct the rope and the air-tube which supplies him with the life-giving fluid as he proceeds.

Occasionally divers are attacked by the large fish which inhabit the deep. While exploring the bottom of the sea some distance from the shore, a few years ago, an old, experienced diver was startled by a gigantic shadow which appeared just above his head. He understood the meaning of it immediately, and, looking up, he saw an enormous shark advancing diagonally toward him, with jaws open and eyes on fire. He made an effort to spring to the surface by inflating his air-dress, but he found it too late. He then threw himself on one side to avoid the voracious creature's fins, which swept over him with a loud swish. The shark quickly returned, however. But the diver had prepared himself for battle during the brief delay. As the monster threw himself upon his back the second time, the diver stepped aside to avoid the shock, and like lightning he grasped one of the creature's fins in his left hand, and with the other he dealt him a staggering blow with his dagger. The blood rushed in torrents from the wound and dyed the sea red, so that it was difficult to see through the opaque mass. The monster fish, pained by the blow, lashed the sea with such fury as to nearly carry the diver off his feet. But with the strength of desperation he managed to cling to the shark's fins and deal him blow after blow with his dagger. The loss of blood soon weakened the huge creature, and after a struggle of several minutes longer, he gave signs of the dreadful death convulsions.

The diver now felt the need of all his strength, and, holding himself well together with admirable coolness, he redoubled his efforts. The shark's jaws opened and shut like a large pair of factory shears, and had the diver been free from the monster's fins, they would have snapped him in two in an instant. The strong tail beat the water with indescribable fury, and greatly agitated even the surface of the waters. It was the monster's death struggle. Struck to the heart, and weakened by the loss of blood, it soon rolled over dead.

The diver, saved almost by a miracle, quickly rose to the surface of the water, where his companions were anxiously waiting for him. His copper head-dress was slightly damaged, and his strength nearly gone; but beyond that he had suffered nothing from the fearful encounter. A few minutes later a number of sharks were upon the scene, attracted by the blood of their dead companion, and without ceremony they fell upon the inert mass, and began fighting for the pieces. —The Independent.

It often happens, in life, that a word or an action is forced into a wholly unlooked-for prominence. Who has not been startled or abashed, in a large company, to find his last utterance brought into clear relief by one of those sudden lulls in conversation which so often occur when many people are talking? If it was a foolish or untrue remark, its folly and untruthfulness are sadly exaggerated by the unforeseen and distorted position which they are compelled to occupy. In other ways of life, an accident may force upon the attention of a large public some episode in our careers which we would most of all desire to keep in the background. We greatly prefer to be prepared for emergencies, but they are far more likely to surprise us. The remark we are making when we suddenly discover that we are overheard; the occupation in which we are engaged when a caller surprises us; the temper we are displaying when some great occurrence in our lives, whether mournful or benign, comes swiftly upon us,—all these tests may shake our integrity or shame our self-love, even when they do not quite cast us down. Death itself comes unheralded to half of mankind. What shall we be doing or saying or thinking at that supreme moment? There is only one remedy for these strange surprises in life, with all their distorted perspective and their severity of condemnation. That remedy is, in the words of the old prayer, "always to live in such a state that we may never be afraid to die." This rule applies to living as well as it does to dying. If we constantly try to do right, the collapse of the universe need not frighten us.—S. S. Times.

There is such a thing as living too long. Any man's life is longer than it should be when it is continued by a shirking of duty. Life, like any other treasure, is to be measured in its value by its wise use, rather than by its safe hoarding. When the risk or the expenditure of life is a duty, the poorest thing in the world to do is to give a first place to the desire for prolonged living. Living is very well in its way when a man has a right to live; but every man has reason to be on the watch lest he make living, rather than the right use of his life, the aim of present exertion.—S. S. Times.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Wild Animals of Chester County, Pa.—An inquiry of one of the scholars at Westtown School as to the wild animals, of which their natural history society had observed traces during last winter, brought a letter, from which the following is extracted:—

As students at Westtown are not expected to trap or gun, they do not see quadrupeds nearly so often as birds, with the exception of the numerous Gray Squirrels that spring so nimbly from limb to limb, or frisk about in the pure, white snow, burrowing deep down to find the nuts that lie upon the ground.

I once found a nest of young Gray Squirrels, in the Fourth Month. There were six in the nest, and so thoroughly were they wrapped up in the fibre of which the nest was made, that I fancied it were hardly possible for them to be other than warm. There are also numerous Red Squirrels about these premises. Last summer I was surprised to see them living on good terms with the Grays. Not long ago, we found one of their nests, or rather their abodes, over at the "Old Dam." On examining the cavity in which they were, we found it to be about six feet long and half a foot wide (the hollow of a tree) with a small opening at the top and near the bottom. This was packed full with the fibre off of dead bark, through which mass were winding passages. Imagine what a warm house this would be.

Though I have not had the pleasure of seeing any of them, yet I am told and fully believe, that there are a great many Flying Squirrels on the premises. C. C. B. (one of the teachers) says they are very troublesome about his house. They are very easily tamed and make very nice little pets. Unlike the Red Squirrels, they have very little disposition to bite, but may be carried (after being tamed) in one's pocket, coat-sleeve, or almost anywhere about one's person. When carried in the pocket they sometimes put their heads out but will not often leave the warm retreat.

Foxes thrive on Walnut Hill (on the northern part of the school farm) and are occasionally seen by some of the students. They are often chased by hounds and men.

Skunks, I know, are abundant. Several of them have been killed about the school buildings and the teachers' chickeries, this winter.

One Opossum has also been killed. I do not think the latter are at all numerous.

One Raccoon was observed by myself. It was captured by the men who have been clearing a large tract of woodland just east from here. The Raccoon is a very pretty animal, but quite a dangerous one to attack, as it has very sharp claws and teeth, both of which it uses with great dexterity. Musk-rats are quite abundant and are becoming more and more troublesome every year, as the advancing civilization rather accelerates than retards their growth and spread.

Oil on Water.—Another instance of the marked benefits resulting from the use of oil on troubled seas was afforded by the recent experience of the steamship Werra of the North German Lloyds Line, which was disabled in mid-ocean during her last transatlantic voyage. The steamer had been taken in tow by the Venetian, and all went well until the evening of August 3d, when a strong gale prevailed, and heavy seas were constantly breaking over the bow of the Werra, endangering the tow-lines, and threatening the loss of the tow. The captain of the Venetian caused an oil-bag to be hung from each side of his vessel and dragged some distance astern. The result was almost immediate, and the sea became comparatively smooth around the disabled ship. The officers of the Werra were for some time ignorant of the cause of their relief. At the exchange of signals on the following morning, they reported that after the oil-bags had been hung out, their vessel experienced much better weather, not a drop of water breaking on board, and the ship being in all respects more comfortable.—American.

Mica Mines.—A recent issue of the Montreal Herald contains a communication from Buckingham describing the mica mines near that place, from which it would appear that the Canadian deposits of the mineral are both abundant and of high quality. The mica is found in a ridge of hills, and the deposit is said to consist of some twenty separate veins, all of which yield a uniformly high quality product. At the foot of one of the hills a tunnel has been driven to a distance of about 100 feet. The tunnel has cut five distinct veins, and all the mica is at present obtained from it. The product as taken out is sorted and sent to the cutting-house at Buckingham, the débris being used for fire-proof paint, roofing cement, etc. The mine came under the present control only last spring, since which time the work has been rapidly pushed. It is reported that the product has been shipped to various consumers in Canada and the United States, and has in all cases given excellent satisfaction. Specimens of this Canada mica sent to the Antwerp Exhibition by the former owner of the mine, gained a silver medal, and other samples are now being exhibited at the Colonial Exhibition in England. The extensive use of mica makes a large demand for the mineral, and the increased product following the opening up of a new mica mine will be a source of satisfaction to all consumers.—American.

Care in Convalescence.—No child under twelve should have less than nine hours of sleep. Again, children or youths at school or at work, who are attacked with acute diseases, should not be returned to school or to the work-shop until after complete convalescence; and especially in cases of fever, measles and diphtheria, and all cases where the nervous symptoms have been more or less pronounced.

It is too common to allow such children to go back to school or to work as soon as they are fairly able to be about. But the brain, particularly, after such disturbance of circulation and nutrition, needs rest more than ever. I have seen great evil flow from neglect of this course in many cases. For such children, being unable to study and recuperate at the same time, the general health is consequently lowered, corea and hysteria often follow, and the physical development is impeded.—Dr. Gray in Journal of Insanity.

Perforated Glass.—At a recent meeting of the Industrial Society of Mühlhausen, Alsace, the President reported on the recently invented perforated window-panes, which are said to be admirably adapted to hospital purposes, inasmuch as they admit fresh air while preventing a draught. Each square metre of glass contains 5000 holes, which are of a conic shape, widening towards the inside. Many hospitals have already adopted these window-panes, which are the invention of an engineer of the name of Henkel, and are manufactured at Mühlhausen.

—The Jews of South Eastern Europe.—Much interest has been awakened in Christian circles by a movement towards Christianity in Bessarabia under the leadership of a Jewish lawyer named Joseph Rabinowitz. This movement seems to have had no connection with any of the mission efforts for the conversion of the Jews. An article in The Independent says, some historic light is thrown upon it by the accounts furnished by a special missionary named Faber, sent out by a Leipzig Society. It says:—

"For centuries the Jews of South-eastern Europe were the very petrification of Talmudic legalism, carrying out in its whole length and breadth the injunction of the fathers of the Mishna, to 'make a hedge around the law.' A tendency to a reaction and a dissatisfaction with this legalism finally found expression in the leadership of a prominent Jew named Baal Shem, at the end of last century. And while many of the Jews of Western Europe were following Moses Mendelssohn in his rationalizing 'reformation,' and in the establishment of what is known now as 'modern Judaism,' the opposite tendency gained ground in the East under Baal Shem. His watchword was: 'Our whole lives must be a service of God.' He was successful in his movement, and at the time of his death his followers numbered more than half a million, and at the present time the number of so-called 'Chasidic' Jews (chasid, pious) is three and a half millions, embracing nearly all the Jews of South-eastern Europe. They worship three times a day, and frequently engage in prayer for hours at a time, repeating all the one hundred and fifty psalms, kneeling and moving their bodies upward and downward, their heads striking against their knees, until they faint from exhaustion, or reach an ecstatic state, called by them 'Sibuk,' which is considered to be a state of entire absorption by the divinity. On the great day of Atonement they all dress in mourning and in praying mantles, as a sign of repentance and of their longing for the Messiah. In general, these last are prominent features of their religious life and worship, and go far to explain the success of Rabinowitz's work.

"The successor of Baal Shem is the so-called 'Chief-Rabbi,' a sort of a Jewish pope, whose office is hereditary. Pious Jews from all directions, as far as from China and Morocco, make pilgrimages to his palace, as he is believed to be the mediator between God and man. His 'Peter's pence' amounts to 300,000 rubles annually. Formerly the Chief-Rabbi occupied a palace in Risjin; but this has been destroyed, and he no longer resides there. In 1834 the Russian Government imprisoned the Chief-Rabbi; but his friends opened his prison by means of a 'golden' key, and gave him the chance of fleeing to Austria, and he now occupies a magnificent palace in Sadogora, in Bukovina, the most eastern province of Austro-Hungary.

"The first Christian who was ever admitted to an audience with the Chief-Rabbi, was the missionary Faber, and this special favor was secured to him through a letter from Prof. Franz Delitzsch, of Leipzig, whose defense of the Jews in the famous Tirza-Ezlar trial, in Hungary, has made him the idol of the Jews of Eastern Europe. Faber spoke also of Christianity, of which the Chief-Rabbi had an intelligent view, having been a student at the University of Vienna. He is surrounded, however, by fanatical Jews, who, upon Faber's mentioning the name of 'Christ,' fled from the room. A distant relative of the Chief-Rabbi, who became a Christian, was afterward poisoned.

"The peculiar religious views of this people, especially their earnest expectation of a Messiah, have prepared the way provisionally for the work now being done among them. Reports all agree that it is Professor Delitzsch's Hebrew translation of the New Testament that has been the chief means of directing these thoughts into the right channel. Since 1877, no less than 40,000 copies of this book have been published, the great majority being circulated among the Jews of South-eastern Europe. It is eagerly read, especially in secret. The missionary Faber met with four young men who had omitted the whole translation to memory. It must be remembered that in those districts the Hebrew is not at all a dead language, but is the only idiom used for literary purposes. Twenty papers are published there in classical Hebrew, and more than thirty in the Jargon Hebrew.

"The reception given the preaching of the Gospel in the national form of this movement has been and is wonderful. The first sermon of Rabinowitz was listened to by an audience of 4,000; it was telegraphed to Odessa, and there published, and the last copies of the issue containing the sermon sold for a trouble apiece. The movement is growing steadily and hopefully, both internally and externally."

—Dissenters in Great Britain.—The London Guardian gives a table, showing an increase in the number of dissenters from the Church of England in ten years, from 1,417,790 in 1875, to 1,649,894 in 1885. This is a more rapid increase than the general percentage of growth in the population of the country.

—Catholic Missions.—It is said that a plan is under consideration by the Papal authorities for organizing Catholic Missions in Africa on a very extensive scale.

—Use of Opium.—The Christian Advocate publishes a communication on the use of opium, by an American woman, who states that her attention was especially drawn to the subject, by the bitter opposition to it manifested by a nurse who waited on her during a severe spell of illness. This nurse had been trained in one of the largest hospitals in America, and related many incidents that had come under her notice, of the baleful effects of the use of this drug.

The writer of the article mentions the wife of a clergyman whom she knew, who was an opium-eater, who ruined her life, impaired her husband's usefulness, and wrecked their home by her indulgence in this wretched habit. She would sell her husband's books in his absence, to get money for opium. "Nothing was safe that she could get hold of. No entreaties or prayers availed to cure her, and it was with relief I heard of her death."

"My nurse told me that she was once aroused at midnight to go to a lady who was suffering from the withdrawal of the morphia. The doctor and the husband of the lady had determined to try to cure her. When Miss M. arrived at the house, and was shown to the bedroom, she found her charge swearing and screaming, tearing great handfuls of hair from her head, and behaving exactly like a maniac. Miss M. said to me: 'I have served three years in a hospital where it has frequently been my task to take charge of men in delirium tremens, but I never had an experience equal to the nights and days with this lady. Beautiful, accomplished, a leader in society in one of the largest cities in America, she used language and behaved in a manner that the vilest man I ever saw could not have exceeded.'

In conclusion, she warns her sisters not to touch the drug except under the most cautious medical advice, and to stop its use as soon as possible.

Be Prepared.—No man knows what a day may bring forth; what miseries, what good or what evil, what afflictions, what temptations, what liberty, what bonds, what good success, or what bad success; and, therefore, a man need every day be in the closet with God, that he may be prepared and fitted to entertain and improve all the occurrences, successes and emergencies which may attend him in the course of his life.—*Thos. THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 9, 1886.

IOWA YEARLY MEETING (THE LARGER BODY.)

One of the most important of the subjects that came before this body, which closed its sessions on the 14th of Ninth Mo., was a proposition from one of its Quarterly Meetings, looking towards the establishment of a paid ministry in its limits. It was referred to a committee who made a report which was adopted almost unanimously by a rising vote. The report is as follows:

"The Committee to consider the two propositions from Ackworth in regard to ministry and pastoral care, without a dissenting voice beg leave to submit the appended report.

"1. That it is advisable for each particular meeting to have a regular ministry, and the meetings be encouraged to call and support ministers laboring among them as pastors, as far as in their judgment may seem wise and practicable.

"2. That the Evangelistic Committee of the Yearly Meeting be authorized to provide, as far as possible for the supply of ministers and workers in meetings desiring such help, and that they be instructed to give such pastoral advice and aid to any needy places within their knowledge as the Lord may lead them to see advisable."

The recommendations of this Report opens the way for the introduction of a system of pre-arranged services similar to that which prevails among other professors of Christianity; which, in its practical operation, involves a departure from our principles as to ministry and worship. Although little open opposition was made to its adoption in the Yearly Meeting, yet there were some of the members who mourned over it as an evidence of a falling away from the ancient standard of Truth. One of these, in a letter to the Editor of "The Friend," thus refers to this subject:—

"In some cases many Friends had to submit to things that they could in no way unite with. One was a matter proposed by one of the Quarterly Meetings, in regard to supplying all the meetings with ministers, and their support. Many Friends thought it a plain departure from the order of the Gospel, and entirely at variance with the views and testimonies of Early Friends; but they were overruled and it passed the meeting."

Our correspondent also speaks of the solemnity of the meeting being "too often dissipated by singing; which was frequently called for, even by ministers present."

These statements furnish mournful evidence of the rapid advance of that spirit of innovation which has entered into some parts of the Society of Friends. For we believe that such things could not take place, unless the way had been prepared for them by a serious defection from those principles into which the Spirit of Truth led our early members.

The Committee appointed last year to consider the appeal of San José Monthly Meeting in California, from the action of the Quarterly Meeting that dissolved its organization, reported that Monthly Meetings had a right of appeal in such cases. On account of irregularity in proceedings, the intended appeal of San José Monthly Meeting was dismissed.

Our readers will find in another part of this paper a circular, issued by the sub-committee charged with collecting funds for the erection of the new buildings at Westtown, asking for additional subscriptions, so as to enable the committee to go on with the West wing, designed for the accommodation of the girls.

This subject was referred to in our last number by our friend Samuel Emlen; and we have now received an additional communication from a former scholar, who had felt her residence at the school a blessing to her, and who suggests that all who have been scholars there should contribute to the funds, according to their respective abilities, even if the amount be but small. It does not seem needful to do more than thus to notice the reception of this communication, as sufficient mention of the subject appears in our columns, without its publication.

"War An Unnecessary Evil, Forbidden by Scripture," is the title of a document issued by the Representative Meeting of New England Yearly Meeting (Larger Body); a copy of which has been forwarded to us by the author, Augustine Jones.

It "reaffirms the ancient testimony of the Society of Friends against war," "in the belief that each generation is required to declare and teach the great fundamental doctrines of peace;" and looks towards the gradual abolition of this great evil, through the increasing spread of Christian principles among the people, and the substitution of law and arbitration in place of appeals to force.

The Christian Visitant is the title of a monthly "Undenominational, Evangelical, Temperance, Family paper," published at Emporia, Kansas, by Ezra Lamborn, at 40 cents per annum; the first number of which has been sent to us. It is a small four page sheet, set in solid brevier type.

A second edition of the life of Sarah B. Upton has been printed, and is on sale at the Book Store, No. 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Price, 40 cents.

The communication, "Canadian Friends," in the present issue, will enable our readers to know what has been done thus far, and the present position of the effort to come to an amicable adjustment of the property question involved in the suit of Durland vs. Jones, which has been a source of so much concern and expense to Friends in Canada.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement for Ninth Month, shows a reduction of $10,627,013. Total cash in the Treasury, $463,375,713.

The Treasury Department publishes a statement of the population of the United States, and the net revenue and net expenditures of the Government for the last fiscal year, with the per capita of revenues and expenditures. The population is given at 58,420,000, and the net revenue at $336,439,727, being a per capita of 5.76, or .08 greater than the fiscal year of 1885. The expenditures were $242,483,138,—a per capita of 4.15, or .24 less than that of the previous year.

The Secretary of the Interior is considering a proposition to allow certain Indian tribes in the West the privilege of utilizing the grass upon the surplus lands of their reservations, by allowing them to take cattle from neighboring cattlemen to pasture, the Indians to herd and care for the cattle, and to receive just compensation therefor, but no white men to be allowed upon the reservations. The scheme is warmly endorsed by the Indian Bureau officials, and it is probable that an order authorizing certain tribes to enter into contracts with cattlemen as outlined above will soon be issued.

In the U. S. Circuit Court, at Cleveland, Ohio, held on the 30th of Ninth Month, Judge Weller refused the application of a saloon keeper of Alliance, Ohio, for a preliminary injunction to restrain the village of Alliance from the enforcement of the prohibitory ordinance passed under the Dow law. Judge Weller held "that the Court had no jurisdiction to afford the relief asked; that the ordinance does not conflict with the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States; that the ordinance does not deprive the complainant of his property, and that the ordinance is only a police regulation in the interest of public morals and for the common good." Judge Jackson concurred in the refusal of the application. This was the first case in Ohio under the law, and was watched with great interest.

The largest sale of pine land ever made in the Northwest was consummated on the 25th ultimo, in the transfer of J. S. Pillsbury's entire possessions of the kind to the Grand Haven Lumber Company. The purchase includes 650,000,000 feet of pine timber, most of it lying within a radius of 30 miles of Aitkin, Minnesota.

Quinia, a National Druggists' Association report states, was used in this country during the past year to the total amount of eighty-one and a quarter tons.

A severe shock of earthquake was felt on the 28th of last month, in Charleston, S. C., lasting 1½ seconds. The movement was from north to south, "and shook nearly all the houses in the city, the vibration being very perceptible in wooden houses." A slight shock was felt on the morning of the 1st instant, and several slight shocks were felt during the night at Summerville. Two or three slight tremors were noticed at the latter place a day or two later.

It is reported from Kodiak, Alaska, under date of Ninth Mo. 16th, that Polloff Mountain, 300 miles from that place, was in a state of violent volcanic eruption.

The Tenth Annual Convention of the National Assembly of the Knights of Labor, opened on the 4th instant in Richmond, Virginia. The Convention was called to order by General Master Workman T. V. Powderly. Governor Lee, of Virginia, made an address of welcome, to which Powderly responded. T. V. Powderly was introduced by Frank J. Farrell, a colored member of the delegation, "whose associates refused to take up their quarters in the hotel in which he was refused admission on an equal footing."

The deaths in this city last week numbered 372, being 18 more than last week, and 38 more than the corresponding week last year. Of the above 185 were males and 187 females; 58 died of consumption; 22 of typhoid fever; 20 of marasmus; 17 of debility; 16 of old age; 15 of pneumonia; 15 of diphtheria; 10 of inflammation of the brain and 10 of convulsions.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s 112½; 4's, registered, 129½; coupons, 129½; 3's, 100; currency 6's, 126½ a 134½.

Cotton.—Spinners bought sparingly, on a basis of 9½ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum was quiet at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Titusville, Tenth Mo. 2nd.—Opened at 62½; closed, 63. Highest, 63½; lowest, 62½.

Feed was in fair demand, but business was checked by the light offerings and firm views of holders. Sales of two cars choice bran at $15 per ton.

Flour and Meal.—The situation of the flour market presented no improvement, local trade buying only enough for current requirements, and prices ruled weak. Sales of 125 barrels Indiana, straight, at $4.25; 250 barrels Ohio, straight, at $4.50; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.70 a $4.75; 125 barrels Minnesota, straight, at $4.40; and 500 barrels do. patent, at $4.75 a $4.90. Rye flour was steady, at $3.25 per barrel for choice.

Grain.—Wheat was dull, No. 2 red closing at 82½ cts. bid and 82½ cts. asked. Corn—No. 2 mixed closed at 45 cts. bid and 45½ cts. asked. Oats was quiet at about former rates. No. 2 white, 34½ cts. bid, and 34½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were firm. Extra, 5½ a 5½ cts.; good, 4½ a 5 cts.; medium, 4 a 4½ cts.; common, 3 a 3½ cts.

Sheep were higher. Extra, 4½ a 5 cts.; good, 4½ a 4½ cts.; medium, 3½ a 4 cts.; common, 2½ a 3½ cts.

Lambs, 3½ a 6½ cts.

Hogs were lower. Western, 6½ a 7 cts.; State, 6 a 6½ cts.

FOREIGN. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Chief Secretary for Ireland, has returned to London. It is stated that his experience in Ireland has convinced him that exceptional measures will be necessary to maintain order in the country before 1887.

On the 4th instant, W. E. Gladstone received a deputation of Irish women appointed to present to the Ex-Premier a petition in favor of Home Rule. This document bears the signatures of half a million Irish women.

A terrible explosion occurred on the 2nd instant at Altop's colliery, near Wakefield, Yorkshire. Seven men have been found dead, eight have been rescued and seventeen are missing. In all probability the missing seventeen have lost their lives.

The will of the Duke d'Annamé, bequeathing his great estates at Chantilly, with all their appurtenances, works of art, books and revenues, to the French Institute, in trust for the people of France forever, is dated in 1884. The Duke explains that he wishes to have the transfer made now for the express purpose of avoiding legal hamperings, which might be instituted by claimants or heirs after his death. The gift is accompanied by but one condition, and that is that the property must be preserved intact as it shall be on the day it comes into possession of the trustees.

General Boulanger, desiring to secure from the French Government an appropriation of $25,000,000 for new explosive bombs, recently invited the Budget Committee to witness the experiments he was carrying on in private. It is stated that the Budget Committee were not only highly satisfied and pleased with the results of the experiments, but promised to fully support General Boulanger's demand for the large special appropriation. Truly "war is cruel and you cannot refine it."

In reference to the advice of the Berlin National Gazette that France annex Tripoli, La National says: "We have no concern with Tripoli, and will not go there. Our interests lie in Egypt and nowhere else; and we shall enforce our rights."

General Kaulbars has sent a violent circular to the Russian Counsels in Bulgaria with the request that they inform the people of its contents. The circular accuses the Bulgarians of acts of indiscipline in burning flags and the insignia of St. George. The Bulgarian Government denies the latter accusations. The circular declares that Russia cannot allow Bulgaria to try the kidnappers of Alexander, and that it is impossible to allow Alexander and his family to return to Bulgaria.

Sofia, Tenth Mo. 2nd. The reply of Bulgaria to Russia's demands has been delivered. In it Bulgaria accepts the Czar's terms, provided the independence of Bulgaria is formerly guaranteed.

Sofia, Tenth Mo. 3rd. General Kaulbars having again asked for a reply to Russia's ultimatum, the Ministry to-day, after a long discussion, drafted a reply to the effect that the Bulgarian Government would comply with the demands of Russia to the extent that the constitution and laws would permit. It is expected that when this reply is delivered General Kaulbars will demand a more precise answer.

Prime Minister Tisza, replying to the interpellations for the Government in the Lower House of the Hungarian Parliament, said that Austro-Hungary intended to prevent any single power from establishing a protectorate over Bulgaria. "We want independence among the Balkan States," he continued, "without having any covetous designs towards any of them. No community of interests exists in the Balkans. The Austro-German alliance continues, guarding the mutual conditions of existence without endangering peace. Austro-Hungary will not allow any single power to make armed interference in Bulgaria. Austro-Hungary earnestly intends following this policy during these critical times."

Mail advices from Yokohama, received in San Francisco, says the cholera is raging throughout Japan. The proportion of deaths to cases is very heavy. Between Eighth Mo. 28th and Ninth Mo. 5th inclusive, nine days, 13,348 new cases were reported. The deaths during the same period numbered 8472. Over 65 per cent. of those attacked died. An examination of the wells in Tokio was made, and the water of 740 out of 1177 were condemned as unfit to be used for drinking purposes.

The volcano of Colima, in Mexico, is in eruption for the third time within a year.

Godman, by the late John Carter, small picas, 24 pages. Happy Effects of Religion on the Mind, small picas, 8 pages. Clarinda, a pious colored woman of South Carolina, who died at the age of 102 years, small picas, 8 pages. SOCIETY FOR HOME CULTURE.

The Term for 1886-87, opened Tenth Mo. 1st. While students are received at any time, it is best to enter the classes as soon as practicable. We have had full evidence that many warmly appreciate the aid offered by the Society, through its free library and correspondence with those well fitted to direct and assist in pursuing a course of reading or study at home.

The annual fee is $2.00, and covers all postal expenses. The requirements are few and easily met.

Eighth Mo. 9th, 1838. A precious, good meeting. The dear Master was in the midst and handed through his instrument, Ezra Comfort, a word of tender caution and love to the young people assembled. He referred to the Scripture: "If the Lord be God serve him, but if Baal, then serve him; and believed there were those present who had been tenderly visited, and in part made willing to serve the Lord; but oh! the cross was too great. How did he plead with such to give up and no longer halt between two opinions. Urged us to remember the cross must be borne, if ever the crown is worn. The joys of the righteous were set before us, joys that the world knew not of. He feared, if there was not a yielding, we should be left without the ability to "Strive to enter in at the straight gate."

30th. Deepen me more and more, O Heavenly Father! in true vital religion. Let me never pretend to be what I am not.

Ninth Mo. 4th. Our meeting this morning was small. Greatly did I desire, during our silent sitting together, that though few we might be of that number to whom this precious promise applied, Where two or three are met in my name, there am I in the midst. What a blessed privilege, that He thus condescends to meet with even the few! but in order for this, we must be gathered in his name; or we cannot expect He will own us or favor with his life-giving presence. Under a sense of our wants, my wants, I was led to cry for help and strength.

30th. Attended the North Meeting. It was large, there being a marriage. Our friends S. Bettle, and E. Evans, were engaged in testimony. Elizabeth's seemed much adapted to the occasion, and very good. Samuel's urged the necessity for all to enter into the vineyard and labor, quoting, "He that reapeth receiveth wages, and gathereth fruit unto life eternal." The call was extended to all; and went forth, we read, at the sixth, ninth, and even the eleventh hour. O, how desirous did he seem, that all might be concerned for themselves. There was none of us that had any time to spare; but all should seek to be ready to hear the language: thou shalt die and not live. He revived the saying of the apostle, that there was laid up for him a crown of righteousness, and not for him only, but for all who loved the appearing of the Lord Jesus: what encouragement, he said, to love and serve the Lord!

However tried we might at times feel, we should remember the account of the same apostle, who, when brought to a great extremity exclaimed, "Oh wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" S. B. said, we must be willing to bear our portion of suffering, remembering that even the dear Saviour himself had his season of proving to pass through. And reminded us how often we find Him engaged in prayer! retiring to the sea side, the mountain alone, and even continuing all night in prayer to God. Thus leaving us his example. It was not only those who had just set out who had their trials; but servants who had long followed their dear Master, were ready at times to fear that, "they shall yet one day fall by the hand of Saul." But even for these and for all, there was much encouragement.

Tenth Mo. 1st. Being still in the city, I attended the week-day meeting at Orange Street. After taking my seat and gathering into silence, how was my heart broken and melted under a sense of my undone condition! How the prayer arose for the least crumb of heavenly bread, either immediately or instrumentally, from Him who is the bread of life. But no relief did I seem to obtain till near the close of the meeting; when if dear Wm. Evans had known just how it was with me, he could not have spoken more fitly. He arose with saying, It would be both unsafe and unwise in times of extremity, to cast away our faith and confidence, concluding that none had ever passed through such seasons as these. He brought to remembrance the circumstance of the poor widow, who when called upon to bake a cake for the servant of the Lord, was so closely proved, that there was but an "handful of meal in the barrel, and a little oil in the cruise." And her answer was, "behold I am gathering two sticks, that I may go in and dress it for me and my son, that we may eat it, and die." but the language to her was, fear not, "for thus saith the Lord God of Israel, the barrel of meal shall not waste, neither shall the cruise of oil fail, until the day that the Lord sendeth rain upon the earth." He who was thus able to supply the wants of this poor widow, is as able as ever He was to supply all his hungering, thirsting children. And although He may permit seasons of great drought to overtake, so that we may be ready to conclude we can not live; yet we will find that his covenant is with the night as with the day; and so will He ever be mindful of us. He craved the encouragement of the dear children in an especial manner. This hath been a season ever to be remembered. May I keep the covenant entered into this day with Him who remains to be a prayer-hearing God.

29th. Our Monthly Meeting. An alarm was sounded through our friend R. Scotton, "Woe unto them that are at ease in Zion," &c. And to some who were resting in past experiences, his language was very close. Most feelingly did he plead with such to retrace their steps, let the suffering be what it might. It was an awakening communication.

Twelfth Mo. 1st. Secretly did I crave, that the dear Master would be in the midst of us at our meeting to-day; strengthening each one of us to offer unto Him acceptable worship; for without the help of his Holy Spirit, we are utterly unable to perform this solemn engagement aright. It is an easy matter to sit down in a form of worship; and in doing this we may deceive one another; but we cannot deceive that All-Seeing One, who sees and knows the most secret recesses of the heart. Humbled under a sense of this, this morning, an earnest cry arose to be strengthened to maintain the watch.

First Mo. 20th, 1839. At our meeting we had the company of our friends Christopher Healy, and Robert Scotton, they have just finished a visit to the families of our meeting; through which service, I have understood, dear C. was wonderfully helped. They had a precious little opportunity in our family, and were with us last night; also spent most of the day. Many things which C. related during his stay with us, have made such an impression on my mind, that I desire they may prove as watchwords to me. But when I look at the many snares the enemy is laying for our poor Society, I feel ready to exclaim, who shall stand! Looking and dwelling on these things this eve, has caused feelings of sorrow, accompanied with a secret cry, that the Great Head of the Church may be pleased to preserve his poor little depending children as in the hollow of his most holy hand, till "these calamities be overpast."

Second Mo. 3rd. Being in the city, I attended Orange St. Meeting. A quiet and good one. In the afternoon was at that on Arch St. Here we had the company and labors of our dear friend Daniel Wheeler, from England, now on a religious visit to this country. He was not lengthy in communication; and dwelt upon the true Church of Christ, with the warfare that was to be maintained: not, he said, with "confused noise and garments rolled in blood," but "with burning and fuel of fire." Representing that "the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds; casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ."

4th. Being still in the city, I attended their Quarterly Meeting. We had the company and labors of our friends Daniel Wheeler, and Elizabeth Robson. After a time of precious stillness, dear Daniel arose with saying: He who was pleased in days past to feed the hungry multitude, remains still able and willing to feed his hungering, thirsting children; and would do it in a marvellous manner, if they were only concerned to keep the eye singly staid on Him and Him alone, and thus be often found waiting upon Him. Commending us to "Sanctify the Lord of hosts himself; and let Him be your fear, and let Him be your dread." Here he enlarged in an impressive manner. This communication was followed by a supplication from dear Elizabeth Evans. E. Robson followed her with: "Come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you." She believed there were those present, who had been loudly called upon to come away from following the vain gratifications of this life. The voice had been heard, but there had not been a willingness to obey. How did she plead with these to enter into covenant, even by sacrifice; binding each one as with cords to the horns of the altar, never to be broken. It was a solemn and impressive communication. In the last meeting certificates were read for our Friends. After which the queries with their answers. In regard to the third query, E. Evans and E. Robson were excellent. Upon the subject of dress, E. Evans told us that while it was not religion it was part of our religion; and she believed there could be no advancement made, as long as there was a life in these things, and they were indulged in. She believed we, as a people, were called out of them; so that when any were brought under conviction, did we not see sacrifices of this kind were first made? However lightly some might be esteeming these things, she believed the time would come to such, when they would feel burdened with them. She had witnessed scenes of agony and distress, such have been brought under. When that hour arrived—that honest hour, that dying hour—how little support do these things yield! When she had been called to witness scenes of this kind, how she had desired for some of her young friends, that they might see for themselves, &c. E. Robson followed; quoting, "Open thy doors, oh Lebanon! that the fire may devour thy cedars;" desiring that all which is high and lofty, and that exalteth itself, may be laid low, &c.

A Peep Behind the Curtain at Salt Lake.

BY H. D. J.

"Years ago, in the days of my early manhood, there was a neighbor of ours in an Eastern State who became a convert to the preaching of some stray "apostle" of the Latter-Day Saints. I had heard nothing of him in years; and, in fact, his name had well nigh escaped my memory until, about to make my first visit to Salt Lake, his story was recalled, and I determined to look him up upon my arrival in that city. This was not difficult to do, since, being one of the comparatively few American-born Mormons, he was a man of considerable intelligence, and had early assumed a place of no little prominence among them. I received not only a kind invitation to become his guest, but, indeed, the courtesy was so pressed upon me that I understood to decline would be taken in the nature of an affront."

"Nothing of unusual moment occurred during the first two or three days of my visit; but my host and his family strove by every available means to make my stay as agreeable as possible, evidently intent that I should carry away with me only the most favorable impressions of the city and its customs and its people. Nothing occurred to make me suspect the slightest difference of sentiment between man and wife upon "the peculiar institution" of the Church. My friend was a married man at the time of his conversion to Mormonism, and I found him just as I had known him years before; himself, his wife and one daughter constituting his household."

After spending several days in the city, the writer found by accident, to his great astonishment, that his friend had a second wife and family in another part of the city. The next day after this discovery, when alone with the wife and daughter he frankly told them what he had accidentally discovered, and begged them to tell him, why these facts had been concealed from him, if at heart they sanctioned the deed. He continues his account:—

"Never can I forget the fire that flashed in the eyes of both, as they answered my inquiry. With blazing cheeks, they poured out the story of their shame and suffering in polygamy. Through it all they protested themselves "loyal Mormons;" but my appeal had opened the fountains of their hearts, and their indignation was something painful to witness. I learned that my host had once proposed to bring his second wife to the same house where he had lived for years with his first family; but no threat of husband, no anathema of the Church, availed to persuade this lawful wife to so degrade herself and her legitimate offspring. Here were two women with whom I had been in daily contact, hearing their praises of the Church, listening to their encomiums of their leaders—discovered to be leading double lives; one of open defence of Mormonism, and one of secret animosity to all that distinguishes it before the world."

"Strangely enough, my impressions so derived were soon confirmed and deepened by an interview with a man of education and intelligence, who had been for nearly a score of years intimately connected with the affairs of the Mormon Church as one of its trusted leaders. At the time of my visit to Salt Lake he was involved in a personal controversy with certain other members of the board, and I judged it was a good time in which to learn some of the inside facts of Mormonism. Hardly had I taken my seat in the sleeper at Ogden before the conductor came to me and said: "Do you know Mr. H., formerly one of the apostles of the Mormon Church?" In less time almost than it takes to tell it, I was in conversation with one of the most agreeable gentlemen I have ever met; and he seemed not less pleased to find a sympathetic listener than I to find a ready talker."

This man, while defending polygamy on theoretical grounds, admitted that practically it was destroying the happiness of the home circle; and said that he would at once put away his wives (of whom he had five) were it not that he was in honor bound to them and their children.

"How, then," I asked, "is the present state maintained in the territory? How does it happen that there is so much power in the Church, and such subserviency upon the part of the people?"

"The reason," continues Mr. H., "is not hard to find. The leaders possess all the wealth of the territory and pretty much all the intelligence of the Church. The people are bound by the double chain of poverty and incapacity. Seven-tenths of the people are immigrants, and to this day most of them owe for their passage money. The Church pays their passage, supplies them with tools and implements for labor, but takes their notes for every penny that is advanced. In nine cases out of ten, with tithings and inevitable losses added, the foreign-born Mormon never is able to pay his first debt to the Church; and if he attempts to revolt or leave the territory, he is stripped of everything that he seemed to possess. By far the larger part of our immigrants can neither read or write, and come to Salt Lake without a dollar, loaded with debt for first expenses; and what wonder that they continue for years the blind, obedient servants of a Church which rules their conscience and holds their purse? As for me, I can defy the powers of the leaders only because I have acquired property and am independent. But the average Mormon is poor, and what little he seems to control is his only so long as he remains submissive to the Church."—Condensed from The Independent.

For "The Friend."

Primitive Purity Lost and Regained.

I believe that man was made in a state of purity and goodness, and without any mixture of evil like the natural man now has. But that good and evil were placed before him, and in his reach with the power of choice, as to which to accept and be governed by, and which to reject. And that the same enemy to all good that we now have, was there also; and that he was watchful then, as he now is, to draw away from the good to the evil—from the fruit of spiritual life and light, to the fruit of spiritual death and darkness.

As man was thus placed upon earth in a state of probation, he had the teachings and the commandments of his Maker to listen to and obey, if he chose to do so, and thus still retain his purity and Divine life; or he had the power to listen to the teachings of the evil one, and thus lose his good condition. He preferred to try the experiment of becoming wise in evil, through disobedience to the good, and so lost his primitive purity and the Divine life.

But there was enmity put between the two seeds then; and that enmity still continues; and shows itself in the teachings of the two spirits which are discordant and contrary the one to the other. We may obey the good, and live; or we may disobey and yield to the temptations of the enemy, and die, or lose the immortal life. We become servants to whichever of the two powers we yield ourselves servants to obey, "whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness."

As in the first Adam all have died, and come short of the glory of God; even so, now, in Christ Jesus the second Adam, which never fell, all may be made alive, if they will through obedience accept the terms of salvation which have in great mercy been provided for our restoration to primitive purity. For He came into our sinful world, and still comes into our sinful hearts, to seek and to save that which was lost in the fall. And as it was by disobedience that man lost his primitive purity, and his right to the tree of life, and to the Garden of Eden, and Paradise of God; so it is now by obedience that he is again restored. So now "blessed are they that do his commandments, [not merely hear them] that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city."

Man's salvation is of God, through obedience to the grace and teachings of his Son as inwardly revealed. But his destruction is of himself, by a voluntary obedience to the teachings of the evil one. And the longer we give place to his teachings, and to his influence, either immediately from the evil spirit, or through the instrumentalities of his agents, the greater will be his dominion over us; and the greater will the conflict be in overcoming him. But I do believe there must be a battle fought and a victory gained over the enemy and over the beastly or sinful nature in us, (see Rev. xv. 2,) before the blessed promise of our Holy Redeemer will apply to us, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame and am set down with my Father in his throne."

It appears evident that many of our ancient worthies did overcome the enemy; though they, like our Holy Redeemer, had to endure a great fight of afflictions, and much contradiction of sinners, yet they endured as seeing Him who is invisible. And they were often gathered in their minds, into a sense of the presence of Infinite Purity. Paul fought the good fight and received the crown of life. George Fox had many a sore conflict to endure with enemies, both from within and from without, but he overcame them all; and hence could say, that he had "come up in spirit, through the flaming sword, into the paradise of God, beyond what words can utter: I knew nothing but pureness, innocency and righteousness; being renewed up into the image of God by Christ Jesus; so that I was come up to the state of Adam which he was in before he fell." And he says he "was taken up in spirit to see into another or more steadfast state than Adam's in innocency, even into a state in Christ Jesus, that should never fall. And as people come into subjection to the Spirit of God, and grow up in the image and power of the Almighty, they may receive the word of wisdom that opens all things and come to know the hidden unity in the eternal Being." (Journal, page 91.) This is the height of that primitive purity regained, that was lost in the fall. And why not attainable by all as well as by a few? So, let us press forward towards the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. It is what I have long been striving for. And if not fully attained, the prospect brightens more in view as I advance in age.*

Moses, in speaking of the formation of man, says that God breathed into Adam the breath of life, and man became a living soul. As this "breath of life" made him a living soul, not a mere living body, like an animal without a soul, it seems clear to me that our first parents, while in their primitive purity, had a Divine life, which was lost by disobedience and transgression of the Divine law. But there was, in great mercy, a way provided for the "restitution of all things." And this is by and through Christ, the second Adam, who never fell. So "the first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam became a quickening spirit," to quicken and make alive that which died, and which was lost in the fall. For He came to destroy the works of the devil; and to make reconciliation for the sin and iniquity that had entered the heart of man; and to bring in everlasting righteousness into every individual soul; that Christ might be anointed as the Most Holy, ruling and reigning in our hearts as in the beginning, when man was in paradise and in purity. So now, life and immortality are brought to light by the gospel, which is the power of God unto the restoration or salvation of all who believe enough in it to receive and obey it.

This is nothing short of the kingdom of God, which Christ says is within us. And He taught his disciples to pray that the kingdom of God should come, and that his will should be done on earth as it is done in heaven. If this were the case, we should no longer need to seek abroad for that which may be found at home; nor to be seeking the living among the dead. "The wind bloweth where it listeth." And the natural man may hear the sound thereof, but he cannot tell from whence it cometh. So every one that is born of the Spirit feels the breath of life blowing upon him, but he cannot explain it; yet he knows it is the atmosphere of heaven, and that it makes him a living soul, and a new creature; alive unto holiness and dead unto sin.

If we, as individuals, and as a Church, (for a Church is made up of individuals) were born again—born of the Spirit as well as of the flesh, we would, when assembled for Divine worship, wait with faith and patience, and feel after the atmosphere of heaven, and the breath of spiritual life to arise and breathe upon us. Then our religion would be pure and undefiled. Our meetings for worship would need no musical or attractive sounds, no pre-arranged or systematic services. For the vocal utterances would be in the ability that God giveth; and our ministry would need no extra human education or high-flown culture to make it attractive, so as to draw out the people, and procure for it pecuniary aid. Peter and John were said to be unlearned and ignorant men; inasmuch that the people marvelled at the convincing power of their ministry, and took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus. And if some of our ministers would have less faith in theological training, and more faith in the teachings of our Saviour, the people would again marvel and take knowledge of them, from the lost power which they had regained, that they had been with Jesus and learned of Him. A theological school will fit us for an earthly religion; but it requires a still higher school to qualify us for the courts of heaven—for the general assembly and church of the first born.

If the ministry were restored to primitive purity, it would be a great step towards restoring the churches, and bringing in an everlasting righteousness, which would have a sufficient foundation to stand upon, so as to enable it to stand the storms of time; and not be like it was said of Ephraim and Judah, whose "goodness was as a morning cloud, and as the early dew, it goeth away." So, "let us return unto the Lord; for He hath torn, and He will heal us; He hath smitten, and He will bind us up." And if we as individuals, but more especially as a Church, when assembled for worship, could wait with more faith and patience, and feel more after the atmosphere of heaven, and the breath of spiritual life to arise and to breathe upon us, we should become more glorious in holiness, and witness more of a return to primitive purity in our devotions, and not need singing or outward sounds to gratify the carnal ear. For as the streams of life were more believed in and waited for, the spiritual man would more often feel the waters of life refreshingly to arise in him, as a well of water springing up unto everlasting life. So he would thirst no more for outward things, or outward sounds.

But the enemy, with his outward allurements and fascinating sounds, has come in like a flood in our meetings for worship, and in many other ways. And no human power, unaided by Divine grace, can arrest him. Spiritual wickedness in high places has, in many of our meetings, gained entrance; and like Goliath, of Gath, is ready to defy even the armies of the living God.

This spirit of gospel purity would teach us now, as in the early days of our Society, to avoid hazardous or speculative engagements; and to live within the bounds of our circumstances; and to be just in our dealings, and punctual in complying with our engagements. It would teach us to avoid superfluity in our manner of living, and in the furniture of our houses; and to observe moderation on all occasions. And it would also lead us, as it did our forefathers, into plainness of speech, deportment and apparel. But these wholesome disciplinary restraints that once served to preserve us as a separate people, are now nearly lost sight of in the meetings which I attend. They are nearly all left out of the Discipline, and not regarded. But I suppose in many of the meetings where "The Friend" is received and read, they are still retained, and better regarded. May the blessing of heaven rest upon them!

Where the spirit that first brought us together prevails, how it preserves us from the many financial failures that now so reproachfully beset us, since the fast movements have got in amongst us, and modified Quakerism bears rule. It seems to follow in the same train, and insolvency as to individuals and meetings multiplies so that the credit of Society in places is low. Brethren, these things ought not so to be. For the same spirit that restrains us, and induces us to live within the bounds of our circumstances, would also teach us to live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world; and to do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with our God. So that we could look forward for the blessed hope of a spiritual revival, which would supercede the boasted revival of animal warmth. But let us remember, that the same spirit which leads astray in religious things, will, if we follow it, lead us too fast for our abilities in worldly things also. For it is,

"Like a comet's wandering light;
Eccentric, ominous and bright."

And many are following its pernicious and deusive ways, by reason of whom the ways of truth are evil spoken of.

Health of Sioux Indians.

The Herald of Health publishes the following letter, from Red Cloud, the head chief of the Ogala Sioux. It was written in response to a request for information.

Pine Ridge Agency, Dakota, July 9th, 1886.

Dr. M. L. Holbrook.—Dear Sir: Your request of the 3d inst. came to me yesterday by mail, and while I cannot comply with your wishes in full, in part I will try to do so.

As to the Indian Chiefs. Many of the older ones are dead and gone to the land in which their fathers live. Chief Sitting Bull is living at Standing Rock Agency, and Chief Spotted Tail is dead. I myself am getting old, and the fires of youth begin to burn low in the eyes that were once quick to discover the approach of an enemy or the presence of game.

You inquire after the health and working habits of my people. As to the health of the Indians on this reservation, it compares now favorably with that enjoyed by them before being placed on reservations. An almost entire change in their manner of living when first adopting the habits of their white brethren caused much disease among them. The Indians were not accustomed to the meat of domestic animals; they lived upon the flesh of the buffalo, antelope, deer, bear, &c., and lived and slept in the open air of the wild prairie, and were a hardy race, standing an immense amount of exposure, which was to them, then no exposure. When the clothing of the white man, his diet, and living in houses was adopted, it was an entire revolution in the habits of Indian life, and such a revolution necessarily induced an accompanying enervation of the Indian constitution. But these causes are now passing away, and the former Indian hardihood is again becoming apparent. Our population is not on the increase, as the last census of my people at this place shows a material falling off, not induced only by death, however, as many of them have seen proper to change their location to other agencies.

As to the working habits of my people. When it taken into consideration that only a few years ago the Indians of the Northwest knew nothing of work as understood by the white man, I am gratified to bear testimony that their advance in this line of civilization has been satisfactory beyond the expectations of many. In agriculture and manual labor the Indian is on the advance, though in many ways he labors at a great disadvantage. The opinion among Government contractors, that anything is good enough for an Indian, has not become wholly obsolete. Many of them are hauling freight for the Government, for merchants and for other parties, and many more of them are tilling the ground under the instruction of white farmers, and are advancing in the modes and manners of civilization.

There are many things the Indians yet need, and which have been promised by their white brethren, and I hope and believe their advancement in the near future will be much more rapid, satisfactory and permanent. The former agent at this place was highly objectionable to my people, and his removal gives us much satisfaction. He was much self-willed in his disposition, and his ruling was law for the Indian, and he attempted to make it so for the Great Father at Washington, when another, and I hope a better, man was sent to us to take his place.

There are things we yet would be glad to have from the Great Father, and to which we think we are entitled, and some time soon it has been proposed to hold a council of red men at this place, composed of the entire Sioux population, and properly present our wants, as well as our complaints, to the Great Head of the white man's Government.

As said before, I am growing old, and my people cannot much longer have the counsel and advice of their old chief. Before "passing over the river" it would be so good to me to know that my people were contented, prosperous and happy, with good homes, little farms, plenty of ponies and happy families. For myself, I am not selfish enough to have much thought for the little while I have to stay. Any sacrifices I can make for my people will be a pleasure; but it would be a great consolation to my spirit when it takes its flight to its Fathers, to carry with it the intelligence that all the Sioux people were comfortable, happy and contented.

Assuring you I am the white man's friend,
I am truly,
RED CLOUD,
Chief of Sioux Nation.

The Last Record.—Josiah Quincy, formerly President of Harvard College, lived to be ninety-two years of age. He had kept a journal for many years. He was accustomed to sit in the morning in a large chair with a broad arm to it, which served as a desk, upon which he wrote his diary. On July 1st, 1864, he sat down in his chair as usual. His daughter brought his journal. He at first declined to undertake his wonted task, but his daughter urged him not to abandon it. He took the book and wrote the first verse of that grateful hymn of Addison:

"When all thy mercies, O my God,
My rising soul surveys,
Transported by the view, I'm lost
In wonder, love and praise."

The weary head dropped upon the bosom. The volume was ended. The aged pilgrim's course was finished.—The Presbyterian.

A Christian when bereft of the quickening influence of Divine grace, is the most mournful of all earth's views.

CONTENT.

"I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content."—Phil. iv. 2.

I have I learned, in whatsoever
State, to be content?
I have I learned this blessed lesson,
By my Master sent,—
And with joyous acquiescence
Do I greet his will,
Even when my own is thwarted,
And my hands lie still?

Surely it is best and sweetest,
Thus to have Him choose,
Even though some choice I've taken,
By this choice I lose.
Folded hands need not be idle,—
Fold them but in prayer,
Other souls may toil far better
For God's answer there.

They that reap receive their wages,
Those who work, their crown,
Those who pray, throughout the ages
Bring blest answers down;
In "whatever state" abiding
Till the Master call,
They at eventide will find Him
Glorified in all.

What though I can do so little
For my Lord and King,
At His feet I sit and listen,
At His feet I sing,
And whatever my condition,
All in love is meant;
Sing, my soul, thy recognition!
Sing, and be content!

THE BALANCE.

He counted out the clinking coin,
And heaped it shining in the scale.
"A very goodly pile!" said he,
"These figures tell a pleasant tale."
And smiled to see the evening sun
Burn redly on the coin he spun.

"You are not covetous, good dame,
Else had you never seen my gold,
And yet I trow you scarce would scorn
This gleaming heap, if truth were told."
She laughed and shook her proud young head,
"A goodly pile, indeed!" she said.

"You love your yellow treasure, too,
I know, for—hark!" her fair cheek glowed,
"I, too, have weighed my growing wealth—
The scale those selfsame numbers showed.
Yours is a pretty sum, and round,
Yet I can match it, pound for pound."

"Forsooth!" he cried, in merry scorn,
"Come, prithee bring the riches out,
That we may weigh them, 'pound for pound,'
And prove your word, beyond a doubt,
Unless so locked away they be
That you yourself have not the key!"

"Nay, friend," she laughed, with happy eyes,
I keep my treasures safely hid,
But not within the moldy ground
Or underneath an iron lid.
I count it secretly apart,
And wear it always next my heart."

She caught her baby from the floor,
A creeping, cooing, dimpled thing,
That struggled in its mother's arms
To reach the gold, with lusty spring,
And habbled at the dazzling sight,
A wordless language of delight.

She pressed the velvet cheek to hers,
And kissed the silken sunny head.
"Come, are you ready? shall we weigh
The treasure, pound for pound?" she said,
And then with tender triumph smiled,
And in the balance laid her child.

If thou must be brought down, and crucified, and perish in the dead Adam, it is only that thou mayest be reproduced, and elevated, and made joyful in the living Jesus.

Oliver Sansom.

The imprisonment for more than two years, alluded to in the last number, was on a suit of James Anderton for tithes. Oliver was sent to prison on the last day of the year 1669. How he was favored there with the rich incomes of the love of God has already been mentioned. While there he wrote a short epistle to Friends which contains such excellent advice, that it is here inserted:—

"Let every one of you be diligent to follow your own business in the fear of God, and meddle not with that wherein you are not concerned; and although your hands are employed in your labor, let your hearts be after the Lord, meditating continually on his goodness and his large loving kindness and his tender mercies, wherewith He visits us morning after morning, and evening after evening, and also at noonday; He hath never been wanting to us to do us good. Oh! that the sense of the rich love of our God might always remain upon our spirits, that as his tender mercies are daily renewed unto us, so our thanksgiving and sincere obedience might be returned unto Him from the bottom of our hearts, which is his due for evermore. Oh let us never forget the Lord our God, who hath been so good to us, but let Him be always the first in our thoughts at our uprising, and the last at our lying down, and let our meditation be of Him all the day; for from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same the Lord's name is to be praised. He alone is worthy of all, who is over all, King of kings and Lord of lords, who is able to do for us far more abundantly than we can ask or think; to Him be the praise and honor ascribed, for His is the kingdom, the power and the glory for evermore. Amen.

Reading Gaol, 7th of Ninth Month, 1670."

In a letter to his wife, he cautions her to maintain the testimony against tithes, and at the same time to see that nothing is done from a merely contentious or covetous spirit. He says:—

"I desire thee to observe when any corn is marked or set out for the priest thou be sure to go, before they do fetch it away, and set it, and unmark it, and this will stand as a faithful testimony for the Truth, although they steal it away afterwards, and see that thou do unmark it, and in the authority of Truth tread the pope's marks under foot openly. But take heed and keep low in your minds; that in the Spirit of Jesus, you may stand as witnesses for his pure Truth in this your day, in meekness and humility, and in the pure fear of the Lord will your testimony be acceptable unto Him; and watch against that spirit that would desire revenge, or use force or violence to keep it through covetousness; and let all that you do be done in the obedience of Truth, and for no other end than to glorify the Lord our God, and that our testimony may be acceptable in his sight."

James Anderton showed his enmity by having Oliver excommunicated for not attending his place of worship, and then endeavored to prevent persons from dealing with him, or working for him, threatening them with prosecution before the ecclesiastical courts if they should so do. And in other ways he persecuted his upright neighbor. Oliver was concerned at different times to plead with him, and warn him of the consequences of going on in his evil course. A part of one of his letters follows, which is a good specimen of honest, yet affectionate plain dealing.

"James Anderton, I have considered of thy warning or rather threatening of me yesterday. And in the consideration thereof, there did arise a word in my heart, as a warning from the Lord to thee; that thou take heed what thou doest unto me; for the Lord Jesus the righteous judge, in the dreadful day of account, will reckon it as done unto himself. Because He, by his pure light hath let me see, that the work and ministry which thou, for filthy lucre's sake, art crept into, is not of God, neither wast thou led into it by the good Spirit of the Lord, but by the contrary spirit, which doth always resist the Spirit of God, and despiseth his light in the conscience. And the Lord hath not only let me see this; but hath raised me up to bear a testimony for his Truth, against thy deceit and hypocrisy. And this is to certify thee, in God's fear, from my very heart, that I cannot, neither dare I, pay the wages, which unjustly thou doest claim, for fear of offending the Lord God, who hath given me life. I tell thee plainly, I had rather die the sharpest death that can be invented, than wilfully to grieve the good Spirit of the Lord and rebel against his light in my conscience.

"Therefore in tender love to thy soul, I advise thee to be warned and to take heed what thou doest; and repent and turn to the Lord and obey his light in thy conscience, whilst his Holy Spirit striveth with thee; lest thy day pass over and thou be cut off, and there be no remedy for thee. Written by one, unto whom, through the mercy of the Lord, it is given on the behalf of Christ, not only to believe but willingly to suffer for his sake. O. SANSOM."

After Oliver Sansom had been in prison more than two years, a declaration came forth from the king to suspend the penal laws, and thereupon many who were in gaol on account of religion were set at liberty. Of about 80 Friends then in Reading gaol, all were liberated but Oliver who was still detained on the priest's suit for tithes. The priest had before stated, that although he had been the means of putting Oliver into prison, yet he was now kept there by the writ of excommunication, which was not under his control. But when that was removed by the king's act, he still refused to release his prisoner.

But way was made for his release in an unexpected manner. On the very day that the other Friends were discharged from prison, and Oliver was left alone, James Anderton "was smitten by the Lord," with a strange and very suffering disease, which in about six weeks ended his life,—"the Lord," says Oliver, "having made him an eminent example to all hard-hearted persecutors; who I heartily wish may consider his end and take warning thereby in time." On the death of the priest, Oliver was set at liberty.

The widow of the priest and a dissolute son, who had studied law, still endeavored to collect the old bill of tithes from Oliver Sansom, and harassed him with legal proceedings for nearly a year, in the course of which he was very unjustly treated by the mayor of the town before whom the proceedings were had, and committed to prison where he remained about twenty-three weeks. But the mayor was deposed on some other account, and all his acts declared invalid, so that Oliver was once more set at liberty. Before this occurred, he had written to the priest's widow, telling her that he dared not send her any money, be it ever so little, "for I am convinced and certainly persuaded and satisfied in my conscience, that if I should do such a thing, I should sin wilfully against the Lord, and bring condemnation upon my own soul."

In connection with this testimony, may be mentioned his refusal to employ an attorney in his own defence in his numerous appearances before the Court; for the reason that the ground of his refusal to pay tithes was a conscientious conviction that they did not belong to the Christian dispensation; and that an attorney who did not share that conviction could not rightly defend his case.

For "The Friend."

A few years ago our quiet little meeting of Weston, Morrow County, Ohio, was visited by strangers and others calling themselves Friends, with authority and encouragement from prominent members, and also from the Yearly Meeting itself, to hold series of meetings. The exercises and innovations that followed were so similar to those in other places, and so well known that they need not be mentioned here. Such proceedings were a matter of alarm and surprise to some of us, and with which we could not comply. There were many new members received, and their meetings reported up as a great success. Now, Ninth Month, 1886, they themselves have ceased to keep up their meetings at Weston, from annoyances springing up among themselves. The reader can form his own conclusions; yet it seems to me that similar results will ultimately follow the same course of procedure in other places. With kind regards for all,

For "The Friend."

"Oh! that they were wise, that they understood this, that they would consider their latter end."—Deut. xxxii. 29.

In offering a few particulars in the life of the late Sarah Fisher who died at Roseville, Cork, Ireland, Seventh Mo. 15th, 1886, aged about 63 years, it is not to extol the creature, but to exalt and magnify the goodness and faithfulness of Israel's unslumbering Shepherd, whom she loved, and endeavored to serve and follow; and whose Grace enabled her to pass through dangers and difficulties, and to adhere to those principles of Truth professed by the Society of Friends which she loved and lived in.

Hers was a life of more than ordinary variety and experience. She was born in the city of Cork, of worthy parents, and one of a family of 17 children. On leaving the parental roof on her marriage with Abraham Fisher, the change from a large and populous city to a small seaport town at the mouth of the beautiful river Blackwater, (the Avenmore of Spencer,) then to a country home opposite the sea, then to an inland village on a railroad, extended her knowledge of human life. Afterwards, with her 9 young children, she undertook a long sea voyage of thousands of miles to an unknown and undeveloped province in the Argentine Republic, S. A. It was a trial of faith and courage, which she nobly got through, joining her husband there as one of the pioneers of that Southern land. After spending a few years of usefulness there, she had another long sea voyage with her husband and family from the river Platte to New York. She, with them, settled in eastern North Carolina, and a few months since, owing to failing health, she again took a sea voyage to her native land.

In a letter written on board the "Servia," when nearing the Irish shore, she says, "I feel contented, and my thoughts turn to Him who has been with us so far in crossing the perilous waters. May He never leave or forsake me or mine! One of the officers told me I might go 20 passages one after another and not have such a one as we have had, they are uncommon. Cheer father up, I wish I was able to help him, but he knows who to go to in the hour of need; and for my dear children, may each of you choose some portion of the day for retirement; shut out from the world in silence and alone, turn inward. Oh! it would be well spent time."

On arriving in her native land, she was tenderly nursed, and had good medical advice, but did not gain in strength. Hopes were, however, entertained that she might be spared a little longer. After a few weeks she wrote, "I feel a little better to-day. A good nurse is a grand thing to have in a sick room. I slept so much better last night, I do hope I am on the mend. Before rest, I asked the Lord, if consistent with His divine will, to grant me a little more strength. He knew how weak I was, and I craved a good night's rest. When I woke this morning, I felt my feeble prayer was answered. I hope father is not very much cast down. Tell him to cheer up, and my girls must do their part to carry a cheerful look, it does wonders." The next day, she expressed a wish to her sister "that she was gone from suffering," and asked her not to be trying to keep her, as she was longing to be gone "as the gates of Heaven were open for her." As the two doctors stood at her bedside, one of them said he was sorry to see her so poorly, she said, "I don't want to live, and if you saw what I saw you would like to come. The angels are waiting for me;" and spoke of the glory beyond which she was about to enter. Her brother and brother-in-law, standing near the door, she called them by name and kissed them, saying "Farewell; farewell; don't cry. I am very happy, very happy, sit down, we will be silent for a short time." The day before she died, another brother came to see her, and she said, "I will see glorious sights to-morrow." On asking to have the pillow raised, she said, "a little more; I want to see the green fields." All was peace and calm, not a cloud to intervene, apparently no pain, but such a weary look. She was confined to bed two days before she died. No complaining or regret to be anywhere but where she was, ever fell from her lips. She breathed her last without a struggle, at five minutes to ten p. m. on the 15th of Seventh Month.

She was a diligent attender of our religious meetings, and reverently concerned therein to wait upon the Lord, bringing her children with her, from their very tender years; and when away from Friends, kept up meetings in her house for the family and others, to which strangers often came. She loved to read the Holy Scriptures in private as well as to have daily family reading, also the perusal of old Friends' books, and to read for others. She was a dutiful wife, a fond and judicious mother, hospitable and kind, with the law of kindness on her lips. Unselfishness and resolute self-denial were marked traits in her character. She was a thrifty housewife, an excellent nurse, taxing her strength to tend on the sick and suffering, administering freely her simple remedies to them. Thus, dear reader, did she pursue the even tenor of her way, conducting herself wisely amongst the varied peoples and conditions of life where her lot was cast, looking unto the Lord Jesus, her all sufficient helper and Saviour, and was enabled to bring forth the peaceable fruits of righteousness, and to be gathered home like a shock of corn fully ripe, led along by God's providence and conducted safely back again to the land of her birth. Little did she know as she sat on the deck of the tender, ploughing the still waters so familiar to her in by-gone years, after completing the voyage across the mighty deep so favorably, that her life's voyage was so nearly ended, and that she was so near the haven of eternal rest, so near a transfer from earth's cares and sorrows to the "Celestial Country," none of whose inhabitants can say, "I am sick," "where tears are wiped from every eye, and sorrow is unknown." So, dear brethren and sisters, let us take fresh courage, faithfully to pursue the path of duty and to follow on to know the Lord. "Verily, there is a reward for the righteous." To God, only wise, be all the praise.

Megessa, Ninth Mo. 30th, 1886.

If a man cannot do his day's work, in whatever line he labors, without the lashing of his physical powers by a nerve or a brain stimulant, or without the deadening or the numbing of his senses by a narcotic or an anodyne,—so that he will lack a full consciousness of the fatigue to which he is subjecting himself, he is using to-morrow's strength for the work of to-day; and he must expect the consequences accordingly. He is bankrupting himself as surely as the foolish boy or the foolish girl who squanders the surplus income that ought to form the reserve fund of maturer life; and he has, for his equally foolish course, no such excuse of ignorance as the inexperienced youth might proffer.—Selected.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Destruction of Timber by Fungi.—Fungi are leafless and flowerless plants, destitute of green, whose function is to undo and return to the air and soil the materials contained in plants more highly organized. More than 50,000 species have been described. The destructive part of a fungus is the thread-like filament of white cells, such as may be seen branching over the under surface of planks or timber, where sufficient moisture is present. This penetrates the substance of the wood, destroys its strength, and prepares it for crumbling into pieces. The essentials for its growth are moisture, air and warmth. Even what is called dry-rot in timber cannot commence where the wood is kept perfectly dry.

Hemlock, white pine, yellow pine, oak and other kinds of wood each have their peculiar enemy among the fungi, to whose attacks they are peculiarly liable.

The loss occasioned by these destroying plants to railroad ties, bridge timbers, &c., is very great, requiring their frequent renewal.

Wood kept perfectly dry will last almost indefinitely, as is shown in the roofs of ancient buildings; and also when submerged in water, as in the piles for foundations of bridges; because there the air is kept from it, which is necessary for the growth of fungi, and for the formation of the new compounds which are generated when the former elements of the wood are decomposed.

China Grass-Cloth.—an article in Chambers' Journal says: "The material of which this is made, is the fibre of a species of nettle, which is free from the stinging properties of some of the nettles. It is cultivated in China in large quantities. The nettles are cut about the time of seeding, bleached by exposure to moisture and sun, and indeed treated somewhat as the stems of flax are to separate the inner fibre from the outer bark. A method of effecting this by the use of steam has been recently proposed and bids fair to be useful. Heretofore the preparation of the fine silk-like fibre has been a Chinese secret, not known to the outside world.

The cloth made from this fibre is very beautiful, being remarkable for its brilliant gloss and peculiar transparency; and is also extremely strong and durable. Belting made of the fibre has been found to bear about double the strain of leather.

Diatomite.—This earth, composed of the fossil shells of diatoms, has been extensively used for the manufacture of dynamite, which consists of nitro-glycerine rendered more safe for handling by admixture with this porous body. Large deposits of the mineral have been discovered in the island of Skye.

Sulphate of Iron, or Green Vitriol, as it is commonly called, has the power of destroying the fertility of the spores of fungi. On this account it has been recommended as a preventive of potato disease, which is caused by a fungus; and also as a remedy for mildew in wheat.

Protection from Smoke.—If a wet handkerchief is tied over the mouth and nostrils, a person can pass unharmed through smoke so dense as to suffocate him without this protection.

Earthquake.—"In the many facts which have been recalled by the recent earthquake, there is one of which I have seen no notice. As the result of my own personal knowledge and observation it is here given. In the hamlets and small villages in the earthquake districts of South America, the walls are built of slight materials, and so contrived that, if they fall, they will fall outwards from the foundations. The roof is thatched upon cane or other light wood, and even if it fall upon the inmates of the house, might scratch, but would not kill. Of course these remarks refer only to the habitations of the peasantry and poorer classes in country districts. Yet my recollection of larger cities and towns is that tall and heavy buildings are not frequent, and that the best residences were spread over the ground, rather than carried up into the air. My bedroom in a Lima hotel was on the ground floor. These recollections are of many years ago, and things have undoubtedly changed very much since. But the impression which, as a boy, I brought away, was that the buildings were like nine-pins—not calculated to resist a shock, but ready to be "set up" again after a fall.

It has often been observed that nothing can remove the dread of earthquakes. Experience but increases the terror. I recollect seeing people start with fright and turn pale when no shock perceptible to me had occurred. But the nerves of residents in regions subject to earthquakes are so susceptible to terror that the slightest jar causes fright. A chair overturned will cause the inmates of a house to spring to their feet or bound from their beds. Precautions against earthquakes there are none, except as above noted. And they are, of course, but of limited application. Happily for the inhabitants of the earth, its surface is, for the most part, solid. Yet, while the supplementary partial tremblings are keeping the scene of the recent disaster still in fear, one cannot help wondering what would befall our large Northern cities in a like case. The edifices ten or twelve stories high—many of which are ready to fall at any time—and some of which have partially fallen while being built—what would become of them if visited by such a catastrophe as has come upon Charleston?"—H. H. in Public Ledger.

Items.

—Horse-Racing and Gambling.—The Christian Advocate thinks that the attraction of horse-races is not so much, to many, in the fast horses, as in the betting and gambling which is an almost invariable attendant on such exhibitions. As confirming this view, it mentions that in Paris some persons have found amusement in trying the speed of snails. A lighted candle is placed at one end of a long, smooth board, and two snails at the other end. As soon as the room is darkened the snails start for the candle.

—To all those who are lovers of good order and sobriety in the community.—In view of the enormity of the traffic in intoxicating drinks and the alarming proportions which the whole liquor interest now assumes, more especially that phase of it which is exhibited in the large increase in number of drinking-saloons in our cities and larger towns, many of which present attractions calculated to entice the unwary and the youth from sobriety and virtue, we feel something of a duty incumbent upon us to endeavor to call the attention of all who are interested in the moral and religious welfare of the community to the individual responsibility resting upon every person holding the right of elective franchise, and the importance of his vote in the coming election; and we make the appeal to these, that in no case may you give encouragement to, or cast your vote for, any candidate for official position,—more especially for a place in any legislative assembly,—who is not known to be in favor of legislation for the suppression of this great evil, and who will not use, conscientiously, all proper means to have it eradicated.

We are impressed with the thought that there is need now in our legislative halls of sterling men—men of pure motives—those who in their daily lives are examples of integrity and virtue, and who are known to be free from any participation in, or any complicity with, the liquor interest.

Our mothers, wives, sisters, and friends may be influential with sons, husbands, brothers, and friends, and in our solicitude for the general good we ask you for your influence and your efforts to aid in the removal of this social evil, which in its magnitude now threatens the prosperity, the happiness, and even the safety of society.

Let us see that our individual duty is performed in this important issue.

On behalf of the Executive Committee of the Temperance Association of Friends, JABEZ WOOD, Chairman.

ANN WOOLMAN, Secretary.

—The Pennsylvania Seamen's Friend Society.—This Society organized in 1843, seeks to improve the temporal, social and religious condition of the sailors. It provides a "Sailors' Home" at 422 S. Front St., where those who are returning from voyages may find comfortable quarters, free from the temptations to which they are exposed in many other lodging-houses. The number of boarders received during the year 1885 was 614.

Fifty-two libraries for the use of seamen have been placed on board ships during the past year; and a large number of tracts and bibles and testaments have been distributed.

—Nonconformists Voting at Church Meetings.—The Independent contains the following item; in reference to which it might be argued, that if people pay tithes, they have a right to vote.

"It is well known that the English State Church theory assumes that the Church is for all the people, and the imposition of tithes rests on this view. But the Nonconformists have so completely withdrawn from the Establishment that their right of representation in its administration is seldom asserted. A curious case occurred lately at Chudleigh, South Devon, where the rector proposed to have a surpliced choir:

'It appears that the Bishop's levee had been obtained, and that the vicar held a meeting which negated the proposition, several Nonconformists voting, although appealed to to abstain. The same thing happened in another parish. Everything was ready for a surpliced choir; the majority of Churchmen favored it, but at the Easter vestry, which was attended by many who hardly ever entered the church door, and by some dissenters who never do so, the project was defeated. The local preacher at the meeting-house was prominent in the loud No! which went up from these non-communicating Churchmen.'

The rector of the church indignantly asked: 'I should like to know what Nonconformists would say if Churchmen had the indecency to interfere with chapel arrangements and trust-deeds? It is a "pleasing fiction" that supposes Nonconformists to be earnestly concerned in Church matters once a year; they may have the legal right, but it is an intolerable interference."

—Religious Awakening.—There has been, it is stated, a great awakening among the Boers (Dutch settlers) of Natal, South Africa. They have been so busy with prayer-meetings that the worldly have complained that they have spoilt the annual races. The leader among the converts says he can count over two hundred in his sparsely settled district, who have experienced a change of heart. The work was a very quiet one, beginning without the agency of evangelistic meetings. Those awakened showed great anxiety for the heathen Kaffirs, and many natives have been converted.

—Westtown Boarding School.—The Summer Session closed on Fifth-day, Ninth Month 30th. The graduating class consisted of eight—five of whom were boys and three girls. The exercises consisted of essays delivered by the graduates, the reading and handing to them their diplomas, and an address by one of the teachers. There were many of their friends in attendance, including a number of the Committee; and everything was conducted in a quiet, orderly manner, befitting a school under the care of the Society of Friends. The health of the school during the session has been remarkably good.

At a meeting of the Committee held the following day, it was stated that there was some probability that the heating and lighting apparatus would be in such a state of readiness as to permit the opening of the winter session in the new buildings. It was thought desirable to open there if practicable; and the discussion of the subject led to authorizing the Building Committee, in conjunction with that on Household arrangements, to postpone the date of opening for a moderate period, if such postponement would render it practicable and prudent to begin the session in the new buildings. These committees were directed to duly notify parents of pupils and all concerned of the time agreed upon.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 16, 1886.

We have received two letters giving some account of the late Western Yearly Meeting (Smaller Body) held near Plainfield, Indiana, and commencing on the 10th of Ninth Month.

In addition to the receiving and replying to epistles from other Yearly Meetings, reading and answering the queries, and other business which regularly comes up at the annual assembly, there was a report from a committee which had been appointed several years before, on account of the division which had taken place in Western Yearly Meeting, to consider the case of those Quarterly Meetings which were not in unity with their Yearly Meeting. One letter says: "It was finally decided with entire unanimity to testify that they had so far departed from the established doctrines and testimonies of the Society, as to forfeit their right to recognition as Friends' meetings."

A committee was appointed to visit subordinate meetings and families as way might open for it.

"A very friendly and well-written epistle" was offered to the meeting from a "Hicksite" meeting in Ohio, which was returned "with a kind and respectful notice that we could not entertain it without a change upon their part."

"The meetings for worship on First-day, before and after noon were large and orderly, and we thought very profitable seasons.

"Great harmony and love prevailed throughout, and we felt thankful indeed for the evidence afforded of the presence and help of the Great Head of the Church."

We learn that there is some prospect of an amicable adjustment of the lawsuit in regard to the Sugar Grove Meeting-house. The subject is in the hands of committees of the respective Meetings for Sufferings, who have had several conferences, and "seem to be nearing each other with their different plans."

Western Yearly Meeting (Larger Body) met on the 17th of Ninth Month. A large number of ministers from other Yearly Meetings were present. As some of these were known to be in sympathy with the use of the ordinances (so-called) of Water Baptism and the Supper, some uneasiness was manifested on that account. The Star and Crown says, "The Meeting decided not to read the credentials of Noah C. McLean, but allowed the reading of the minutes of others whom it was afterward learned were in the habit of partaking of the outward Supper and teaching and participating in the ordinance of Water-Baptism."

A minute introduced from the Representative Meeting, "directing that the minutes of ministers who practice and advocate the ordinances should not be read in the subordinate meetings," led to considerable discussion. It was referred to a committee, who at a subsequent sitting made a report favoring the adoption of the minute. This was largely united with in the Yearly Meeting, but strongly opposed by a smaller, yet considerable number. It was finally concluded to lay aside the report without either adopting or rejecting it.

This action of the meeting, which practically leaves the door open for the labors and teaching of ministers who have ceased to hold the distinctive views of Friends, must have been a great trial to the more conservative members, and strongly shows the rapid progress of the departure from our ancient principles. We do not see how a body of Friends can refrain, when such an occasion as this presents, from bearing a testimony against error, without losing ground, and conveying to its members the impression that the points at issue are of little importance.

The Editor of the Star and Crown quotes with approval from the Indiana Christian Advocate (Methodist) the query—"Would it not be better for any member of a church whose views have undergone so radical a change, as to put them out of harmony with the traditions of that church, to quietly seek a home in some other communion, rather than stir up strife within?" and he adds, "We candidly believe the advice of our Methodist editor would be the thing to adopt."

We also believe that the course thus advised is the correct one to pursue; and that the advice applies not only to advocates of the ordinances, but to those who have in other respects departed from our fundamental doctrines, especially to those who cannot be satisfied that our religious meetings should be held in a manner consistent with our principles, and that the exercise of the ministry should be in accordance with the views we have ever maintained, of its being under the immediate control and direction of the Head of the Church.

The number of members of Western Yearly Meeting reported was 13,038, of whom 3,517 were between the ages of 6 and 21.

A Friend in Ohio has forwarded an account of their late Yearly Meeting, from which the following information is derived.

The meetings on First-day were as usual large, more than the house would hold being there. They were both good meetings, being unusually quiet for such occasions, when such a mixed multitude is present. Several lively testimonies and prayer offered.

Second-day. The representatives were all present but one, who was prevented by sickness. The attendance of five Friends from Canada Yearly Meeting, being a part of a committee appointed on the subject of correspondence with Ohio, was minutated. Epistles were read from Western, Iowa and Kansas Yearly Meetings. The committee on the scattered remnants of Friends reported, and recommended that an address should be prepared to the Friends in different places who are striving to support our doctrines and testimonies, but had not yet seen their way out of the mixture. It was referred to the epistle committee, to prepare one, if way opened. The committee believing their service was completed, they were released.

Third-day.—The representatives produced the names of Wilson Hall, for Clerk, and Barclay Stratton for assistant; also two Friends as messengers, who were united with and appointed. The queries were read with the answers from the Quarterly Meetings, and summary answers made. Much excellent counsel was handed forth by sundry Friends, tending to stir up to a more faithful support of all our testimonies. Notices of the deaths of several elders were read.

The public meeting on Fourth-day was large, and a very quiet favored opportunity, and several testimonies delivered.

Fifth-day morning.—The Boarding School Report was read and approved. The Report of the Committee on Primary Schools was read, and $300 appropriated for their use the coming year. The report showed that a large number of our children still attended district schools, which occasioned much expression on the importance of educating the children under care of Society. The Report of Committee to circulate the approved writings of Friends was read, and $100 ordered for their use. The Minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings were read and approved.

A concern was opened in the Yearly Meeting to encourage the subordinate meetings and the members in a faithful support of the doctrines and testimonies of Friends; and with much expression of unity, a joint committee of men and women was appointed for this service.

The Committee appointed a year ago on school books reported, that they could make arrangements with publishers for the preparation of a suitable series of readers, by the substitution, in books already in use, of other pieces for those which contained anything objectionable. The expense of making the changes and of preparing a set of stereotype plates, would be about $1000—provided they would agree to purchase (at the lowest wholesale rates) an edition of 1000 copies of the series of reading books as altered. After a long discussion, which showed the lively interest felt in the subject by the younger men, a minute was made authorizing the committee to expend $1000 for stereotype piping; and also to borrow the money for the purchase of an edition of the books—the Yearly Meeting agreeing to pay the interest on the money borrowed until it could be repaid from the books sold; and also to bear any pecuniary loss that might be incurred. Hopes were felt that Friends in other Yearly Meetings, who are concerned for the guarded education of their children, would assist by purchasing the books.

A committee on the subject of the union of the meetings in Iowa with Iowa Yearly Meeting was continued, and encouraged to visit Hickory Grove Quarterly Meeting, and Iowa Yearly Meeting, and their branches.

The Trustees of the Yearly Meeting-house at Mt. Pleasant, had sold our title to it for $213; which sum, after deducting expenses, the treasurer was directed to invest, and apply the interest in keeping our present house in repair.

Sixth-day.—Epistles were read for Western, Iowa and Kansas Yearly Meetings; also an address to scattered Friends, which was satisfactory and ordered to be printed; and a committee was named to distribute it. Near the close, divers Friends expressed their satisfaction with the company and services of our Canada Friends. The concluding minute was read, and after a solemn quiet the meeting concluded, the general feeling being, that we had been favored with a good Yearly Meeting, wherein the Wing of Ancient Goodness had been spread over us from sitting to sitting, enabling us to transact the business in harmony and brotherly condescension.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—U. S. Treasurer Jordan, has succeeded in putting into circulation 60,139,952 of the standard dollars. These figures, the highest in the circulation of silver coin, were reached last week.

The employes of the 21 pork packing establishments at the stock yards in Chicago have almost unanimously resolved not to accept the ten hours a day proposition of their employers. On the 8th instant about 8000 of the men struck. Some of Morrell's men, after going out, decided to return to work. The strikers at once invaded the place to compel them to quit, and used violence. Some of the Morrell men were wounded, but none dangerously. A force of policemen restored order, and a guard of 300 Pinkerton men was placed at the packing houses for the night. The attorney for the Executive Board of the Knights of Labor, issued a statement to the effect that "working men have taken their stand only after every offer of a fair and honest settlement of their differences has been refused by their employers. Contracts embodying the agreement already had between the packers and their employers have been rejected by the packers, and it is simply a question of the packers keeping their agreements. They are on trial and not the working men." It is estimated that 20,000 men are out of work in consequence of the strike, nearly three-fourths of them being laborers, obliged to quit because the others stopped.

The steamer La Mascotte, a passenger boat, plying between St. Louis and Cape Girardeau, Missouri, burst her boiler on the 5th instant, and was then burned. Thirty-one persons were killed outright or have since died. The boat was less than three months old, and was valued at $50,000.

In the Criminal Court at Chicago, the Anarchist spies Parsons, Fielden, Schwab, Engel, Fisher and Lingg, have been sentenced to be executed in the Twelfth Month next; and Neebe to be imprisoned for fifteen years in the State Penitentiary.

There were three slight earthquake shocks in Charleston, between the hours of 1 and 5.20 o'clock on the morning of the 9th inst. The first shock was also felt at other points in South Carolina, and at Augusta, Georgia.

J. Juvenet has sent to the New Orleans Cotton Exchange a bale of ramie, and to the Produce Exchange a bale of jute, which, he says, are the first bales of those products ever made in the United States. In a letter to the President of the Cotton Exchange, Juvenet encloses a statement showing that in Louisiana a net profit of $69 per acre can be made by cultivating ramie; and in his statement to the Produce Exchange he shows that the cultivation of jute will yield a net profit of $55 per acre. A second bale of ramie has been sent to London, and a second bale of jute to New York.

The number of deaths in this city last week was 315; being 57 less than the previous week, and 25 less than the corresponding week last year. Of the whole number 163 were males and 152 females; 60 died of consumption; 14 of typhoid fever; 13 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 13 of croup; 13 of convulsions; 20 of marasmus; 11 of debility, and 11 of pneumonia.

Markets, &c.—U. S. \$1 11 $\frac{1}{2}$; 4's, 128 $\frac{1}{2}$; 3's, 100; currency 6's, 126 a 136.

Cotton was quiet but steady, at 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum continued quiet at 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Feed was scarce and firm, at $14.50 a $15 per ton for western winter bran.

Flour and Meal.—Flour continued dull, and, with liberal offerings, prices favored buyers: 125 barrels Pennsylvania family, at $3.75; 125 barrels Pennsylvania straight, at $4.20; 250 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4.25; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.60 a $4.75; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $3.70, and 500 barrels do. patent, at $4.70 a $4.85. Rye flour moved slowly at $3.25 per barrel for choice.

Grain.—Wheat was lower, No. 2 red closing at 81 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. bid and 82 cts. asked. Corn declined also, No. 2 mixed closing at 44 cts. bid and 44 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. asked. Oats declined $\frac{1}{2}$ c., No. 2 white closing at 34 cts. bid, and 34 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were lower, at 3 a 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. Sheep were $\frac{1}{2}$ c. lower, at 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. Hogs were active, at 63 a 75 cts.

FOREIGN.—The London Daily News says it is enabled to state that a committee of the Cabinet is preparing a bill to establish four National Councils to represent the provinces of Ireland. "The bill differs from Gladstone's bill chiefly in the omission of provisions for a legislative body at Dublin. With this exception, the bill fully meets the aspirations of the Home Rulers in regard to transferring to local bodies the direction of Irish affairs now dealt with at Westminster. The Government has secured for this bill the hearty support of Lord Hartington and Chamberlain."

The St. James Gazette says: Enthusiastic Socialists declare that thousands of men regularly drill in London, and they boast they are able to put 100,000 armed men into the streets. The more moderate Socialists fear that the enthusiasts' sedulous secret teaching is telling dangerously on East End poverty and rufianism.

The French Institute has accepted the bequest of the Chantilly estates of the Duc d'Aumale. The Institute adopted a resolution declaring gratitude for the Duc d'Aumale's patriotic generosity.

At a Cabinet Council held on the 7th instant, Queen Christina of Spain signed a decree commuting the sentences of the condemned insurgents. The Queen also signed a decree freeing the slaves in Cuba from the remainder of their terms of servitude.

On the 9th instant, a new Spanish Cabinet was announced with Sagasta, President of the Council.

Two shocks of earthquake were felt throughout Balta, one of the Shelter Islands, on the night of Tenth Mo. 5th.

A volcanic eruption has occurred on the Island Niapu, one of the Toga group of the Friendly Islands. The earthquake destroyed every village on the Island of Niapu. The inhabitants escaped. The island is covered twenty feet deep with volcanic dust, and at one place a new hill 200 feet high has been formed.

The note presented to the Bulgarian Government by General Kaulbars before his departure from Sofia was in effect as follows: The Imperial Government desires the release of all persons arrested in connection with the deposition of Prince Alexander. It also desires that the elections be postponed until Eleventh Month. The consequences of a refusal to comply with Russia's wishes will fall upon those actually governing Bulgaria.

During his stay in Bulgaria, General Kaulbars has rendered himself exceedingly obnoxious to the people. On several occasions he has been hooted at. Notwithstanding the threats of Russia, the elections have proceeded, and all the members of the Ministry have been elected by very large majorities.

Neklidoff the Russian agent at Sofia, has resigned; but has announced that he will resume diplomatic relation in accordance with the instructions of General Kaulbars.

SOCIETY FOR HOME CULTURE.

The Term for 1886-87, opened Tenth Mo. 1st. While students are received at any time, it is best to enter the classes as soon as practicable. We have had full evidence that many warmly appreciate the aid offered by the Society, through its free library and correspondence with those well fitted to direct and assist in pursuing a course of reading or study at home.

The annual fee is $2.00, and covers all postal expenses. The requirements are few and easily met.

NOTICE TO PARENTS

AND OTHERS INTENDING TO SEND CHILDREN TO WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

Owing chiefly to the unfinished condition of the arrangements for heating and lighting the "New Building," it is impracticable to use it for the accommodation of the School at the usual time for opening the Winter Session.

After careful consideration of the subject in its different bearings, and under an earnest concern for the welfare of all interested, particularly the scholars and their caretakers, the following decisions have been reached by the sub-committee to whom the matter was referred by the General Committee, viz:

To defer the opening of the next Winter Session until the 30th of Eleventh Month, and to prolong it until the 14th of Fourth Month. This will result in making the whole length of the session two weeks less than usual. It is, however, not proposed to make any deduction in the charge for Board and Tuition on account of the diminution of the Term.

It has not yet been definitely decided whether it will be best to open the session in the old or in the new house, or possibly in parts of both, the final decision of this important question being deferred for a few weeks longer, as it is dependent upon matters which cannot at this time be determined positively. Meanwhile it is intended to use all reasonable diligence in pushing forward to completion the work yet remaining to be done upon the "New Building."

Unless it should appear clearly manifest within a few weeks that the "New Building" can be made thoroughly comfortable and ready for occupancy by the date mentioned (30th of Eleventh Month), the old house will be carefully prepared for the accommodation of the scholars, as heretofore, and the session opened there.

Parents may rest assured that in either case the children will be provided for and accommodated with a conscientious regard for their health and comfort in every way.

DIED, at his residence near Carmel, Hamilton Co., Indiana, Eighth Mo. 25th, 1886, DANIEL JONES, aged 72 years and 3 days, a member of Poplar Ridge Monthly Meeting. Having always been of the mind that religion should manifest itself in our temporal as well as spiritual affairs, he was careful to keep his in a condition that they gave him no anxiety through a protracted illness of nine months. This he bore with Christian resignation. In the early part of his sickness he was strongly impressed with the uncertainty of his recovery. He often expressed a great desire to be preserved from doing or saying any thing that would not redound to the glory of the Lord; frequently breaking forth with the language of the Psalmist, "Bless the Lord, Oh my soul; and all that is within me, bless his holy name." Being much attached to the true and ancient principles of Friends, he viewed with sorrow the many departures of the present time, and gave much counsel to his family, expressing great desire that they should live Christian lives. He resigned all to the will of the Lord, and quietly fell asleep on the morning of the 25th.

On Tenth Mo. 2nd, after a lingering illness, FRANCIS BARTLEY, of Covert, Michigan, aged 81 years. During his sickness he was uncomplaining and submissive, patiently awaiting the summons of his Redeemer. He arranged his financial matters, and gave directions as to the manner in which his funeral should be conducted.

Second Mo. 28th, 1839. Our Monthly Meeting, held at Gwynedd. Ezra Comfort, and Robert Scotton, both engaged in testimony. R. seemed fearful of some of us getting too low, from dwelling too much on our frailties and weaknesses, and thus making no advancement. And, also, for want of applying rightly unto Him, who is the healer of breaches, and restorer of paths to dwell in, we had allowed ourselves to become very weak; and that seed, faith, which was comparable to the smallest of all seeds, was suppressed. Saying, that this, if only allowed to grow, would become great; and seemed to think there was no need for such discouragement; expressing the belief that the dear Master was nearer some of us than we were aware of. Ezra was similarly led; quoting, "Woe is me now! for the Lord hath added grief to my sorrow; I fainted in my sighing, and I find no rest." He believed the lives of some present would be given them for a prey, &c.

Fifth Mo. 16th. Attended the week-day meeting at Gwynedd, which was small; there being but few young people. I mourned their absence, and also that parents can thus come themselves and leave them behind. Robert Scotton labored on this subject. May his exercise be remembered; as also his concern for some present who had "turned away sorrowful," when shown what they were to do in order to inherit eternal life. Sacrifices called for had come so close, that a cheerful surrender had not been made; and thus their growth had been retarded. Tender entreaties to close in while the day of mercy lasteth, was extended to these.

26th. Felt this day like adopting the language of dear S. Grubb: "Whatever has heretofore felt like life or been a participation of eternal substance, (though always small) seems now entirely extinguished; and the law and the testimonies, and the effusions of some little secret devotion, are all as springs shut up and fountains sealed."

Sixth Mo. 16th. Went to our little meeting, secretly craving that we might experience the dear Master to be in the midst, strengthening and enabling us to offer acceptable worship. How precious is it to feel on returning from these, our meetings, that we have been in His presence who alone giveth life!—A feeling, words cannot set forth.

17th. This afternoon our friend, Anna Thornburg, from Indiana, had an appointed meeting at Plymouth. I thought our friend was helped in a remarkable manner to minister to the different states present, quoting: "Strait is the gate and narrow the way which leadeth unto life," &c.; and "wide is the gate and broad is the way which leadeth unto destruction," &c. We were called upon to make an individual search which of these roads we were travelling! Although the road to eternal life be strait and narrow, she said, it is wide enough for the Christian to walk in. She was exercised for some who had begun well, and had travelled on for a season, but finding they could not take all their beloved idols of earth with them, had returned to the broad road. O the entreaties that were extended to these! They were reminded of the Scripture: "My Spirit will not always strive with man;" and pleaded with that, while time and opportunity are lengthened out, these should return. Then for some who were endeavoring to accumulate unto themselves abundance of this world's goods, her concern was great. She said they were risking the salvation of their poor never-dying souls; and craved that these might be aroused before the summons go forth, "prepare to meet thy God," &c. And then, tender and encouraging indeed was she to the mourning ones, who were going silently on their way. May the labor bestowed not be lost on any of us.

28th. Our dear friend, A. Thornburg and companion, spent the day and lodged with us last night, on their way to Exeter. In the evening, before retiring, dear A. was drawn to supplicate on behalf of our dear mother; then for us, her children; even for one so unworthy as I. May I never forget the favors of this evening.

30th. Another month has run its course; bringing me that much nearer to an awful eternity. How is it with thee, O my soul? Is a preparation therefor going on, or has indifference taken too much possession? I tremble for fear of the latter. Under a sense of it this morning, secretly was I led to crave for an increased concern that I might (as we were encouraged to this day) oftener than the morning, seek unto the Lord for strength, help and direction. Ezra Comfort was much concerned for us, that we might all become living members of the militant church; and thus be prepared, when done with time here, to join the church triumphant in heaven.

Seventh Mo. 21st. E. C. was afresh appointed to preach the gospel amongst us; Reviving: "The kingdom of Heaven is like unto a treasure hid in a field; the which when a man hath found, he hideth it and for joy thereof goeth and selleth all that he hath and buyeth that field." We were shown that nothing short of selling all would purchase this inestimable treasure, this "Pearl of great price;" which will be more to us in a day to come, than all the treasures and pleasures of this poor world, so fast passing away to us; enlarging further thereon. Then he arose the second time, comparing some among us to Ananias and Sapphira. Representing that there had been much sold, but not all; a "part of the price had been reserved." The awful consequence of which, he said, we may remember was death. He feared spiritual death would be the portion of some of us, if there was a reserve, or a not yielding all up. May all be removed out of the way, which stands as a partition wall between me and my God.

Eighth Mo. 8th. At our Quarterly Meeting, we had the company and labors of our friend, Jacob Green, from Ireland, now on a religious visit to our land; he having arrived only a few days since. From what I have seen and heard, I should think he was one calculated to do us good. After a season of stillness, he told us he had been contemplating the ark that Noah was instructed to build for the saving of his family, when the deluge was about to cover the earth. Then he enlarged, showing there still remained to be an ark or place of safety for the Lord's children to flee unto, even into the hollow of His most holy hand, &c. He had been comforted in believing there was of this description now present, a living remnant left; notwithstanding the floods that had been permitted to pass over us. The language, he believed, was about to be proclaimed: "Go forth, multiply and replenish the earth," that there might be a living army raised up. Said, it had seemed as though he could see or had seen "the dove with the olive leaf in her mouth," &c. May the day for this hasten, saith my soul; but I have feared sufferings await us first, which often causes the query, "Who shall stand?" A careless and indifferent mercy was also spoken to; to whom the offers of mercy had long been extended, even to some almost to the eleventh hour. And O! the pleadings that went forth, that there might be a closing in while time and opportunity was lengthened out; before the day come when ye shall say, "I have no pleasure in them." The word of the Lord, through the prophet, was also sounded: "Oh ye dry bones, hear the word of the Lord," &c. Wm. Evans closed the first meeting with, "We thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight." He went on to show that it was alone to the babes in Christ, that the mysteries of the kingdom were revealed; and that they had been and would continually be hid from the wise and prudent of this world. The necessity of becoming more and more as little children, reduced to a teachable state, and made willing to be just what the Lord would have us to be, was weightily impressed upon us. The meeting closed with solemn supplication from dear Elizabeth Robson.

25th. On taking my seat in our little meeting this morning, my heart seemed full, yea ready to overflow. How sweet was it to find relief in tears! If I ever knew what secret prayer was, I did this day. And may I so walk as to have an evidence given, that my prayer is heard and tears had in remembrance.

29th. Attended, this morning, our Monthly Meeting held at Gwynedd. Robert Scotton excellently engaged in testimony. Surely the day hasteneth when some of us will be left without excuse, who so have line upon line and precept upon precept. "If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?" was what Robert arose with; and then went on to show that we had much left to convince us, even from the dear Master himself, that when the righteous came to be judged, they had nothing to spare. Then, how will it be with the sinner and the ungodly, those who have been careless and unconcerned, slighting the tender visitations which have been time after time extended, still putting off till a more convenient season? &c., &c. We were shown how dangerous delay was, or trifling with the visitations of Heaven. How were we pleaded with to close in and follow the dear Master, whithersoever He may be pleased to lead, &c.

For "The Friend."

Umbelliferous Plants.

In the early part of the Seventh Month, as I passed an unusually large specimen of Wild Carrot (Daucus carota), growing on a rich bank by the road side, I was impressed, as I never before had been, with the beauty of the plant. The numerous stems, apparently proceeding from one root, were clothed with a rich mass of finely divided foliage, and supported, in addition to many undeveloped buds, a profusion of the white flower clusters, nearly every one of which contained in its centre a purple blossom, contrasting strangely with the general white of the bloom.

The manner in which the flowers are arranged at the ends of the flower stalks is a peculiar feature of the natural order of plants to which the carrot belongs. In many plants, such as the Currant, Wild Cherry, and Poke, the flowers start from the side of the growing stem, which continues to lengthen and produce new flowers; and each floret has its own small stem. This form of a flower cluster is called a Raceme, (from a Latin word which means a cluster as of grapes.) It is evident that in the raceme the lowest blossoms on the stem are the oldest, having been first formed. It sometimes happens that the stems of the lowest or first-formed blossoms lengthen as the flowering process goes on, so that in the fully developed flower, all the blossoms are raised to nearly the same height, forming a somewhat flat-topped cluster of bloom. This is called by botanists a Corymb. If now we imagine the flower-stalk to be so shortened that the spaces between the stems of the individual florets disappear, so that they all start out at the same place, then the Corymb is transformed into what is termed an Umbel. An umbel, then, is a form of flower cluster, in which the branchlets all start from the top of the common flower-stalk, from which they radiate like the ribs of an umbrella from the top of the stick.

I pulled a stalk of the Carrot, and found that its umbel of flowers was composed of between 50 and 60 stems or branches, all emanating from the top of the stalk. The outer branches were many times as long as those in the centre, and the whole formed a flat-topped, or rather, slightly arched cluster of flowers. Each of the branches of the umbel bore at its extremity a similar cluster of secondary branches to which the individual flowers were attached, so that the inflorescence of the Carrot is a compound umbel.

In the young buds, the branches were erect so that they were clustered into a cylindrical mass, but as the bloom developed, they spread out and drooped until the flat-topped form already described was assumed. A few of the flowers had already passed their prime, the corollas had fallen, and the young seed vessels were visible. In these flowers the branches had again assumed a curved form, bending inward, and bringing the seed vessels nearer together, so as to form a hollow cup which has been compared to a bird's nest.

The Carrot and similar plants belong to the natural order Umbelliferae, (umbel-bearing plants) a large family, of which many species are more or less aromatic, and several are highly poisonous. To this order belongs the fatal hemlock, of which the Greek philosopher, Socrates, was forced to partake, through the unreasonable prejudices of his fellow citizens. The Parsnip, Celery, Caraway, and Anise, are well-known members of it; and it yields the resinous gum asafetida and other medicinal substances.

In some sections of country, especially where the soil is thin, the abundance of the Carrot, and the extent to which it occupies the ground is very striking. This may be explained by the quantity of seeds which it produces. On examining one of its "bird-nest" like clusters of seed vessels, which I brought home for closer inspection, I counted 75 of the main branches of the umbel; and these were subdivided at their extremities into numerous secondary branches; probably averaging from 30 to 40 for each; thus making the whole umbel to contain from 2,000 to 3,000 individual flower stems, which now carried the seed vessels which had succeeded the white blossoms. As each of the seed vessels is a double capsule, joined along one edge, and thus contains two seeds, the whole number of possible plants for next year from this one umbel, may be estimated at about 5,000. The reader can form some idea of the multitude of plants that may spring from one root, if he will consider the large number of umbels that a vigorous carrot will bear.

The seed vessels are marked with ribs, which are bordered with rows of weak bristles, and make quite interesting objects for microscopic examination. In the spaces between these ridges, embedded in the substance of the fruit, are the oil-tubes, which may be seen by cutting the seed across, and placing the cut surface under a lens. One might suppose that the aromatic oil (although the aroma is not so agreeable as in the Mints and other plants) which the Carrot contains would be a protection to the plant from the attacks of insects and larger animals. It probably is so to some extent; but there are probably no plants, however distasteful to some creatures which do not furnish acceptable nourishment to others.

On the 22nd of the month, as I passed some Carrots, I observed a most beautiful Caterpillar feasting on their white florets. I had found it in former years in a vegetable garden, on some of the plants which belonged to the family of Umbelliferae, and had fed it and watched its transformations. It is free from hairs. Its general color is a pale apple-green, marked with velvet black rings, on which are spots of bright yellow—so that it is altogether a striking and attractive object. It is sluggish in its motions, and when touched pushes out two little orange-colored horns which emit a strong and disagreeable odor. This seems to be its principal means of defence.

When it reaches its full size, this caterpillar does not make a cocoon, but fastens its hind feet in a little tuft of silk which it has spun on some convenient support. As a further protection it spins a loop or girth of many silken threads, passing round its body and fastened at each end to the surface on which it rests. Its caterpillarskin is then soon cast off, and it has become a pale green chrysalis, still beautiful, but entirely unlike the worm-like form it before exhibited. In a few days the skin of the chrysalis bursts open, and a beautiful black butterfly emerges, and spreads its wings to the air, adorned with rows of spots, yellow, blue and red—of which the yellow are much the most conspicuous.

This caterpillar is commonly known as the Parsley-worm. Its appearance when first hatched is very unlike that of the full-grown insect; and it gradually alters with each successive change of the skin. It feeds on nearly all the cultivated umbelliferous plants, such as Parsnip, Carrot, Parsley, Celery, Anise, &c.; and also on the wild and poisonous species. The butterfly is known as the Papilio Asterias. Later in the season a second brood of the worms will appear, and the chrysalis which comes from these will remain without change till the following spring, when the butterfly will emerge and lay its eggs; and thus a new circle of insect life will commence.

Near the spot on which grew the Carrot I have described, was an interesting illustration of the thoroughness with which nature provides for the occupation of unoccupied space—as described in the "Wild Sower" of Edith M. Thomas, republished in "The Friend" of Seventh Mo. 24th. A bed of a few yards square had been recently made up, designed for a grass-plot; but the plants that had sprung up in it came from the seeds that were already scattered through the soil. A rather hasty examination showed the presence of peppergrass, smartweed, ragweed, daisy, lambquarters, dock, wild chamomile, toadflax, wild carrot, sorrel, and two kinds of plantains, with several varieties of grasses—the whole forming a pretty compact mass of vegetation, which almost hid the ground from sight.

To return to the umbelliferous plants—although many of them contain a poisonous principle, yet in several of them this is lessened by cultivation, and the amount of nutritive matter increased, so that they are valued inmates of our gardens. A small proportion of the noxious element probably still exists in the cultivated parsnip and carrot, but when cooked these roots form wholesome articles of food. Yet it would be altogether unsafe to eat the roots of those which grow wild. In the celery plant, a bitter flavor may often be detected, although the stalks being protected by the earth heaped around them, the poisonous principle is not developed as it would be if they were exposed to the sun.

For "The Friend."

Oliver Sansom.

In the year 1676, Oliver Sansom says: "I felt some drawings on my spirit to go over into Ireland in the service of the Gospel; and very hard it was for me to give up to that journey; but in waiting upon the Lord and shutting out carnal reasoning, the Lord in time made me willing to be resigned to his guidance in that exercise: and so the thing remaining near two years, grew still more weighty upon me. Then I acquainted my dear brother Samuel Burgis therewith, and he was made free and willing to go along with me, and be my companion in that journey, although he came from thence not long before."

The vessel on which they sailed was bound to Dublin, and through adverse winds and tempests made but slow progress. About an hour after starting it struck a sand bar; and, says O. S., "it being an ebbing tide, the water went clean away from the ship so that it was dry land round about for a great distance from the ship. Wherefore many of us went down out of the ship, and walked four or five hours on the sands which lay dry for two or three furlongs in length, but encompassed round with water at a distance, that none could get to the land if they had desired it; but when the tide came in again we all went up into the ship. And when it was high water the ship floated, being borne up by the flood above the sands. Whereupon we endeavored to get forward; but the wind being turned almost against us, the seamen toiled hard and sailed to and again until the evening, yet were they then fain to cast anchor.

"Next morning, being the first-day of the week, as soon as it was day-light, the sailors went to work again, and having weighed anchor and spread their sails, endeavored again to get forward; but the wind was still strong against them. And when they had labored till near the middle of the day the wind grew more turbulent, with rain and stormy weather; which forced them to cast anchor there again.

"This unexpected stop and delay of our passage brought afresh to our remembrance that when we were at Chester, treating with the ship-master, and just as we had concluded for our passage, a great weight came upon my spirit; and I had some drawings to go to Liverpool, to visit Friends there, and thereabouts, and in that part of Lancashire before we left England. But we having suddenly disposed of our horses, and being not well able to travel on foot, and withal thinking it long ere we were got over into Ireland, did take that weight which fell upon me at Chester, to be a forewarning from the Lord of some hardship or suffering that was like to come upon us at sea.

"There were on board the ship about four-score passengers in all, many of them as low and wicked, I think, as any the earth did bear, but others of them were more sober; though as to religion very dark. Yet the Lord by his power preserved us, so that none of them offered any abuse unto us, so much as in words; though they were very vain and frothy among themselves; and the weight of their iniquity lay heavy upon us.

"While thus we lay at anchor in the afternoon, when all had dined, but we ourselves were fasting all the day, we went up upon the deck in the fear and dread of the Lord God, and my brother S. B. opening his mouth with an audible voice, declared to them of the mercy and love of the Lord, exhorting them to repentance. When he ceased I spake to them also after the same manner, putting them in mind of their latter end and reproving them for their vanity, exhorted them to turn to the grace of God, which had appeared to them, to teach them to deny all ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world.

"When first S. B. began to speak they came forth and drew near unto us, standing together upon the deck like a pretty large congregation, and gave diligent attention."

"The master of the ship and the seamen seemed well pleased, and were kind and courteous to us; for indeed, the powerful presence of the Lord was with us, and most of them were so far reached, as to confess that what we said was true."

"As it seemed likely that the weather would become still more tempestuous, the ship put back to the port from which she had sailed; and Oliver and his companion left the vessel, and, after performing the religious service which they had felt required of them, sailed from Liverpool and arrived at Dublin on the 30th of Fifth Month.

His Journal says: "When we were come into that city a hard travail of exercise came upon us, by reason of the power of darkness which had wrought strongly and mysteriously in the hearts of some, who had once known a better state while they were little and low. But when the Lord had given them rest, and increased them in outward things, the love of this world entering their hearts, became as a root of bitterness in them, from whence sprang prejudice, enmity, contention, high-mindedness, self-love, and the like."

They were at several meetings in that city, in one of which he says, "the power and presence of the Lord was mightily revealed, which enabled us to discover and give warning against that spirit of darkness, which was the troubler of Israel." Of another meeting he remarks, "The Lord was with us as at other times, blessed forever be his holy name, and the upright and tender-hearted were refreshed and made glad in the feeling of the love of God, which flowed forth through us to them."

They remained in Ireland about four months, being "exercised in the service of the Lord, with all our might and utmost diligence." "The only aim and end that was sought by us in this undertaking, was singly the glory of God, in doing our duty in obedience to his requirings, for the gathering the scattered ones to Christ, the great Shepherd, and for the building up and confirming in the faith them that were gathered, to the measure of the grace and ability the Lord was pleased to bestow upon us."

During this visit Oliver Sansom appears to have been favored in an unusual degree with the Lord's power and presence. In a letter to his wife written in the Seventh Month, he bears testimony to "the heavenly comfort and sweet refreshment which the Lord, in his love, hath opened as a spring in me; whereby my soul hath been daily strengthened and encouraged; that all my travels and exercises inward and outward have been made easy unto me, so that I can say that the way of the Lord hath been pleasant unto me, and my soul hath found true peace in walking in his path. As I have patiently been resigned to take the yoke of Christ upon me, He hath enabled me to bear it with ease and delight."

In the Ninth Month, having come to Dublin again, to attend the Half-Year's General Meeting, he again writes to his beloved companion as follows:—"The Lord hath been exceeding good unto us, and tender over us from day to day, and from time to time, and from meeting to meeting, since we parted from thee. Oh! his mercies are infinite and inexpressible, and the sense of his tender love doth ever overcome and break my heart, and even force tears from my eyes in the writing of it."

This Half-Year's Meeting appears to have been a remarkable occasion, in which the members were greatly favored to mingle together in feeling, and to partake of the streams of Divine consolation. O. Sansom describes it as follows:—

"On the Second-day we went to the Half-Year's General Meeting at Dublin, which began on the Fourth-day of the week, being the 8th day of the Ninth Month, at the ninth hour in the morning; and the meeting for worship continued until after the first hour. About an hour after, Friends met again in order to consider of the affairs of the church; but the power of the Lord brake forth so mightily amongst Friends in many testimonies, prayers and praising the Lord, that there was no time to enter upon business that day, and so the meeting broke up.

"Next morning the meeting began again about the ninth hour, and continued until near the third hour in the afternoon, and a precious heavenly time it was; then adjourning for an hour, Friends came together again to go upon the business of the meeting; but then again the Lord's power mightily appeared, whereby many mouths were opened to declare of the goodness of the Lord, and to offer up prayers and praises to Him; which took up the time of that day also, so that very little could be done as touching business.

"But early next morning Friends went about the business of the meeting, and continued at it the greatest part of that day and the next day also. And in much unity and harmony generally was the business managed and carried on all the time, only there happened some difference between some particular persons, which occasioned some trouble for a little while; but the diligence of Friends was not wanting to put an end quickly to it and proved successful therein; and the Lord's presence was precious enjoyed, and his mighty power was over all and brake forth through many vessels, in testimonies, prayers and praises; so that the business could not be accomplished until the Seventh-day, in the evening.

"Next day, which was the First-day of the week, there were two public meetings, which were very large, and lasted almost all the day; and a very heavenly season it was all the time that the Friends were together, in those five days; in which time there were nine meetings held at the largest meeting-house. And the powerful presence of the Lord was greatly manifested; blessed and praised and magnified be his holy name for ever.

Preparing the Way of the Lord.—Visiting Bloomingdale (New York) Asylum many years ago, we looked into eyes whence hope and reason had departed, and heard despairing cries that must haunt the soul forever.

"Our great discouragement," said the good physician who was our guide, "is that our work begins too late. Half our patients would be sane to-day if their home training in childhood had been wise and faithful and firm. But the tender, formative years were passed in alternate extremes of excitement and neglect; the temptations of youth were met by no patiently fostered habits of self-control; and the poor, unfortified brain gave way under the stress of later life."

It was but another statement from the negative side of a truth that is constantly meeting our view. Sanity, order, peace, all that is precious in personal or social life, must be gained by long and faithful effort. Silent growth in the root, steady strengthening of fibre in stem and branches, such is the law of divine working in the world before blossoms and fruit can appear. Peace is not a mere cessation of strife; it is a divine order, built upon foundations of reason, equity and love.

"He that desires freedom outwardly must first possess it inwardly;" and not freedom only, but righteousness. The peace of God must rule in a heart before we can be peacemakers for the world.

Faithful souls in all ages have prayed, "Thy kingdom come," and yet the forces of the world are unsubdued, chaotic, scornful of the messages of peace. But surely every victory over individual passion, social spite or national injustice,

"Avails the blessed time to expedite," when the kingdoms of this world shall be the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and when, in peace and righteousness, He shall reign for ever and ever.—M. E. T. in Advocate of Peace.

For "The Friend."

Rebecca Battey.

Among the beloved, sweetly-gifted, humble, devoted and unassuming ministers of Starksboro Monthly Meeting, was the subject of this narrative. She was the daughter of James and Content Starbuck, and was born in Chester County, N. Y., in 1798. She was brought up in plainness, yet having made some deviations in her dress, she was brought under conviction by the ministry of a travelling Friend. She shut herself up in her room, and removed some superfluous articles from her clothing, and then re-joined the family. Soon missing her eldest sister, she went in pursuit of her and found her also engaged in reducing her dress to a greater degree of consistency with Truth's requirements. This occurred about the sixteenth year of her age. Both of them were ever afterwards examples of consistent plainness.

After her marriage to Joseph Battey, at Chester, N. Y., in 1818, she resided with him for a time at his father's in Starksboro, Vt, becoming a member of Starksboro Monthly Meeting, where she first appeared in the ministry the same year. They removed to South Starksboro in 1819, becoming members of Creek Particular Meeting.

In 1819, she accompanied Elizabeth Meador on a religious visit to Lower Canada, Grand Isle, Peru, Chester and Queensbury, N. Y. She was recorded a minister by Starksboro Monthly Meeting, in 1824.

They removed to Charlotte in 1827, where they resided till the latter part of 1833, becoming members of Ferrisburg Monthly Meeting. They again removed to Friendsville, Pa., becoming members of Stroudsburg Monthly Meeting, which they only twice attended on account of the distance. She united with Jemima Burson in visiting the families of Friends in the vicinity of Abington and Frankford Monthly Meetings.

After visiting their friends in Vermont, Joseph and Rebecca Battey went to Tunesassa, as Superintendent and Matron of the School for Indian Children, in 1836, remaining in that situation until 1841, giving satisfaction to their friends.

From Tunesassa they went to Collins, Erie Co., N. Y., in 1842. She joined with others in visiting the families of Collins Monthly Meeting, until they had all been visited twice over. She also attended Ohio Yearly Meeting with a minute, in 1851. In the year 1856, they removed to Scipio, N. Y., where they continued to reside till the time of her death, which occurred the 7th of Third Mo. 1863.

She was strongly attached to the doctrines and testimonies of the Society of Friends, and bore a faithful testimony against the more modern innovations, which have laid waste our Society. To the sick and afflicted she was a sympathizing and helpful visitor. During a prevailing epidemic, she was at one time engaged for six weeks in going from house to house. Though far from being strong, she frequently travelled 120 miles to attend Monthly Meeting. Having a precious gift in the ministry, and possessing a meek, quiet and unassuming disposition, she won the affection and esteem of a large circle of relatives and friends. Truly was she "a pilgrim and a stranger on the earth, speaking plainly that she desired a better country, that is a heavenly."

FAITH.

An aged man had two grandsons, one six and the other not quite three years of age, of whom he was very fond. One day he remarked pleasantly, yet with solemnity, that he had had a dream. He saw the children alone, entirely unprotected, wandering about the rough banks of a river, where they were in imminent danger. Casting his eye upwards he saw a dove watching over them. Instantly his fears concerning them vanished. He felt that under the care of this dove they were safe.

Soon after, and but a short time before his death, he again spoke of having had a dream, which had evidently left a similar sweet impression on his mind. He saw a dove at his window: "There seemed to be a flock of them," he said, "waiting for me." He was not at all in the habit of speaking of his dreams, or of his religious feelings, but his interpretation of the dove was very obvious.

"And John bare record, saying, I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon him." John i. 32.

Drear and lonely, steep and rugged,
Marked with danger all around
Seemed the pathway of the infants,
None to lean on—no firm ground
For those feet so frail and slender,
For the little ones so tender.

On this scene of danger gazing:
Full his heart of anxious fears—
Unto heaven his eye upraising—
Lo! a beauteous dove appears,
Watching o'er the babes so tender:
He has come for their defender.

Aged sire, thy fears are vanished,
Oh! the blessedness of faith!
Every thought of danger banished
And the precious ones are safe;
For the Spirit watcheth o'er them,
Making sure each step before them,
Should it be their lot to wander,
Where temptations do abound,
As they travel on life's pathway,
On this same uncertain ground,
May this blessed Spirit shield them,
And his saving presence yield them.

Aged sire! as for the infants,
For thyself appeared this dove;
Even a flock came forth to guide thee
To the blessed realms above.
Oh the beauty and the sweetness
Of the Christian hope's completeness!

"COME YE APART."

"And He said unto them, Come ye yourselves apart, into a desert place, and rest awhile."—Mark vi. 31.
Oh, for "a desert place" with only the Master's smile!
Oh, for the "coming apart" with only His "rest awhile!"

Many are "coming and going" with busy and restless feet.
And the soul is hungering now, with "no leisure so much as to eat."

Well: I will wait in the crowd till He shall call me apart,
Till the silence fall which shall waken the music of mind and heart;
Patiently wait till He gives the work of my secret choice,
Blending the song of life with the thrill of the Master's voice.

The Gold Sovereign.

L. R.

The story of the gold sovereign, related to me by Judge N—, a gentleman of wealth and influence in Western New York, is well worth repeating for the admirable lesson it conveys to young persons commencing life. I regret that I am unable to reproduce the spirit and humor with the judge graced his simple story, but I will do my best to remember his own words:

When I was eight years old (said Judge N—), my parents being poor, with half a dozen children better than myself to take care of, gave me to a farmer in the town of F—, who designed to make a plow-boy of me, and to keep me in his service until I was of age. Well, I did not have a very gay time in Deacon Webb's service, for although he was an honest and tolerably kind man in his family, he believed in making boys work, and understood how to avoid spoiling them by indulgence.

So I had plenty of work to do, and an abundant lack of indulgences to enjoy. It was, therefore, a great treat for me to get the enormous sum of one or two pennies into my possession by any sort of good fortune, a circumstance of such rare occurrence that at the age of eleven I had learned to regard money as a blessing bestowed by Providence only on a favored few.

Well, I had lived with Deacon Webb three year before I knew the color of any coin except vile copper. By an accident I learned the color of gold, that is the story I am going to tell you.

One Saturday night, Deacon Webb sent me to the village store on some errand; and on returning home, just about dusk, my attention was attracted by a little brown package lying by the roadside. I picked it up to examine its contents without the least suspicion of the treasure within. Indeed it was so light, and the volume of brown paper appeared so large, that I suspected that I was the victim of an April fool, although it was the month of June. I tore open the folds of the paper however, and seeing nothing, I was about throwing it into the ditch, when something dropped out of it and fell with a ringing sound upon a stone.

I looked at it in astonishment. It was yellow, round, glittering, too bright and too small for a penny. I felt it, too, I squeezed it in my fingers, I spelled out the inscription, then something whispered to me that it was a gold coin of great value, and that if I did not wish to lose it I had better pocket it as soon as possible.

Trembling with excitement I put the coin in my pocket, but it would not stay there. Every two minutes I had to take it out and look at it. But whenever I met anybody, I was careful to put it out of sight. Somehow I felt a guilty dread of finding an owner to the coin. Provided I found

HARVEST HOME.

Most gratefully we gather
The fruitage of the year,
And offer our thanksgiving
With heart and voice sincere!
The sowing and the planting
Have brought their best reward;
Lo! they would place our offering
Low at thy feet, O Lord—
Our Harvest Home.

What wealth of treasure greets us,
To bless the labor done!
How hard the work and watching,
How sweet the triumph won!
What golden gleams of beauty
The ripened fruitage yields!
With songs of joy and gladness
We glean the fragrant fields—
Sweet Harvest Home!

O Lord, when Thou dost gather
Thy sheaves of golden wheat,
And from the worthless masses
Select the pure and meet,
When, all earth's harvests over,
Thine own is just begun,
O grant, our Heavenly Father,
We hear Thy call, "Well done!"
Thy Harvest Home!

none I thought it was honestly mine, by right of discovery, and I comforted myself with the sophistry that it was not my business to go about the streets crying, "Who's lost?" I went home with the gold in my pocket. I would not have had the Deacon's folks know what I had found for the world. I was sorely troubled with the fear of losing my vast and incalculable treasure. And this was not all; it seemed to me that my face betrayed my secret. I could not look at anybody with an honest eye.

These troubles kept me awake half the night, and projects for securing my treasure by a safe investment the other half. On the following morning I was feverish and nervous, when Deacon Webb, at the breakfast table said: "William!"

I started and trembled, thinking the next words would be, "Where is that piece of gold you have found, and wickedly concealed to keep it from the rightful owner?"

But he only said:

"I want you to go to Mr. Baldwin's this morning, and ask him if he can come and work for me to-day and to-morrow."

I felt immensely relieved. I left the house, and got out of sight as soon as possible. Then once more I took the coin out of my pocket, and feasted on its beauty. Yet I was unhappy. Conscience of wrong troubled me, and I almost wished I had not found the gold. "Would I not be called a thief if discovered?" I asked myself. "Was it not as wrong to conceal what I had found as to take the same amount from the owner's pocket? Was he not defrauded the same?"

But then I said to myself, "Why, if I don't know who the loser is, how can I give him his money? It is only because I am afraid Deacon Webb will take it away from me that I conceal it, that's all. I would not steal gold, and if the loser should ask me for it, I would give it to him." I apologized thus to myself all the way to Mr. Baldwin's house, but, after all, it would not do. The gold was like a heavy stone bound to my heart. It was a sort of unhappy charm, which gave an evil spirit, power to torment me. And I could not help thinking that I was not half so well pleased with my immense riches as I had been with a rusty copper which I had found some weeks before. Nobody claimed the penny, although I kept my good fortune no secret, and I had been happy as a king, or as a king is commonly supposed to be.

Mr. Baldwin was not at home, and I returned to the Deacon's house. I saw Mr. Wardley's horse standing at the gate, and I was terribly frightened. Mr. Wardley was a constable, and I thought he had come to take me to jail. So I hid in the garden until he went away. By that time reason began to prevail over cowardice, and I made my appearance at the house. The Deacon looked angrily at me.

"Now, thought I, feeling faint, "he is going to accuse me of finding the gold."

But he only scolded me for being so long about my errand. I never received a reprimand so willingly. His severe words sounded sweet, I had expected something so much more terrible.

I worked all day with the gold in my pocket. I wonder Deacon Webb did not suspect something. I stopped so often to see if the gold was really there; for, much as the possession of it troubled me, the fear of losing it troubled me scarcely less. I was miserable. I wished a hundred times that I had not found the gold. I felt that it would be a relief to lay it down on the roadside. Again I wrapped it in brown paper, just as I had found it. I wondered if ill-gotten wealth made everybody so miserable.

At night I was sent again to Mr. Baldwin's, and having found him, obtained his promise to work at Deacon Webb's on the following day. It was dark when I went home, and I was afraid of robbers. I never felt so cowardly in my life. It seemed to me that anybody could rob me with a clear conscience, because my treasure was not mine. I got home, and went trembling to bed. Mr. Baldwin came early to breakfast with us. I should tell you something about him. He was an honest, poor man, who supported a large family by hard work. Everybody liked him, he was so industrious and faithful, and besides making good wages for his labor, he often got presents of meal and flour from those who employed him.

Well, at the breakfast table, after Deacon Webb had asked the blessing and given Mr. Baldwin a piece of pork, so that he might eat and go to work as soon as possible, something was said about the "news."

"I suppose you have heard about my misfortune," said Mr. Baldwin.

"Your misfortune!"

"Yes."

"Why, what has happened to you?" asked the deacon.

"I thought everybody had heard of it," replied Baldwin. "You see, the other night when Mr. Woodley paid me, he gave me a gold piece."

I started, and felt the blood forsake my cheeks. All eyes were fixed upon Baldwin, however, so my trouble was not observed.

"A sovereign," said Baldwin, "the first one I ever had in my life, and it seemed to me that if I should put it in my pocket like a cent or half dollar, I should lose it. So, like a goose, I wrapped it in a piece of paper and stowed it away in my coat pocket, where I thought it was safe. I never did a more foolish thing. I must have lost the coin taking out my handkerchief, and the paper would prevent its making any noise as it fell. I discovered my loss when I got home, and went back to look for it, but somebody must have picked it up."

"Who could have been so dishonest as to keep it?" asked the deacon.

I felt like sinking through the floor.

"I don't know," replied the poor man, shaking his head sadly; he's welcome to it, whoever he is, and I hope his conscience won't trouble him more than the money is worth, though heaven knows I want my honest earnings."

This was too much for me. The allusion to my conscience brought the gold out of my pocket. I resolved to make a clean breast of it, and be honest in spite of poverty and shame. So I held the gold in my trembling hand and said:

"Is this yours, Mr. Baldwin?" My voice was so faint that he did not hear me, so I repeated my question in a more courageous tone. All eyes turned upon me in astonishment; and the Deacon demanded where and when I had found the gold.

I burst into tears and confessed everything. I expected the Deacon would whip me to death, but he patted my head and said, more kindly than was his wont:

"Don't cry about it, William. You are an honest boy if you did come near falling into temptation. Always be honest, my son; and if you do not grow rich, you will be happy with a clear conscience."

But I cried still—for joy. I laughed, too, the Deacon had so touched my heart. Of what a load was I relieved. I felt then that "Honesty is the best policy."

As for Baldwin, he declared that I should have half the money for finding it, but I wished to keep clear of the troublesome stuff for a time, and I did—I would not touch his offer,—and I never regretted it, boy as I was.

Well, I was the Deacon's favorite after that. He was very kind to me and trusted me in everything. I was careful not to deceive him. I preserved the strictest candor and good faith, and that has made me what I am. When he died he left me five hundred dollars, with which I came here and bought New Lands, which are now worth a great many sovereigns. But this has nothing to do with my story. That is told, and all I have to add is, that I have never regretted clearing my conscience of poor Job Baldwin's sovereign.—Golden Rule.

For "The Friend."

As the readers of "The Friend" have an interest in all that is transpiring in Society, some extracts from the respective decisions of Justice Proudfoot and the Court of Appeal, in the case of Dorland vs. Jones, may be of interest. Judge Proudfoot says:

"I do not think that there is any ground for assuming that the purchase of this land was made in contemplation of organic changes in the doctrines, the order and discipline of the Body, under the guiding influence of the Holy Spirit. The Quakers do acknowledge the presiding influence of the Holy Spirit, and deem it a primary force, while the Scriptures are secondary to it in this sense, that they are only the result of its influence on the holy men who were inspired by it; but they ascribe such value to the Scriptures, that anything at variance with them cannot be the true work of the Spirit. And, as to order and discipline, the purchasers must have looked to the continuance of the then existing order of things.

"If progress in theology were recognized as a Quaker belief, it would be difficult to determine which were the Schismatics—those who professed the new doctrines evolved from the Scriptures by men professing to be guided by the Spirit, or those who remained in the old paths. But it is a mistake to suppose that Quakers are without a creed. They have, indeed, no written creed, embracing all the matters of their belief, but they do believe in the Bible, and the Orthodox adhere to it, and to the doctrines which their founders educed from it."

The above was the basis of Judge Proudfoot's decision after a patient hearing of the evidence presented by the parties to the suit. In the Court of Appeal, Judge Hogarty says:

"We have to consider whether the respondents have made out their case. First, have the plaintiffs departed from any of the fundamental principles or tenets of the Society as it existed in 1821, or have they departed from its practice and discipline, so as in effect to be no longer the same Society or members thereof? And in connection with this, we have to consider the right of the Society in the exercise of its acknowledged constitutional powers, viz.—by the action of the Yearly Meeting, the admitted highest tribunal which it possesses, to change either doctrine or discipline."

* * "If we accede to the respondents' contention, the Society of Friends holding property on the general trusts here expressed, would be in a most helpless state, under a cast-iron rule forbidding all variation or change. I believe there has been no such departure from (fundamental principles.)" * * "It seems beyond question that within the last 20 or 30 years, the Society has, in some degrees, relaxed some of their special discipline. Their own constitution seems to afford ample means by the final authority of their Yearly Meetings to adjust and regulate such matters."

Judge Patterson says, "If, contrary to my personal opinion, it were proper to decide the case by reference to the doctrines of the Society of Friends, I should have great difficulty in saying that any fundamental change has taken place. I do not understand the plaintiffs to admit that they have departed from the faith or principles of the Society of Friends, to which the defendants as well as the plaintiffs belong. I do not attempt to examine the alleged departures. It would only be proper to do so in case the title depended on that question. I agree with the learned judge in the court below, that the identity of the West Lake Monthly Meeting is what has to be decided, but I hold that the criterion is not adherence to the doctrines and practices which prevailed in 1821 or 1835, but its continued existence as a Monthly Meeting of the organization of the Society of Friends to which it belonged at those dates, and its members being continued in religious unity with London Yearly Meeting. When, therefore, the deed of 1835 declared the trusts for a meeting so long as the members constituting it shall remain, and be from time to time continued in religious unity with the Yearly Meeting of Friends as now established in London, it referred to a Meeting which had no formulated creed or articles of faith, that could be referred to as proof of the precise form of doctrine which prevailed at the moment. It does not, therefore, seem a reasonable construction of the language of the deed to hold that the unity contemplated was an unchanging adherence to the views which at that date, might be those of the London Meeting, even if such views were susceptible of proof."

* * "I think we must take the reference to be a Meeting which should secure the continued recognition of the London Meeting."

"The London Yearly Meeting does not appear to have cast its rules into the character of a code like those of the American Meetings." * * "Suffice it to say, that in the direction of what is called progress, they are not less liberal than those made on this side of the Atlantic. The important feature is the fact, that from early times the Society has been progressive and not stationary; that at all events, its constitution permitted modifications of its views of doctrine and duty, and its practice was to give expression from time to time to the views entertained."

From the above extracts may be seen the grounds which have been taken by the respective courts.

Judge Proudfoot concludes, "If progress in theology was recognized as a Quaker belief, it would be difficult to determine which were the Schismatics."

The Court of Appeal has taken the ground that to change doctrine and discipline is a constitutional right with the Quakers, therefore, identity of doctrine and discipline is out of the question. There can be no standard, because there is no limitation to changes. If there was any limitation to organic changes, such limit would be something like a standard. The only thing that is fundamental is the privilege of making changes. There can be no possible means of determining what the Society of Friends do believe. The plaintiffs may not admit that they have departed from the faith or principles of the Society of Friends. There can be no departures for a court to examine or judge of. Upon what ground, then, can the holding of property for meeting purposes be established? The ever varying current of opinion must rule the title. The property at West Lake, the immediate subject of said litigation, has a clause in a confirmatory deed which refers to unity with London Yearly Meeting. That unity is made by the Court of Appeal, the ground of identity. To establish that plea in accordance with their own right to change, London Yearly Meeting is presented as being very changeable in character, and its yearly enunciations so wanting in intelligence that the true meaning cannot be understood. It would seem by the verdict of the Court of Appeal, that the whole system has more of anarchy than order. This is the kind of redress which the appellants have sought and obtained.

The unlimited power to change, which is accorded to London Yearly Meeting, by the Court of Appeal, allows that body to become unitarian. In that case, its attitude would be such that the title to the said property would revert to the Hicksites at West Lake. This would be both the legal and logical result from the basis which the Court of Appeal have taken, at the instance of those in Canada who are in union with the plaintiffs to the suit. The injustice which follows to the character of the principles and organization of the Society of Friends is very great. The wresting from those who cannot abandon their religious principles, the property acquired for religious uses is oppressive.

Persons have a right to change their religious principles, but it is unjust for them to impose those changes upon others, or to deprive them of property because they do not follow in those changes.

Improvements in Dwelling-Houses—A writer in The American calls attention to various points in which improvements might be made in the construction of dwelling-houses. He says the spaces between joists and rafters and those between the lathing and the walls, and those which separate the studs of our partitions, furnish a vast interior net-work of commodious abodes for rats, mice, roaches and other vermin; much of which might be removed by laying the joists flat, instead of on edge, as is now done in many factories. That hollow, external walls properly bonded together are far more effective in keeping out damp than solid walls; that water-closets should be as far removed as possible from the living rooms, and when practicable, so situated as to be approached through a corridor or piazza open to the weather; and that a layer of some material impervious to damp should be placed in the walls just above the ground.

Alaska Explorations.—The exploring expedition which was despatched to explore the Mt. St. Elias alps by the New York Times, succeeded in reaching a height of 7200 feet in the ascent of that mountain, but was stopped there by the almost perpendicular wall of descending glaciers. As the snow-line in that latitude is but little above the sea-level, this is claimed to be the greatest distance ever reached above the snow-line, but it still leaves over 10,000 feet of the mountain's height unexplored. The other results of the expedition are notable, and serve to show the extreme ignorance of Alaskan geography which exists. Lieut. Schwatka and his party began their exploration by ascending Icy bay, a small indentation of the coast nearly opposite Mt. St. Elias, and were surprised to find a river flowing into it of a mile to a mile and a half in width. The party considered that a river of this size could not possibly come from the narrow watershed of the coast, hence supposed that it must break through the coast range and drain an inland watershed. Nothing however has heretofore been known of such river or of a gap in the coast range by which it could escape. This river was christened Jones River, after the proprietor of the Times. On each side of the river are two enormous glaciers, the one on the east side being estimated by the party at from fifteen to twenty miles wide, and some fifty miles long, while that on the west side is said to be hardly inferior in size. They were named respectively Agassiz and Guyot glaciers. They push their streams of ice clear across the Jones River in several places, making bridges by which the party was enabled to cross from bank to bank, and at other places ran directly into the forest, crushing to splinters trees that stood in their way. Another immense glacier at the foot of Mt. St. Elias was named the Tyndall glacier, and it was from this that the party attempted the further ascent of the mountain. The scenery of this region is reported to be incomparably grand, utterly dwarfing anything in the European Alps. The party returned to Icy Bay without attempting a further ascension of the mountain, but bearing numerous observations, scientific records, photographs, sketches, charts, &c., which are said to be of great value, and an ample compensation for the expense and trouble of the expedition.—The American.

A new Gas-burner.—The Independent says:—A new gas-light has recently been introduced in Germany which bids fair to rival the electric light in brilliancy, and equal kerosene in economy of cost. The Aver burner is made by soaking a cylinder of coarse cotton cloth in solutions of certain metallic salts, as zircon, magnesia, &c., which, when ignited, do not fuse, but become incandescent. This cylinder is placed over the flame of an ordinary Bunsen burner, which, as is well known, consists of gas mixed with sufficient air to give a complete combustion, as is evinced by the disappearance of the luminous flame and the formation of a blue one. The cotton burns off in a few seconds, leaving the metallic salts and the ash in the form of the coarsely woven cloth. This mineral wick is heated to a white heat by the flame, and becomes strongly incandescent, sending out a light which, in power, resembles the electric light. The life of the Aver lamp is from 600-1,000 hours.

The calculations and experiments which have been made, seem to show that gas applied in this way will yield nearly five times the amount of light given out by burners of the ordinary construction.

Prevention of Disease by Disinfection.—From a paper on disinfection by Dr. H. Hartshorne, read before the State Sanitary Convention in Fifth Month last, we extract the following abstract of a report made by Dr. C. W. Wight, Health Officer of Detroit, Mich.:—

"Finding the sewerage of Detroit in a bad condition, with a great deal of mortality from diphtheria, scarlet-fever and analogous diseases he went to work vigorously, and, with the aid of citizens, put into the 200 miles of the city's sewers a large quantity of sulphate of iron. He also burned in the sewer manholes, under cover, three tons of sulphur, the gas from which was found to pass freely through the whole drainage system of the town. In such close connection with this disinfection, that it must be reasonably regarded as its effect, there followed a marked diminution in the number of cases of, and deaths from, diphtheria and scarlet fever—in fact, almost a total cessation of those diseases."

Crow Roosts.—An interesting article on this subject in the American Naturalist, by Samnel N. Rhoads, expresses the belief that fully two-thirds of all the common crows in North America roost at night, during the winter, in the part of New Jersey which is comparatively near to Philadelphia. The number of these birds residing there in the summer is largely increased in winter by partial migration from New England and the Western States.

The nearest of these roosting places to Philadelphia is near Merchantville, about 5 miles from that city. The number that nightly assemble there is estimated at from 150,000 to 200,000. As the afternoon wears away, they come from all quarters in broken lines and detachments, and collect on some of the fields or woodland tracts not far from their chosen resting place, which is some half-grown oak timber. Here, their clamor is incessant and almost deafening, until the time arrives for settling for the night, when successive companies take wing and in silence betake themselves to the roost, flying low as if to escape observation.

Animal Intelligence.—F. Lewis of Ceylon sends the following incidents to Nature:

In a neighbor's bungalow, in this district, two of our common house-swallows built their nest on the top of a hanging lamp in the dining-room. The lamp is raised or depressed by chains fixed to a central weight. These chains pass over pulleys fixed to a metal disc above, on which the nest was placed. The swallows saw that if the pulleys were covered with mud, moving the lamp up and down would destroy the nest; and to avoid this they built over each pulley a little dome, allowing sufficient space for the pulley and chain in the hollow beneath it, without danger to the nest, which was fully constructed and the young birds safely reared.

During the dry weather I have been annoyed by wasps building up with mud, keyholes, sometimes keys, blank cartridge cases and even a penholder. As I did not care to have my gun charged with young wasps, I used to empty out my cartridge case which I found closed up with mud. One in particular, I had left on my office table, and each time the wasps closed it up, I drew the charge of mud and grubs, &c.; but as frequently the wasp closed it up again. I may mention that the wasp used to deposit an egg, and several small grubs in a cell, close over the top, and repeat the operation till the case was full, when the month would be pasted over with a lid of mud. As I repeatedly knocked out the grubs and mud, it appears that the wasp started a fresh plan. I noticed somewhat to my surprise that the mouth of a cartridge, I had shortly before emptied, pasted over. I removed the lid, still damp, and found nothing inside. I am unable to say if this was done to direct my attention to one particular cartridge-case or not while another spot was being used, but I am inclined to believe such to be the case, for later I noticed a gap between two bundles of letters in one of my pigeon-holes well built up with mud, and, of course, as well packed with grubs.

—Procuring Ministers.—One of the difficulties (from which Friends are happily free) attending the administration of church affairs among some denominations of Christians, is the selection and procuring of pastors or ministers who shall be acceptable to the congregation. If the vacant position is a desirable one, either from the salary attached to it, or the social position or influence it gives its occupant, or for other reasons, it may be sought by several persons, whose respective merits will be canvassed by the congregation in need of a preacher. It is a frequent practice, in such cases, to invite different persons to come and preach for them, so that an opportunity may be given for testing their ability. The Presbyterian mentions that in supplying the pulpit for one of the Presbyterian congregations in Troy, instead of calling the people together and taking a vote as usual, the Session issued a circular-letter to the members, proposing the election of a certain person, and requesting each one to indicate their preference by attaching a mark opposite one of the three words, "yes, no, undecided."

Where a preacher's comfortable settlement in life, and the maintenance of his family depend upon the impression his services make on the people, it must be very difficult to have the mind so centred upon the alone source of Gospel ministry, as to preach only the preaching which the Lord bids, and to be preserved from prostituting that sacred engagement to other and more unworthy motives than the simple performance of the Divine will.

—Slavery in Cuba.—In the Chamber of Deputies, at Madrid, Seventh Month 28th. — Labra moved a resolution that the government free as soon as possible the remaining 26,000 slaves in Cuba. The government agreed to the resolution, and it was passed unanimously. The President of the Chamber congratulated the members on the "crowning of the glorious work of the abolition of slavery."

—Demoralizing Art.—"We say unhesitatingly that it is the plain duty of every pure-minded person to show pure-mindedness in the books and the pictures which are chosen for a place in the family circle, and for one's personal enjoyment. No claim of 'art' can make indecency decent. No claim of 'a love of art' can make a love of indecency an excusable taste."—S. S. Times.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 23, 1886.

A member of Iowa Yearly Meeting (the Smaller Body) has kindly forwarded an account of its sittings, from which the following is taken:

The Iowa Yearly Meeting (Smaller Body) commenced at North Branch on Fifth-day morning, the 30th of Ninth Month, with a meeting of "Ministers and Elders," in the morning at 8 o'clock; at 11, a meeting for worship; and at 3 p. m., the Meeting for Sufferings. The meeting for discipline met on Sixth-day, the first instant, at 10 o'clock. The Clerk being absent, Clarkson T. Penrose was appointed for the day, and afterwards for the present year.

Interesting and encouraging epistles were received from Kansas, Western, Ohio, Canada, and New England Yearly Meetings, which were all responded to at a future sitting.

The subject of joining Hickory-Grove Quarterly Meeting with Springdale or Iowa Yearly Meeting was introduced, and goodwill therewith was freely expressed; and a committee was appointed to co-operate with and assist the Ohio Yearly Meeting's Committee in bringing about that desirable union in a right way, and time.

The meeting was brought into much exercise in considering the state of Society, that we might manifest a truly Christian spirit towards each other, and all men; that we might know that living faith which works by love to the purifying of the heart; and that we might be stirred up to a watchful care over ourselves, and to a support of the good testimonies of this Society.

Some changes of wording in discipline, were proposed by the Meeting for Sufferings, a few of which were approved. One was, to have the Yearly Meeting commence on Fourth-day, one day earlier. Though a care was evident on the minds of Friends, not to lower the standard of discipline.

The Committee on Education reported one school for three months. A committee was appointed and $100 placed at their discretion to encourage schools, under the care of Friends.

The business was conducted with much unity and conciseness, and the meeting adjourned under a sense of our Heavenly Father's goodness to us.

ROBERT KNOWLES.

We received some weeks ago, from our friend Adam Spencer, of Canada, a statement of some of the principles involved in the conflicting judgments in the case of Dorland vs. Jones, as given by Judge Proudfoot, in the lower Court, and by the Judges in the Court of Appeal. This statement seems to be clearly drawn up, and to be calm in its tone; but we deferred publishing it because there was then some prospect of a settlement being arrived at without further litigation. The plaintiffs in the case, who had originally brought the suit, and thus involved Friends of West Lake (and indeed of other parts of Canada) in much suffering and expense; and on whom, therefore, the responsibility for the legal contest mainly rested; had, either of their own motion, or through the advice of others, made a proposition for an amicable adjustment of the question of property. From the statement furnished by Arnold Haight, to "The Friend" of Tenth Mo. 9th, we infer there is some doubt as to these negotiations being successfully carried through. We have, therefore, concluded to publish the article of Adam Spencer (which will be found in our present number), as it may assist our readers in understanding the legal aspects of the case.

A letter from a member of the Western Yearly Meeting (Smaller Body) to a friend in Philadelphia, says that the litigation respecting the property at Sugar Grove, near Plainfield, Indiana, was closed on the 7th inst., by an agreement between the committees of the two Meetings for Sufferings. This agreement, however, has yet to be ratified by the Meetings for Sufferings themselves.

By the terms of the agreement, the Friends of the Smaller Body are to keep possession of the Meeting House properties at Sugar Grove, Spring, and Poplar Grove, and to be paid the sum of $600. The Friends of the Larger Body are to have the other Meeting Houses, &c. All bequests are to remain as now held, and the costs of the suit are to be shared equally.

A letter from another one of the members of the Western Yearly Meeting (Smaller Body) states that "some Friends seemed a little straitened, fearing it might be regarded as a compromise of principle, but Friends seemed generally to remember that we held it to be right to arbitrate all claims relative to property."

If this unpleasant controversy should now terminate, as seems probable, we hope there may be an increased care to guard against the spirit of the world, and to depend on Heavenly Wisdom and the overruling Power of the Head of the Church; so that there may be growth in spiritual life, and the Church may be able to say to those outside of its pale, "Come and have fellowship with us, for truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son, Jesus Christ."

An article recently written by a clergyman of the Church of England, expresses his opinion on the subject of Apostolical succession and Episcopal ordination, and uses the following language: "Without bishops, no priests; without bishops and priests, no legitimate certainty of sacraments; without sacraments, no certain union with the mystical body of Christ, i. e., his Church; without that union, no certain union with Christ, and therefore no certain hope of salvation."

We think the members of the Society of Friends have cause to be thankful, that they are not compelled to place their hope of salvation on such broken reeds as the doctrine of the Apostolical succession, or the partaking of any outward rite; but that they have been taught to look to and depend upon Christ alone, who visits the children of men by the gracious inshining of his divine light and power, which works the salvation of all those who receive Him in this way of his coming, and faithfully abide under his government. "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me; and I give unto them eternal life."

The Episcopal Recorder, although devoted to the interests of a Church which uses a liturgy in its public worship, yet depreciates the adoption of ritualistic and liturgical forms by those denominations among which they have hitherto not been practised. It thinks they will gain nothing by forsaking "the plainer and simpler ways of the fathers, honored of God, and useful as they have proved to be for the conversion and edification of souls in the past." Its advice to all is, to "Be themselves," and not to imitate others.

We think its advice contains a caution, which some persons, under the name of "Friends," but not fully upholding its principles, would do well to consider.

We have received two communications on Photographs, called forth by the article in "The Friend" of Ninth Mo. 18th, headed "Little Foxes." One of these endorses that article; the other looks at the question from a different standpoint. Its writer believes that, if we walk carefully and watchfully, light will be given to every one, and "the guiding finger of Truth" will be manifested in each heart, in regard to these things.

We are willing to let the subject rest here, without further discussion.

The Youth's Meeting, appointed by Concord Quarterly Meeting, was held at West Chester, Pa., on Tenth Month 5th. It was a large and crowded gathering; many of the younger members of the Quarterly Meeting being present. There were several appearances in testimony and supplication; and it is said to have been a favored and satisfactory meeting.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President of the United States, on the 13th instant, issued a proclamation revoking the suspension of the discriminating customs imposed and levied on the products of and articles proceeding under the Spanish flag from Cuba and Porto Rico. The proclamation is issued upon proof that "higher and discriminating duties continue to be imposed and levied in said ports upon certain produce, manufactures or merchandise imported into said ports from the United States or from any foreign country, in vessels of the United States, than is imposed and levied on the like produce, manufactures or merchandise carried to said ports in Spanish vessels."

The strike of the packing house workmen in Chicago was formally ended on the 18th instant. The strikers held a mass meeting on the prairie about 3 o'clock, p. m., at which 12,000 or 14,000 were present. A proposition to return to work on the ten-hour plan was carried almost unanimously, and the strike was declared at an end.

It is reported from the Indian Territory that prairie fires have devastated millions of acres of rich grazing lands, extending "from Vineta on the north to Muskogee on the south, and on either side of the Missouri and Texas Railroad as far as the eye can see." Large numbers of cattle have been burned to death, and immense quantities of hay, baled and loose, which was to have been used for fodder during the winter, has been destroyed.

There was a sharp earthquake shock at Summerville, South Carolina, at 8 o'clock on the evening of the 15th inst. No damage was done.

The villages of Sabine Pass, Johnson's Bayou and Taylor's Bayou, on the dividing line between Texas and Louisiana, were swept away by the storm and high tides on the 12th instant. "Out of more than 150 houses in Sabine Pass, less than six remain standing, and they are ruined. The waves broke against the lighthouse in solid walls fifty feet high, tearing out the windows at the very top of the structure." It is feared that 250 persons in all have lost their lives.

An examination of the country back of Sabine, and immediately in the vicinity of Beaumont, shows that the salt water came back from the coast fully forty miles through the swamps, and hundreds of thousands of acres are still submerged by water that was forced back and has no outlet.

Carcasses of thousands of drowned cattle, hogs, horses and fowl, are strewn everywhere, and clouds of seagulls and buzzards hover over the desolated country for an area of thirty square miles.

A gale on the 14th instant did much damage to property in various places, particularly on the Lakes. At Buffalo about forty small dwellings were destroyed by the winds and waves, and five lives were lost.

It is reported that 40,000 head of cattle, belonging to the St. Louis syndicate, in Northern Montana, have perished because of the drought. The loss is estimated at $24,000.

Reports from different sections of Berks County, Penna., show great damage from the drought, which is said to be "the severest for over twenty years." Many fields will have to be replowed and resown. Wells are drying up, and in some places farmers are compelled to haul water from long distances.

It is estimated by prominent grape-growers of Hammondsport, New York, that 500 tons of grapes were frozen on the vines on the shores of Lake Keuka, on the night of the 16th inst. The mercury went down to 20 degrees. The varieties frozen were principally Catawba, Concord and Diana.

A national convention of brewers and liquor dealers met in Chicago on the 18th instant. Seventeen States were represented. The chairman explained that the object of the convention was "to make the liquor business as respectable as possible. The delegates present were men who were as thoroughly opposed to the dives and disreputable places where liquor selling was carried on as any other class of citizens." He might have stated that the State of Massachusetts has officially reported the death-rate from alcohol within her borders in 1885, was 6.3; and that in 1867 it was 2.6.

During Ninth Month the letter carriers at the Philadelphia Post-office delivered 8,866,092 letters and postal cards, and 2,111,580 newspapers, and collected $3,42,550 letters and postal cards and 1,035,900 newspapers.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 398, which was 83 more than the previous week, and 59 more than during the corresponding week last year. Of the whole number 208 were males and 198 females; 56 died of consumption; 28 of diseases of the heart; 22 of marasmus; 21 of debility; 21 of pneumonia; 18 of croup; 16 of old age, and 16 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½ 112½; 4's, 129; 3's, 100½; currency 6's, 126 a 136.

Cotton sold in a small way to spinners on a basis of 9½ cts. for midding uplands.

Petroleum was quiet but firm, at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Feed was firm on scarcity, but demand was only moderate. Sales of 4 cars at $14.50 a $15 per ton for western winter bran, and $15.25 for fancy southern do.

Flour and Meal.—Trade in flour continued slow and unsatisfactory, and prices favored buyers. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania family, at $3.65; 250 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4; 375 barrels Ohio and Illinois, straight, at $4.25; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.50 a $4.60; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $3.50, and 500 barrels do. patent, at $4.60 a $4.85. Rye flour was quiet but steady, at $3.25 per barrel for choice.

Grain.—Wheat declined ¾ a 1c. No. 2 red closed at 82½ cts. bid and 82½ cts. asked. Corn was dull; No. 2 mixed closing at 43½ cts. bid and 44½ cts. asked. Oats were quiet and steady; No. 2 white closed at 34½ cts. bid, and 34 cts. asked.

Beef cattle were in too heavy supply and declined ¼c., at 3 a 5½ cts.

Sheep were fair at 1½ a 4½ cts. Lambs were active at 4 a 6½ cts.

Hogs were brisk. Western, 6½ a 7 cts.; State, 6 a 6½ cts.

FOREIGN.—On the night of the 15th instant, the wind which had been blowing all day, increased to a hurricane, the storm extending over the entire southwest coasts of England and Ireland. Serious damage to shipping is reported at Falmouth, Cowes, Plymouth and other places, and one steamer, if not two are believed to have been lost.

The French Government has demanded that China shall not restrict the trade in opium in Yun-Nan and Tonquin.

There is a growth of the war feeling in France. The Boulanger party have begun the issue of two new journals, La Revanche and Le Soldat La Bourneur, to advocate an offensive policy in vindication of the military prestige of France. General Boulanger, however, disowns any connection with the papers.

The Militaire says that General Boulanger desires war, not for the purpose of recovering Alsace, not to gratify personal ambition, but as a step leading to the solution of social questions.

Madrid, Tenth Month 18th.—The Cabinet will to-day consider President Cleveland's proclamation in relation to Cuban imports. It is hoped that the conflict will be smoothed out, but there is a unanimity of opinion here that Spain should be firm in support of the interests of Cuba.

The journals warn Bulgaria against electing a Prince until the Powers have agreed upon the most suitable person to select. They also counsel her to abstain in every way from provoking Russia.

The elections in Bulgaria for members of the Great Sobranje have resulted in the return of 480 Government candidates, of 26 members of the Zankoff party and of 15 adherents of Karaveloff.

Russia has presented another note to the Bulgarian Government, declaring the recent elections illegal, and demanding the postponement of the meeting of the Sobranje. The Government refuses to yield.

The Novoe Vremya says the time is now auspicious for France to raise the Egyptian question, and declares that Russia will not hinder her.

Private advices received in San Francisco report the cholera still ravaging Corea. In Seoul, a city of 200,000 inhabitants, the death rate has reached the frightful average of 1000 per day. The task of attempting to bury the dead has been abandoned.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Ninth Mo. 28th, 1839. Strength was given this morning to intercede, that the cloud which has for days rested upon me might be dispelled. Then to feel this morning, my heart softened and access granted, has caused all within me to bow; secretly craving a removal of hindering things, and that my Heavenly Father's will be more often manifested.

30th. Humbled under a sense of how I am cared for!

Tenth Mo. 5th. At our Monthly Meeting to-day we had the company of our dear aged friend John Letchworth; also dear Sarah Hillman. John has a minute to visit the Monthly Meetings in our Quarter, and Sarah the Particular Meetings. Their labors amongst us, I trust, will be remembered by some of us. Their communications were short but lively. John pressed upon us the necessity of seeking durable riches, even that which will stand by us when everything else fails. The young people were the particular objects of his concern; holding out to these the invitation: "The Spirit and the bride say, Come," &c. Living, saving faith, was Sarah's concern; sweetly did she comfort the Lord's poor afflicted servants. May we all show our gratitude by doubling our diligence.

Eleventh Mo. 3rd. Came to the city on a little visit to my friends. I attended this morning the North Meeting. Two strangers from New York State preached abundance. Meeting had hardly settled when they commenced, and they continued pretty much throughout. A more painful meeting, I think, I never sat. It seemed to me, nothing but death reigned. Silent waiting never felt to me more precious. I longed to be in our own little meeting at home. At the afternoon meeting we were favored with quietness. All present must have been sensible of its value. A dear old Friend told us, it needed not words to set forth the preciousness of silence.

4th was their Quarterly Meeting; which I also attended, craving the presence and care of our Heavenly Parent, and that He would bless our provision, &c. It felt to me, that good was very near, if we would only lie low enough to receive it. Our dear friend, Elizabeth Evans, was excellent in testimony, reviving: "We have an altar whereof they have no right to eat who serve the tabernacle," upon which she enlarged instructively. For the encouragement of the young people she rehearsed the account we have of Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego, with their love and faithfulness to their God. They knew that He was able to deliver, even in the midst of the burning fiery furnace. She assured us that He remains as able as ever He was to help and rescue his children, however they may be proved; even though the furnace be heated seven times more than it was wont to be heated. She believed there were not a few present of the visited and called children of our Heavenly Father; and encouraged them to keep near their dear Lord, &c., &c. Elizabeth Pitfield followed in solemn supplication; craving that a broken and contrite spirit might be more and more given us. Then Thomas Kite delivered a short testimony, quoting: "There is therefore, now, no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus," &c.

5th. Attended the week-day meeting for the Northern District. There were two short communications near the close of the meeting. The first Friend that spoke, whom I did not know, arose with: The precious solemnity that covered the meeting was a renewed evidence that we are not a forsaken people, however great, at times, our discouragements may be, &c. S. Hillman followed; with the expression of her belief that there were dear young people present, who had felt the wages of sin to be death, but the gift of God to be eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Such were encouraged to press forward; and reminded that the good Shepherd goeth before his sheep, and hath declared, He knows them and is known of them. Again, "As the Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father, and I lay down my life for the sheep; and other sheep I have, which are not of this fold, them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice, and there shall be one fold and one shepherd."

6th. The week-day meeting at Orange street I attended, though under discouraged feelings. Wm. Evans had excellent service, reviving: "My covenant was with him of life and peace, and I gave it to him for the fear wherewith he feared me, and was afraid before my name." Addressing those advanced in life, said, what an unspeakable favor it was, at the winding up of time, when all things here cease yielding any consolation, to have this covenant of life and peace! He entered into tender sympathy with tried states present, who had seasons of darkness and distress to pass through, and encouraged these to remember that His covenant is with the night, and as well as with the day; and also that "The foundation of God standeth sure," &c.

28th. My heart was made to overflow, under a sense of the kindness and love of our Heavenly Father towards our little company. I do believe He is very near, waiting to bless, if there was only a willingness on our part to draw nigh unto Him. A little foretaste was this day given of what glorious meetings we should have were this more our concern. My feeble prayer has been, make me, O dearest Father, whatever Thou seest fit. Grant an evidence of forgiveness for multiplied sins and transgressions, which seem at times almost ready to overwhelm.

First Mo. 29th, 1840. This day was Select Meeting. At which our friends had the company of dear Jacob Green, from Ireland. He dined with us, in company with several others; and in a little family sitting had something to communicate, especially to our dear mother. He believed she had verified the truth of the precious declaration: A judge of the widow, and a father of the fatherless, is God in his holy habitation. He spoke comfortingly to us children, saying: Think nothing too near or too dear to part with, to become lambs of the flock and fold of our Heavenly Father.

30th. Our Monthly Meeting. Our dear friend J. Green still with us. He quoted: "O that thou hadst hearkened unto my commandments, then had thy peace been as a river, and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea." Some present were urged, in a very impressive manner, to hearken diligently that their souls might live, &c., &c. A loud call went forth to the careless and indifferent, to leave the perishing, fading gratifications of time, and seek for themselves durable riches. He urged us to be not ashamed to be found followers of the meek and lowly Lamb, showing faith by works. He set forth the peace that would flow to the willing and obedient, even that which the world, with all its pleasures and treasures, cannot give or take away. The needy and afflicted children of our Heavenly Father were sweetly remembered. He believed there were those who, like Mary formerly, were weeping at the sepulchre, and saying secretly, within themselves, "who shall roll us away the stone?" O, he did believe that such as these, though they might at times feel very poor, were under the immediate care and protection of Israel's Shepherd; and as they keep near Him, He will never leave nor forsake them. He revived the language to this class: "Lovest thou me more than these?" and the subsequent command would be, if these kept faithful, "Feed my lambs." How have I craved for myself, and my young friends, that we may treasure up the favors of this day, and profit by them.

Second Mo. 4th. Came to the city yesterday, with my dear mother, and attended Orange St. Meeting. Dear E. Evans arose with this passage of Scripture: "No man having put his hand to the plough and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of heaven;" and that however tried and proved we may at times be, 'tis very unsafe to cast away our faith and confidence. Remember, she says, "The just are to live by faith; and if any man draw back my soul shall have no pleasure in him." Early after taking her seat amongst us, the circumstance of the children of Israel journeying from the land of Egypt to Canaan, had been brought to her remembrance, she believed for the encouragement of some now present. The trials, the difficulties they had to encounter! &c., and often had they to walk by faith and not by sight. She thought there was no need for discouragement in any, &c. She also adverted to the ten men that were sent to spy out this good land: that there were only two of them, Caleb and Joshua, that brought back a true and faithful account! So it was even to the present day; and greatly did she desire and plead with us that there might be none found amongst us turning back, like a deceitful bow; for if this was the case, the Lord would have no pleasure in them. This has been a season of instruction to me; and hope I may profit by it. In the afternoon proceeded to Evesham, where we attended their Monthly Meeting; which was to me an interesting occasion. The first part was held in silence. In the last, our friend H. W. was excellent to parents, respecting the right care over their precious children. She believed, if they were not careful to bring them up in the Truth, that it would be required of them, when the language should go forth, what hast thou done with those lambs I committed to thy care? &c. The subject was a very solemn one, and so felt, I trust, by many mothers present.

9th. Found strength to-day in pouring out my tears before my Heavenly Father. Felt the privilege of thus sitting down to wait upon the Lord, after a week of busy, bustling care.

13th. From the feelings that have attended my mind for months past, and afresh this morning, I believe greater would be my peace had I yielded to an apprehension of duty to enter as a teacher at Westown School. But there has been a "choosing of my own path," which has tended to land me in weakness and distress. A willingness is now wrought to go where way opens; or to embrace with gladness any thing that will help me forward in my good journey, or so that peace may be mine.

For "The Friend."

My Favorite Swamp.

The poet Montgomery says:—

"In rustic solitude 'tis sweet
The earliest flowers of spring to greet,—
The violet from thy tomb,
The strawberry, creeping at our feet,
The sorrel's simple bloom."

This is true, as many can testify, but rambles which are undertaken later in the season have their charms also; and the flowers of summer, as well as of spring, are able to awaken pleasurable emotions in the lover of nature.

On the afternoon of Seventh Mo. 3d, I sought the recesses of a favorite swamp, the richest locality for plants which the progress of cultivation has left untouched within a moderate walk of our village. Soon after leaving my home, I passed a Locust tree, and observed a small withered branch hanging from it, which readily came off with a slight pull. On examining the point where it had parted from the tree, I found it had been eaten nearly off by some insect which had burrowed into its substance. Other branches were also seen to be perforated by the same destroyer, and the bark of the tree was sprinkled with the sawdust which had fallen from the holes made by these insects. This enemy of the Locust is the grub of a very beautiful beetle, the perfect insect is velvet-black in color, ornamented with transverse yellow bands, and about three-fourths of an inch in length. In the Ninth Month they may be found collected on the Locust trees "coursing up and down the trunks in pursuit of their mates, or to drive away their rivals, and stopping every now and then to salute those they meet, with a rapid bowing of the shoulders, accompanied by a creaking sound." The eggs which they lay are soon hatched, and the grubs bore into the tree. The following summer they change into beetles, which soon disappear after laying their eggs. This species is known as the Painted Clytus (Clytus pictus).

There is another, rather larger species, called the Beautiful Clytus (Clytus speciosus), which in a similar manner bores into the Sugar Maple, and in some sections of the country has proved very destructive. I have not observed any traces of it as yet in our neighborhood, though its painted cousin is so abundant that it is rare to find a Locust that is uninjured. This is to be regretted, for the wood of this tree is as valuable as its foliage is elegant.

A little beyond the Locust tree was a Spruce, whose foliage attracted notice by its unhealthy look. On closely examining the leaves, I found many of them dotted over with white shelly cases, in shape like a grain of rice, but only about one-sixteenth of an inch in length. In them were cast-off skins, but I know not what is the form of the perfect insect, nor whether they are hurtful to the tree.

Leaving behind the lively, but noisy English Sparrows that inhabit the village; I saw by the road side the still smaller, and domestic Chipping Sparrow, with its head crowned with chestnut. Along the water-courses the Song Sparrow, with its white breast prettily streaked with dark brown, flitted among the bushes, and occasionally poured forth its sweet song. Another sparrow of about the same size, but showing a white feather on each side of the tail as it flies, I supposed to be the Grass Sparrow. The Robins were about; and the peculiar note of the Cuckoo or Rain-bird sounded from the taller trees. The Red-winged Blackbird complained of the intrusion of an unwelcome stranger, and as he slowly flew backward and forwards over the meadow, displayed the beautiful scarlet shoulder-pieces, which relieve the general blackness of his plumage. As I wandered along a run of water, I heard the cry peet weet, peet weet of a water-bird, and soon I saw his once familiar form on the fence, near by, balancing his tail after the fashion of this bird. I suppose it was the same species which William Bartram once observed courageously defending its young against the attacks of a Ground Squirrel. "The place was on the river shore. The female had thrown herself, with her two young behind her, between them and the land; and at every attempt of the enemy to seize them by a circuitous sweep, she raised both her wings almost perpendicularly, and assuming this formidable appearance, rushed towards the squirrel, who, intimidated by this show of resistance, instantly retreated, but soon returning, was met as before, in front and flank by the resolute bird, who with her wings and plumage bristled up, seemed swelled to twice her usual size. The young crowded together behind her, sensible of their peril, moving backwards and forwards as she advanced or retreated. In this way the contest endured for about ten minutes, when, as the strength of our little heroine began to fail, the friendly presence of Bartram put an end to the unequal and doubtful contest."

In the bushes that bordered the swamp, the familiar song of the Maryland Yellow-throat awakened pleasant emotions. This is one of the few of the warblers that raise their young in our latitude, as most of the members of this numerous family seek more northern climes for this purpose. Its general color is a yellow-olive above, and bright yellow beneath, and it has a broad and conspicuous patch of black on the front, extending back over the eyes. Its favorite haunt is among the briars and bushes in low and watery situations. Nuttall describes its song by the syllables, "wetitshee, wetit-shee, wee, which are uttered in a lively, earnest manner. In the same vicinity the active and graceful Catbird was flitting about; while in the deeper recesses of the adjoining woods the Wood Robin, one of the sweetest and most beloved of our songsters, poured forth his notes.

For "The Friend."

Oliver Sansom.

Some months after Oliver Sansom's return home from his visit to Ireland, his mind was much turned towards them. He says: "The remembrance of Friends in Ireland, and of my travels and labors amongst them in the Truth, was weighty upon my spirit; and in the sensible feeling of the renewings of the love and life of my God, which I had often enjoyed among them, my heart was overcome and greatly tendered towards them; so that I could not contain, but was thereby moved, and even constrained to visit them with an epistle."

In this epistle, written in the Fifth Month, 1677, along with other good advice, he gives the following exhortations:

"O Friends! watch and stand upon your guard, and hold fast your living fresh zeal for the cause of the Lord, and be valiant for his truth upon the earth."

"And all who do believe in the light of Jesus, and walk in it, as their minds are exercised in his life and love, the care of the Churches of Christ comes upon them daily, for the good of the whole body; that every member may keep his place in the body, and wait to know his office, even his work and service appointed by the Lord. And then, as the eye is kept single in the head, Christ Jesus, every one will be serviceable in his place; for there are no needless members in the body, no useless vessels in the house of our God; for as a gift is given to every particular one, so is a service as certainly required by the Lord of every individual, according to the gift given."

"And moreover, this is my testimony, that if true obedience be yielded to the inward leadings of the Holy Spirit, a Godly care and weighty concern for the prosperity of the blessed truth, and the preservation of all that are convinced of it, will certainly come upon everyone according to his measure."

About this time much trouble was caused to the Society of Friends, by the opposition made by some of its members, to the introduction of a system of discipline, and the establishment of men's and women's meetings for business. George Fox relates in his journal, how he was moved of the Lord to establish these meetings, so that the poor might be properly cared for, and all things kept orderly and reputable in the Church. But there were some who objected to them as infringements on individual liberty, and claimed that every individual should be left free to act according to his own sense of right, and without interference by others. Some of these, principally in the north of England, headed by John Story and John Wilkinson, went so far in the opposition as to bring great suffering upon faithful Friends, who saw the danger they were in. Among those who thus suffered, was Oliver Sansom, who mentions that he was at the Yearly Meeting in 1677, when a paper signed by many Friends was issued against this spirit of division. "I, being then at the said Yearly Meeting, and having a real concern upon my spirit against that rending spirit and its abettors, did in unity with my brethren, subscribe the said paper; which to this day I never had any reproof from the Lord for, but justification in. But oh! the bitter enmity and opposition in them which had joined with the aforesaid bad spirit, was so much the more fierce and violent against me in particular; because no other Friend in our county beside me had his hand to that paper. But although they strove to tread me down in their spite, yet the Lord upheld me, and still preserved me by His mighty power, which He was pleased to make known in my great weakness, and He gave me victory over that wicked spirit in its strongest instruments; blessed and praised be the name of my tender God, whose the power is, and unto Him alone the glory belongs forevermore. Amen.

"Yet this exercise and suffering from false brethren, who had received this spirit of contention, division and separation, was great and grievous, and also of long continuance upon faithful Friends of this county; the dividing work being promoted and carried on by some who had been of some note amongst Friends there; but are since gone out, and most of them yet continue out of the unity of Christ's Church, in a separation; having shut up the meeting-house doors against Friends who had a just right and property therein."

This O. S. speaks of as having been "the most grievous of exercises, and the hardest of trials or suffering."

Great endeavors were used by Friends for the enlightenment and restoration of those who had been misled. Some returned to unity and fellowship; and the separate meetings set up by others soon disappeared.

For some years, about this period, Oliver appears to have remained much at home. As it was a time of much persecution, he was repeatedly fined for preaching in meetings, and great spoil made of his goods. At one time, while he was in prison "for the testimony of Jesus," an officer came to his house, and he says, "seized and carried away all my shop goods, as linen cloth, fustians, tapes, filletings, laces and thread, even all they could light on, with brass, pewter, and other household goods, only when they were carrying it all away, he threw back a small brass kettle, saying he would leave that to boil the children's milk in; for I had then two children in my family, whereof one was a relation's daughter, and the other an orphan that was left to my care, as her guardian."

"Besides these goods, they took also out of my stable, a mare that was not mine, but borrowed of a Friend, and with her my bridle and saddle. And though the Friend, who was the owner of the mare, endeavored what he could to recover his mare again, yet he could not: for no justice could then be had; oppression and cruelty were the portion of faithful Friends at that time, while the informers were in power."

The Christian spirit in which his trials were borne, is beautifully shown in a letter to his wife from Reading Goal, in which he expresses the desire "that we may pass the time of our pilgrimage here according to the will of our God, and faithfully finish that testimony which He hath given us to bear, to the laying down of our heads in peace for ever, where the wicked cease from troubling, and where the weary are at rest; where the prisoners rest together and hear not the cry of their oppressors. Oh let us be cheerful, for it will not be long ere we come there, as we abide faithful and heed not the rage of the wicked, so as to be cast down at it; for our God, as we wait upon Him, will give us more strength to bear afflictions, than they shall be able to inflict upon us. Oh, it is a precious thing to be kept in the patient innocent spirit of Christ Jesus, which enables us to love our enemies and pray for our persecutors; when we are reviled not to revile again, but to commit our souls to Him who judged righteously, who is our faithful Creator, and mighty preserver, and the sure deliverer of all that trust in Him; who is the only wise omnipotent God, blessed forever. Amen."

The love for enemies, which he here commends, led Oliver Sanson to great plainness of speech in warning those who were engaged in the work of persecution. Observing two wicked informers at the Court of Quarter Sessions, he says, "I went to them and tenderly advised them, and warned them to forbear going on with their bad designs against their innocent neighbors. For they might assure themselves they could not prosper, neither would their expectations be answered; and if they did get our goods, it would be but little benefit to them; for thereby they would the sooner be brought to beggary. But they seemed much hardened, and it grieved me to behold that no tenderness at all did appear in them." Of these two men, he records that both became very poor; one died in a few years, leaving his children to be supported by the parish; and the other ran so far into debt, that he was afraid to show his face, and fled the country.

To Thomas Fettiplace, one of the persecuting justices, who had been unreasonably bitter against him, he wrote several letters of caution. In one of these he says, "Truly I have been concerned for thee, because of thy going on in persecution against God and his people; knowing that a bitter eup thou must come to drink from the Lord's hand, for the same, unless thou repent." "Be thou assured of this, that the Lord who searcheth the heart, hath thy life and breath in his hand, and will not be mocked by thee; but will give thee to reap according as thou sowest, and render thee a just reward according to thy works; and in his fear is this written for thy everlasting good; by him who hath learned to love and pray for enemies and persecutors."

Reminiscences of Rebecca Battey.

During her residence in South Starksboro it was her allotment to have to pass through some deep trials and provings, in which she had the sympathy of her many friends, and under which she was sustained by the never failing Arm. She was never very frequent in her public appearances, and for a time was mostly silent in religious meetings. But she was enabled to endure as seeing Him who is invisible; and again to minister in the life and in the greenness of her later and maturer years.

The United States Bank having failed, there was, at that period, no general banking system or express companies as at present. Banks were mainly independent, and their issues at a heavy discount, except in their own immediate vicinities. As a part of the proceeds of their services while at Tunessassa, the writer, accompanied by his wife, conveyed for R. Battey and her husband, one thousand dollars in gold, and some currency, in the doubled end of his trunk, from Philadelphia through New York, attending Yearly Meeting there, to Lincoln, Vt.

At a public meeting in the limits of Ferrisburg Monthly Meeting, where several ministers were present, one of them occupied most of the time in a communication more lengthy than usual for him. After meeting, he said to Rebecca, "I hope I was not standing in thy way to-day." She modestly replied, that "After what had been offered she thought she might be excused." But she afterwards told Phebe Taber, who was also present, that he did stand in her way; and the time being so much taken up she had to come away from the meeting bringing her burden with her.

If there is any one danger to which fluent speakers are more exposed than another, it is to extend their communications beyond the pointings of the Divine finger. Far better is a short, lively, living sermon in the demonstration of the spirit and of power; and after that, silence; than an extended communication, however eloquent or sound in word and doctrine, but beyond the authority immediate revelation alone can give.

A Few more Words as to Tobacco.

An article upon the subject of tobacco, which appeared in "The Friend" a few weeks ago, alluded to the indifference shown to the pleasure or comfort of others (to whom the smell of or smoke from tobacco might be nauseating) as the user of the weed became confirmed in his habit. This indifference, and the resultant discomfort, I have frequently both noticed and experienced; but perhaps at no time to such an extent as within the few days immediately previous to the perusal of the article referred to. Having occasion to take a steamer on Long Island Sound, and, again, on an inland lake, the anticipated pleasure of my wife, who accompanied me, was sadly marred by men who persisted in smoking wherever they pleased on the deck of the steamers.

While away, on the aforesaid brief trip, we stopped for a day in Boston, and took occasion to visit the State Penitentiary at Charlestown. The chaplain, in detailing a specially hopeful heart-change on the part of one of the prisoners, said, that in the hour that his exceeding sinfulness was revealed to him, he ejaculated that, if God was indeed willing to take away the filthiness of so wicked a person as he had been, the tobacco, which he had loved so long, must go with the rest. He straightway put it away from him, and has continued faithfully to abstain. (I may add, as to this man, and also as to one much younger, who had given similar unmistakable evidence of a change of heart, that the chaplain unhesitatingly said that the change in each case came about without any apparent human instrumentality. Yet they thence showed a concern to witness to the Truth before their companions in confinement.)

A writer in a late number of the Union Signal, narrated the following instructive incident. A certain person who felt much concerned at the way in which a friend of his spent his money for tobacco, went to him one day and asked him whether he would not be willing to relinquish the habit, if he could with the same money procure him a pleasure that was greater. His friend told him he thought he might save himself that trouble, as he didn't look for a greater pleasure, and at any rate he himself would have to be the judge in any such case. Being told that he certainly should be his own judge in the matter, he was taken to the lowly home of a suffering family, and allowed to minister to their wants in providing food and medicine, and by tendering a small payment on their rent money. This absorbed the amount of a week's tobacco indulgence; but the money was gladly contributed when the donor observed the real good that it did, and felt himself to be the unworthy recipient of the thanks that the benevolent act drew forth. This kind of experience was continued but a very few weeks, when the man threw aside his segars, declaring that he should not, upon any consideration, resume the habit, for he had indeed been brought to see that it was a far greater pleasure to minister to suffering humanity, than to waste one's money in selfish indulgence.

It was gratifying to note the recent action of the Evangelical Lutheran Synod, held in Pennsylvania, wherein they recorded their strong disapproval of the tobacco habit, and decided that none should thenceforth be accepted by the Synod as ministers, who were given to its use.

At the late North Carolina Yearly Meeting of Friends, the number reported as using tobacco appeared to me to be sorrowfully large. I have felt saddened whenever my mind has recurred to it, and the desire has been raised that the brethren in those parts may not permit their bodies and spirits to be brought into bondage to this unsatisfying and wasteful indulgence, lest their advancement in best things be checked, and their influence for good in the community be seriously interfered with. And may Friends everywhere give up the practice.

How to get Rid of Flies.

As Fall approaches, and country housekeepers are obliged to make fires in their dining, sitting-rooms and other apartments, they find themselves annoyed by the intrusion of flies from the kitchen and summer cooking-shed.

This little inmate, so attractive in the early spring, as the harbinger of lovely summer, with its pretty brown eyes, prismatic, gauzy, wings, and nimble feet—has multiplied itself a thousand-fold, and become through the hot season, in a measure, as the plague of Egypt.

Yes! Even in our tidiest homes, as the active head fills and replenishes her numerous traps, she is visited and revisited by fresh swarms from the stables until the unthinking conclude, that for every one that dies, a dozen take their places; and that her labor is in vain.

Such, no doubt, has been the experience of many a busy matron, till she wishes for some wholesale way of disposing of them, and feels her tender mercy shut against the whole family. She may have heard of insecticides and bellows, which seem of difficult application, and her spirit flags under this annual burden.

But relief has at last been found in the Persian Camomile—Pyrethrum Roseum! which can be purchased of our druggists; and after sundown, when the house-fly collects in groups for the night, she can visit them with doses of this powder, by filling a sweeping-brush with one or two teaspoonfuls, on a newspaper, and bringing it hastily over his nocturnal quarters.

As this unsettles them, they fly through the dust, filling their breathing organs with the poison, which soon beunumbs them, and in thirty minutes, or less, they fall to the floor.

Her discretion will then tell her to secure them, and while torpid, consign them to the fire, before time may revive them from their morbid condition.

Do not think, however, with this single success that the foe is conquered, for, like our natural propensities, they will appear, and reappear, while an embryo remains undeveloped, making repeated efforts necessary for their extinction.

For information respecting the properties and habits of this valuable plant—so helpful and yet harmless to the human species, we are indebted to the "Agricultural Report" from Washington, for 1882.

It is equally efficacious in destroying bugs and slugs—at least in ridding the plant of them, and it is hoped that ere long, it may be cultivated by farmers in defence of their roses, melons, currants, cabbages, &c.

This powder has been in use for many years in Asiatic countries. Its native locality is south of the Caucasus Mountains, and in Dalmatia. It was sold at a high price by the inhabitants, who kept its nature a secret until the beginning of this century, when an American merchant learned that it was obtained from dried and pulverized flower-heads, and began the manufacture of it in 1828. The exports were an important item in the revenue of those countries. It is a biennial, and has been grown with success in the neighborhood of Philadelphia and New York. Sown in the spring of one year, and it blooms in the summer of the following. It may also be applied as a decoction. In a closed room its effect is more powerful than outdoors. The powder should be kept in fruit jars with screw tops, or in any perfectly tight vessel or tin-box.

SAINT GREGORY'S GUEST.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

A tale for Roman guides to tell
To careless, sight-worn travellers still,
Who pause beside the narrow cell
Of Gregory on the Cleian Hill.

One day before the monk's door came
A beggar, stretching empty palms,
Fainting and fast-sick, in the name
Of the Most Holy, asking alms.

And the monk answered, "All I have
In this poor cell of mine I give,
The silver cup my mother gave;
In Christ's name, take thou it, and live."

Years passed; and called at last to bear
The pastoral crook and keys of Rome,
The poor monk, in St. Peter's chair
Sat, the crowned lord of Christendom.

"Prepare a feast," Saint Gregory cried,
And let twelve beggars sit thereat;"
The beggars came, and one beside,
An unknown stranger, with them sat.

"I asked thee not," the Pontiff spake,
"O stranger; but if need he thine
I bid thee welcome, for the sake
Of Him who is thy Lord and mine."

A grave, calm face the stranger raised,
Like his who on Gennesaret trod;
Or his on whom the Chaldeans gazed,
Whose form was as the Son of God.

"Know'st thou," he said, "thy gift of old?"
And in the hand he lifted up
The Pontiff marvelled to behold
Once more his mother's silver cup.

"Thy prayers and alms have risen, and bloom
Sweetly among the flowers of heaven.
I am the Wonderful, through whom Whate'er thou askest shall be given."

He spake and vanished. Gregory fell
With his twelve guests in mute accord
Prono on their faces, knowing well
Their eyes of flesh had seen the Lord.

The old-time legend is not vain;
Nor vain thy art, Verona's Paul,
Telling it o'er and o'er again
On gray Vicenza's frescoed wall.

Still wheresoever pity shares
Its bread with sorrow, want and sin;
And love the beggar's feast prepares,
The uninvited guest comes in.

Unheard, because our ears are dull,
Unseen, because our eyes are dim,
He walks our earth, the Wonderful,
And all good deeds are done to Him.

AUTUMN PEACE.

One word is breathed through falling leaves,
One word repeat the rustling sheaves,
As days grow brief and nights increase,
And gala voices cease.

It rules the woodland wrapped in haze,
The field that gave us wheat or maize,
The vineyard slope, the orchard row
Where heaped apples grow.

These no unsolaced wind shall fret,
Arousing them to fond regret;
No tree would now be green, no field
Regain its summer yield.

No plant would from the eager frost
Redeem one blossom it hath lost;
For now, fulfilled in seed or fruit,
Life houses at the root.

No bee its foded cell complete
Would change for summer's unstored sweet;
No bird the Maytime rapture thrilled,
Its nest would now rebuild.

O my Delight! We too are bent
In the soft waning year's content.
What though from far Youth's quickest bound
There comes a wooing sound?

Thou hearest, but thou wilt not grieve;
Though sweet the morn, more sweet is eve.
Say (thou, upon whose lips Love hung)
Thou wouldst not now be young!

One word is breathed through falling leaves,
One word repeat the rustling sheaves,
As days grow brief and nights increase;
That single word is "Peace."

Cloudless skies drop no rain. We may bathe ourselves in the unclouded sunshine for days and for weeks, thinking that, if the blue of the heavens were nevermore veiled by the blackness of storm, we at least would be perfectly satisfied. But as the unclouded days pass on, the parched earth begins to gape to heaven for water, the flowers fade, the grass is burned up, and men and beasts droop in the merciless heat, which now seems no longer the messenger of life, but the angel of death. For need like that there is no help in cloudless skies; the sign of deliverance rather comes in the livid thunder-cloud, the flashing lightning, and the pouring rain. There is a like need of the rain-cloud in the inner life. There is a parching and deadening influence even here in too much sunshine; and the storm-cloud of pain or of sorrow, which drenches our heart-soil with the rain of tears, alone makes possible the continued growth of that which is best in our heart-culture. We do right to thank God for cloudless days; but we do wrong if we do not thank Him also for days not cloudless. If the one gives the sunshine, the other gives the rain; and without either there would be no increase.—Selected.

If a man inquires, "What is the Lord's will concerning me?" enters upon that life prayerfully, and lives it religiously, he makes out of a common life a sacred calling. We draw a wrong line of distinction between the minister and the member in calling the one a sacred calling, the other a secular. Why is a mechanic, if he be in the place to which God called him, living a life commending Jesus, doing all things for God's glory, why is not his calling a sacred calling? It is said in reply, the mechanic and farmer may throw aside their vocations at any time, may move whither they please; but a minister is shut up to God's call. The answer must be, No, they cannot. We have cultivated that idea; but it is not in any just conception of the Christian life. No Christian man can begin any occupation, can leave any occupation, can make changes in his life, unless he lay the matter before the Lord, and take God into his counsels. It is not for him a matter of ease, or money-making, but, "What is God's will?"

If there be any clear conception of God's providence in the life and in the ordering of the steps, then this providence extends over all the business and through the seven days of the week.—Selected.

Extract from Joseph Oxley's Journal.

About this time, my dear uncle Edmund Peckover, laid before our Monthly Meeting a concern, which had been on his mind for a great many years, to pay a religious visit to the churches in America, and requested our approbation and certificate. It was a singularly moving time, and almost the whole meeting was broken into tears, so deeply exercised was all within him for the cause of righteousness, and for the prosperity of our Zion; he spoke with Divine power and authority, and the Lord's love and gracious regard was largely manifested to us that day.

My brother carried on his business till his return, which I believe he did as a faithful and just steward; and the Lord has richly and plentifully rewarded and blessed him for it, for which my mind is humbly made thankful at this time.

All things being in readiness, we, divers of us, went as far as Swaffham, twelve miles, at which place it was agreed, that Joseph Ransom and I should continue with him up to London. For which purpose Joseph Ransom and I turned back, after we had rode a few miles, to get some few necessities for our journey, and returned to our company as expeditiously as we well could. We found they had dined at Swaffham and gone from thence; still moving forward, we saw them at some distance going but a foot's pace and in much stillness. The nearer we approached, the more awful and solemn they appeared; when we got up with them, we found they were all retired into silence, and our spirits were also gathered and united with theirs in the holy solemnity. In this manner we continued some time, and then dear uncle made a full stop, and so did all the rest, and alighted from our horses; uncle being filled with the power and love of God, kneeled down on the wide heath, and supplicated the Almighty with that fervency of spirit, and we were all so affected and reached by the power of Truth, which was over all, as was to our inexpressible joy, consolation and comfort. This was a renewed confirmation and opportunity to dear uncle and us, of his concern being grounded upon a right bottom. I never at any time felt and enjoyed anything to the like degree as this; it was to us at that time, even as if the very heavens were opened, the fragraney thereof remains sweet in my remembrance to this day! In this heavenly frame, we saluted one another, whilst tears plentifully trickled down our cheeks — we knew not how to part, and yet it must be. Thus in much brokenness and contrition of soul and spirit, we took an affectionate leave one of another; but, indeed, we were so overcome as almost past utterance.

After some little time more, we mounted our horses and turned our backs one upon another, but the heavenly virtue still remaining with us, J. R. and I accompanying uncle towards London, and the other Friends and relations homewards. When at some distance, dear uncle turned about to take another look of his relations and Friends, and they also in like manner, shaking their heads and waving their hands, with hearts full up to the brim, bidding farewell; and even whilst he sorrowed, he rejoiced! So we passed on our journey filled with Divine love, that it was some considerable time before we fell into any matter of conversation.

The day is coming when this brief scene which we call life shall be slipping away from us. The time is not very far distant when somebody else will sit in your office, and another head will regulate your commercial transactions, and another person will make money out of that trade which you have been carrying on so well. You, my dear brethren, have scarcely found time to think about your soul perhaps, scarcely found time to attempt to commune with God, peradventure, scarcely found time to ask yourself whether you have got a soul. You will have to find time to lay on a sick bed, and you will have to find time to die. Think of that moment when the visions of this world shall grow thin and unsubstantial, and seem to melt away from your dying eye. Think of that moment when the busy sounds shall die upon your dulling ear, and sobbing friends beside your death-bed shall be unable to reach with their last duty that passing spirit of yours. Think of that step into the unknown. Are you ready for it? The just shall live by faith, and the just shall die in faith. Death has no terror for the man who has committed himself into the everlasting arms of love. He steps forward boldly into the unknown, without misgiving, and without fear. He knows that, whoever else is there, his Lord is there to meet him, and, having trusted Him in life he can trust Him in death. Having trusted Him for time, he leaves himself in His hands for all eternity. O men and brethren! you do not know what you lose when you lose the life of faith.—Selected.

A Critical Moment.

I was talking a few weeks ago with a clergyman at the West who said he returned to his father's house in Boston, and his brother, a son in the family, came in intoxicated; and he said when the intoxicated son had retired, "Mother, how do you stand this?" "Oh!" she said, "I have stood this a good while: but it don't worry me now. I found it was worrying me to death and I put the whole case in God's hands, and said, 'O God! I cannot endure this any longer, take care of my son, reform him, bless him, save him, and there I left the whole thing with God and I shall never worry again.'" "The next day," said the clergyman who was talking to me in regard to it, "I met my brother, and I said 'John, you are in an awful position.' 'How so?' said he. 'Why, mother has told me that she has left you with God, she doesn't pray for you any more.' 'Is that so? Well I can never contend with the Lord; I shall never drink again.'"

He never did drink again. He went to the far west; and at a banquet in St. Louis given to him, a lawyer just come to the city, there were many guests, and there was much wine poured, and they insisted that this reformed lawyer should take his glass of wine; and they insisted until it became a great embarrassment as they said to him: "Ah, you don't seem to have any regard for us, and you have no sympathy with our hilarities."

Then the man lifted the glass and said; "Gentlemen, there was in Boston some years ago, a man who, though he had a beautiful wife and two children, fell away from his integrity and went down into the ditch of drunkenness. He was reformed by the grace of God and the prayers of his mother, and he stands before you to-night. I am that man. If I drink this glass I shall go back to my old habit and perish. I am not strong enough to endure it. Shall I drink it? If you say so, I will."

A man sitting next lifted a knife and with one stroke broke off the bottom of the glass; and all the men at the table shouted, "Don't drink! don't drink!"

Oh! that man was a hero. He had been going through a battle year after year; that was a great crisis. What a struggle! I tell you this incident because I want you to know that there are a great many men in peril; and when you are hard in your criticisms about man's inconsistencies you do not know what a battle they have to fight—a battle compared with which Austerlitz and Gettysburg and Waterloo were child's play.—T. Dewitt Talmage.

The celebrated temperance speaker, John B. Gough once presented the following touching picture: "I was once playing with a beautiful boy in Norwich, Connecticut; I was carrying him to an fro on my back, both of us enjoying ourselves exceedingly, for I loved him, and I think he loved me. During our play, I said to him, 'Harry, will you go down with me to the side of the stone wall?' 'O yes,' was his cheerful reply. We went together, and saw a man lying listlessly there, quite drunk, his face upturned to the bright blue sky; the sun-beams that warmed and illuminated us lay upon his porous, greasy face; the pure, morning wind kissed his parched lips and passed away poisoned. As I looked upon the poor, degraded man, and then looked upon that child, with his bright brow, his beautiful blue eyes, his rosy cheeks, his pearly teeth and ruby lips—the perfect picture of life, peace and innocence; as I looked upon the man, then upon the child, and felt his little hand twitching convulsively in mine, and saw his lips grow white, and eyes dim, gazing on the poor drunkard; then did I pray to God to give me an ever-lasting, increasing capacity to hate with a burning hatred any instrumentality that could make such a thing of a being once as fair as that little child.—Sel.

The Lord's Pocket-Book.—"Whose pocket-book is that you carry?" said a friend to a business man, as he drew a well-filled wallet from his pocket.

"Why, my own, of course. Whose else could it be?" was the prompt reply.

"To whom the pocket-book belongs depends on another question. If you belong to the Lord, I guess the purse is His also."

"Well," said the man thoughtfully, "I hope I do belong to the Lord; but your remark throws a new light on the subject. It never impressed me before, as it does just now, that I am to carry and use this pocket-book, 'my pocket-book,' as my Lord directs. I must think this matter out, for I confess, honestly, I never looked at it in the light in which you place it."—Selected.

Safety is commonly promoted by a sense of danger. Caution is an accompaniment of courage. Not he who is sure that he will never fall or fail stands firmest in the hour of peril; but he who realizes the necessity of watchfulness at every step and on every side, and who knows that he will surely be overthrown unless he is alert, and is persistently determined. He who feels that he is in no danger of being overcome by a love of drink if he is not a total abstainer, is by his very confidence in peculiar peril. If no one else is in danger of becoming a drunkard, he is.—Selected.

"Only a Tramp."

So many inquiries have been made, since the publication of the poem bearing this title, concerning the heroic act of this tramp, that I send the account which was published in the Pittsburg Dispatch a few weeks ago.

Columbiana, Ohio, Tenth Mo. 9th, 1886.

J. E.

"Two old tramps, ragged and footsore, walked slowly down the Ft. Wayne Railroad track yesterday afternoon. Children who saw them coming quickly climbed over the fence and watched them pass with half-frightened eyes. Careful housewives noted their presence with frowning eyes, and kept a close lookout to see that they did not carry anything away with them that they did not bring. Even the little dogs eyed them askance, as they growled viciously or saucily snarled and showed their teeth.

Down by Jack's Run, there was a little white-haired baby running along the track. He was too young to fear anyone, even a tramp, and too happy, picking up the little pebbles and laying them on the rail, to heed any danger. And right there, but a few rods away, was a coming train. The tramps saw it, rods away. One of them also saw the babe. Dropping his dirty bundle, he sprang forward. It was a race for life. The tramp reached the child, not a minute ahead of the engine. Catching the little one, he pitched it off the track, when it rolled down the bank, frightened and dusty but unhurt. The tramp was dead. Hardly a bone in his body was left unbroken. His body, mangled and torn, was brought back to Allegheny, and taken to Spencer & Wilson's undertaking rooms. The other tramp came back, too. This is the story he told: The dead man, whose name was August Gotlieb, and himself, were Philadelphia dyers. Both men had recently lost their wives, and were left entirely alone. They decided to go to Cincinnati, and work at their trade. They started with thirty cents, walking the entire distance to Pittsburg, completing the journey in twenty-five days. When they arrived here, they had five cents. After walking around town a few hours, they started to Cincinnati, over the Ft. Wayne track, and their journey ended as described.

Henry Behring, the dead man's companion, was taken to a restaurant for supper, but he could not eat, his feelings overcoming him, at the tragic death of his former companion. He was provided with quarters at the "Allegheny lockup."

A Wolverhampton Brave Youth.—An act of conspicuous bravery on the part of a lad in Wolverhampton has been publicly recognized and rewarded. The Mayor of the town presented the bronze medal and parchment certificate of the Royal Humane Society to a youth named George Lewis, who recently was instrumental in saving the lives of three young children, aged two, three and five years. The poor little things were hurled into the canal by their mother, who afterwards jumped in herself whilst in a paroxysm of frenzy, and, but for the pluck and promptitude of young Lewis, the children must all have been drowned. The brave lad dived into the water, and with great difficulty, owing to the mad resistance of the mother, brought the children one after another safely out of the canal. The mother was dragged out of the water by a boatman who hurried upon the scene, and she has since been acquitted for attempted murder and suicide on the ground of obvious insanity.—Standard.

For "The Friend."

[With the permission of the writer, a friend has kindly forwarded to the writer, a brief extract from a letter, received from John G. Whittier, but not originally designed for publication. We hope it may prove encouraging to some of those who are concerned for the maintenance of the original principles of our Society; and who believe that the doctrines proclaimed by our early Friends are true, and therefore are adapted to the promotion of the cause of Christ in the world.

A note accompanying this extract says:—"To me it is a very encouraging prospect to see thoughtful persons, who have known something of the principles of the Society of Friends in early life, setting an increased value upon them, as they draw nearer and nearer to their end."—Ed.]

Amesbury, Mass., Sixth Mo. 3d 1886.

My dear friend:—I thank thee for thy letter and papers relating to Westtown School, where the principles and testimonies of our religious Society have always been maintained.*

I am glad to see that the ancient standard of Quakerism is not lowered in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

With us there is much that is trying and discouraging, and indeed in most parts of the country there seems to be a virtual abandonment of the vital doctrine of the Spirit—as held by our early Friends. But, I believe that that doctrine is yet to prevail in Christendom; and, if we, as a Society, prove unworthy to be its standard bearers, there will be found in other sects, those who will take up the Truth which we have abandoned, and bear it forward to its final triumph.

I am very truly, thy obliged friend,
JOHN G. WHITTIER.

—The Correspondence Question in London Yearly Meeting.—The London and the British Friend for Tenth Month, each contain an article, which shows that Friends of London Yearly Meeting continue to feel interested in the questions to come before the Conference on the subject of Correspondence with other Yearly Meetings, which is to be held ere long. In The British Friend, C. Thompson, of Morland says:

"It seems to me the time has fully come when London Yearly Meeting should thoroughly divest itself of all responsibility (actual or implied) which regular correspondence involves, and from any endorsement of the declarations or practices of American Friends, which undoubtedly is implied by an official correspondence.

"I am convinced, from careful observation during many years, that a large proportion of English Friends would prefer official connection with those bodies of Friends, who are sometimes designated the "Smaller Bodies," and who still adhere to the ancient doctrines and usages of Friends; and there are, I believe, an increasing number—and I rejoice in the belief—who, if correspondence is to be maintained, would try to embrace in the arms of Christian love all who claim for themselves the name of Friends."

—The Liquor Traffic with Africa.—The London Friend says this is steadily assuming an appalling magnitude. It quotes statistics from a pamphlet published by the Church Missionary Society, which show an annual exportation to Africa of 8,750,000 gallons of spirits from different nations; more than 7,000,000 of which go from Germany alone, which is by far the most active agent in this trade. The exportation from the United States in 1884-5, was about 920,000 gallons.

It quotes a letter from one of the most powerful

* A copy of the History and Catalogue of Westtown had been sent him, also a copy of the "Extracts" from the proceedings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of 1886.

of the Emirs in the West of Africa, the Emir of Nupe, to Bishop Crowther, which states that rum "has ruined our country; it has ruined our people very much; it has made our people become mad. I have given a law that no one dares buy or sell it; and any one who is found selling it, his house is to be eaten up (plundered); any one found drunk will be killed." He begs Crowther to use his influence with the English Queen to prevent bringing rum to their land.

A Government Commission some three years ago made a report, showing the disastrous effects upon the natives of Southern Africa of the use of spirits; but notwithstanding this, the Cape Government have since increased the facilities for the trade in them.

—Strange Superstition.—A peculiar sect has lately been brought to notice in Russia, called "The Red Death." Its members affect to believe that he who consciously permits another to suffer prolonged pain commits a mortal sin. In order to abbreviate the sufferings of humanity, it is a matter of conscience with them to kill the sick, that they may be put out of their pain quickly. The association takes its name from the fact that its executioners, dressed in red for the occasion, strangle their victims with a red cord, placing them for the purpose upon a red catafalque, beneath the dull reddish light of an oil lamp. This strange and horrible association was brought to light by the energetic opposition interposed by a man in Saratov, when his mother and sister endeavored to strangle his sick wife. He called in the authorities, who have already arrested some forty members of the murderous sect. Their organization seems to be a transference from India to Muscovite soil of the worship of Bobwanea, the religion of the Thugs.

—"The Perfect Ones."—The New York Tribune gives some particulars respecting a new religious sect with this title, at Cincinnati, of which the founder is a woman. In reply to the question, whether it was true that she was worshipped by her followers as the deity; she said, that her followers beheld the glory of God in her, "right here in his own temple." She appears to have fallen into a snare similar to that in which James Naylor was caught (and from which he was afterwards delivered) when he suffered some deluded persons to offer him a degree of homage which it is wrong for one human being to receive from another. The Editor of the Christian Advocate regards her case as a form of religious fanaticism, approaching monomania.

—They must not Drink.—The Fall Brook Coal Company, which employs over one thousand men in its mines and on its railroads in the semi-bituminous coal region in Tioga Co., Penna., conducts its business on the strictest temperance principles. In Twelfth Mo., 1882, the company adopted a rule that any employee who was known to use intoxicating drinks would be dismissed from the company's service. The rule is known as "Rule No. 1." Since then the company has discharged over three hundred of its railroad hands and nearly as many other employees for violating the rule. At first the company re-employed discharged men on satisfactory evidence that they had reformed, but the trial was made with but five men. Every one of them broke the rule the second time. Then no excuse would recover a discharged man his place. When an employee is detected in using liquor or beer, the money due him is placed in a blue envelope and handed to him. The receipt of a blue envelope is notice that the man is discharged, and that under no circumstances can he ever again obtain employment of the company, even as a track-repairer. The strict enforcement of the rule has forced some of the oldest and best men in the service of the company out of its employ, but Rule No. 1 will not be varied from to save the most valued man on the payroll. A person applying for work to the Fall Brook Company must present a certificate that he is a teetotaler, and must sign a pledge that he will continue to abstain absolutely from intoxicating drinks while in the service of the company, whether on duty or not. Since this rule was adopted by the coal company the list of fatalities in its mines and on its railroads has decreased fifty per cent, and the employees all have money ahead.—Standard Bearer.

Dust and Fogs.—In some experiments, performed by John Aitkin, and reported to the Royal Society of Edinburgh, a large glass receiver was filled with ordinary air, and a similar one from which the dust had been removed by being carefully passed through a cotton-wool filter. Steam was then introduced into both. In the ordinary air, it gave its usual cloudy form of condensation; while in the filtered air, no cloudiness whatever appeared. Other experiments were made with a similar result. From these J. Aitkin concluded that dust particles in the air form the nuclei on which water-vapor condenses; and that if there were no dust, there would be no clouds, fogs or mist.

The fine, invisible dust which pervades our atmosphere is derived from various sources. Everything which breaks up into fine particles may contribute to it. Even the spray from the ocean, when dried, forms an important source. When substances, such as glass, iron or brass are heated, a cloud of dust arises from them. The dust given off by heating even the one-hundredth part of a grain of iron wire will cause a distinct cloudiness in the experimental receiver. When common salt was heated in a fire or in alcohol flame, it gave an intensely fog-producing atmosphere. Sulphur was a still more active substance in this line.

The Obelisk in Central Park, N. Y.—There have been various reports circulated in the newspapers lately about the condition of the Central Park obelisk, which represented that the coating of paraffine which was applied some time ago, was not effective in arresting the scaling of the stone, which was still going on as rapidly as ever. To ascertain the truth of these rumors, an expert examination of the obelisk, has recently been made, which seems to remove all cause of anxiety in this score. R. M. Goffal, the examiner, says in his report to the Superintendent of Public Parks, "I found that the paraffine compound remains as fixed in its position within the stone, as upon the day the work was completed, perfectly filling up the pores of the stone and entirely protecting it against the absorption of water. The indentations remain in exactly the same condition as when they were treated last September. In accordance with instructions, a great deal of the surface was left hollow and cracked and was successfully treated in that condition. If all the hollow and cracked surface had been removed, the obelisk would have lost from 2 to 3 tons, in addition to the 780 pounds already removed. Since the application of the paraffine no fragments of stone have fallen from the obelisk, and the progress of decay has been checked, because it is protected from the absorption of water, and cold and frost cannot act upon it to the disintegration of its surface."—Selected.

Lightning Holes.—Prof. Brun has published in the Archives de Geneve an interesting study on the so-called lightning holes to be found in the High Alps. He and other investigators have found them at heights between 11,000 and 13,000 feet above the sea-level. Usually they are found on summits. Sometimes the rocky mass, which has been vitrified in the passage of the electric fluid, presents the appearance of small, scattered pearls, sometimes of a series of semi-spherical cavities only a few millimeters in diameter. Sometimes there are vitrified rays going out from a central point to a distance of four or five inches. Sometimes a block detached from the mass appears as if bored through by a cannon-ball, the hollowed passage being quite vitrified.

On the Rungfischhorn, the glass thus formed by the lightning is black, owing to the quantity of actinolite which the rock contains. It is brown on La Ruinette, the rock consisting of feldspar mixed with gneiss containing chloride of iron. Under the microscope these lightning holes display many interior cavities, which must be attributed to the presence of water in the rock, at the moment of melting by the electric discharge. This vitrified material has no influence on polarized light.

A Substitute for Rennet.—A plant has been discovered in Northern India called Withania Coagulans, the seeds of which contain a ferment similar to the rennet obtained from the mucous membrane of the stomachs of animals; and which has the same power of coagulating milk. Experiments are being made with this plant in England.

Young of the Wood-Duck.—C. C. Abbott having found a nest of young wood-ducks just hatched in an old decayed apple-tree, watched with much interest the process of getting them to the water. After long waiting, the parent duck came to the nesting tree, when the young ducklings clambered about the limb and over their mother. By some means she gave them to understand that they were to follow her, and presently she slowly clambered down the trunk of the tree, which grew at an angle of 45 degrees from the level surface of the ground, and was followed by the ducklings. No sooner had the last young duck reached the ground than Abbott essayed to follow, but so rapid was their movement and so zigzag their route, that it was no easy work, as the long grass often effectually concealed them. But he caught occasional glimpses, and found that they had wormed their way to the water with but little deviation from the most direct route. As he reached a point near the spot at which they entered the water, the old duck heard him, and with a loud "quack" flew away, while the little ducklings dived or hid themselves among the bushes.

The young birds have sharp toe-nails, by which they can clamber over the limbs of trees, and up any rough surface.

Two years later, he found another duck's nest. In this instance, the nest was fully 50 feet above the water, on a huge buttonwood that grew from the water's edge. Having found a tree that would afford a good view of the nest, he took up his position there, and with the aid of a field-glass, discovered the duck sitting quietly on her nest. Day after day he returned, and on the 6th day the eggs were hatched. He continued his watch, determined to see how the removal of the ducklings to the water was to be effected, which he felt confident could not long be delayed, for the parent brought no food to them in the nest.

Two days passed, and still the little fellows stuck to their nest, but on the third day he found some of them had disappeared. In the course of half an hour the old bird made her appearance, and squatted closely down on the nest, and a duckling quickly climbed up her back and nestled closely between her shoulders. The old bird then walked slowly to the very edge of an overhanging limb, and with outspread wings, with a slow, flapping motion of them, let herself down, rather than flew, to the water. The moment she touched the surface of the stream, she dived, and left the duckling swimming on the water, and to all appearance perfectly at home. This was repeated four times, when the tender brood were all safely afloat, and as quick to scent danger and flee from it as was their wary mother.

To Escape Nervousness.—The first prescription is an ample supply of pure, fresh and cool air. The nerves will always be weak if the greater part of the day and night be passed in close, and ill-ventilated apartments.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 30, 1886.

The Western Friend for the Ninth Month, contains the following editorial paragraph:

"As far back as 1869, when at Richmond, Ind., a well-known teacher of Earlham College said, in the presence of the writer, 'that it was then the purpose of a certain class of ministers to establish an ecclesiastical rule in the Society of Friends, in which the affairs of the Society should be managed by its ministers, who were to constitute a ruling class, with official rank and position, as in other churches.' For years we have watched the developments of this idea in the Society; until, to-day, the open advocacy of this ministerial revolution is such that there is no longer any excuse for a man or woman who fails to see that this is to be the end and result of the present practice and teaching. The Christian Worker, the organ of these conspirators, is now openly advocating a directed and paid ministry, who are to be supported for pastoral and ministerial purposes."

The same number of the Western Friend gives some details of the manner in which those who favored this system managed to obtain the editorial control of The Christian Worker, so as to use that paper for the furtherance of their object. Of the accuracy of the information it publishes, it says: "We have the most perfect confidence that it is substantially true."

Whether it has been misinformed or not, we have no means, at the present time, of knowing; but the pages of The Christian Worker abundantly evince that those who control its course are "openly advocating a directed and paid ministry who are to be supported for pastoral and ministerial purposes." Similar views have for years been advanced by some of the more progressive ministers in different neighborhoods; and this movement has been strengthened by the course of several Yearly Meetings, who, by means of committees, have provided various meetings with ministers, whose cost of maintenance they have defrayed. This has been the entering wedge for a system of ministry the same substantially as that of other denominations, who do not hold our views as to the immediate headship of Christ in this work, and the necessity of a fresh anointing, or an immediate call and power dispensed, on every occasion of its exercise.

The action of Iowa Yearly Meeting (Larger Body) as noticed in "The Friend" of Tenth Mo. 9th, in encouraging meetings "to call and support ministers laboring among them as pastors;" and in authorizing its "Evangelistic Committee" to "provide as far as possible for the supply of ministers and workers in meetings desiring such help;" marks a still further advance in this direction.

These things are calculated to sadden and discourage those who believe in the truth of the doctrines heretofore held by the Society of Friends, and believe also that they are adapted to the spiritual wants of mankind. They weaken the hopes that some have entertained, that the members of the different Larger Bodies would see that they were gradually drifting away from their profession as Friends, and would be aroused to greater earnestness in maintaining our original principles.

We have no doubt that there are many members of these Larger Bodies, and of those who have been in sympathy with them, who feel, as expressed in The Star and Crown, of Indianapolis, of Ninth Mo. 16th, that "if the fundamental doctrines [on which its stability as an organization depends] are laid aside, and declared to be of none effect, then the ideas of the founders of the church are lost sight of, and there is a revolution. The church cuts loose from its former moorings, and becomes to all intents and purposes, a new organization."

Some of these have heretofore given the strength of their influence to a movement which has now gone further than they can follow with an easy mind. They have favored the modern style of evangelistic effort, the introduction of singing into our meetings, the formation of missionary associations among our members, and other things, in favoring which they practically disregard "fundamental doctrines;" and now they see the danger which exists of the church being "cut loose from its former moorings," and would gladly restrain those whom they formerly encouraged.

Such Friends do not want to see our branch of the Christian Church lose all its distinctive peculiarities, and become "to all intents and purposes, a new organization." But we believe they will never be able to bear a thoroughly effective testimony against the introduction of the ordinances, and of a ministry exercised at the will of man, and looked to as a means of outward support; and against other disintegrating changes; unless they become willing to return fully to first principles, and cease to uphold those things which are but the early stages of the disease, whose maturer form fills them with alarm. When that day comes, they will find, perhaps to their surprise, that they are becoming more and more spiritually united to many who, under much discouragement, had long been contending for the original principles of Friends, and whom they were wont to regard as narrow-minded, traditional, or lifeless professors.

Golden Gleamings is the title of a collection of short, interesting anecdotes and sketches prepared by our friend David Heston, and published as an octavo volume of 350 pages. Many of the articles have before appeared in the pages of that useful little paper, The Tract Repository. Golden Gleamings is a valuable book, teaching many useful lessons; and is both interesting and instructive. SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—General Miles has telegraphed to the War Department, from Arizona, news of the capture of Mangus, the last of the Apaches, with two men, three women and five children. Mangus was with Gerónimo, but separated from him in the Fourth Month, when he offered to surrender to Crook.

The Secretary of War has directed that Chief Mangus and the two Indians be sent to Fort Pickens, Florida, and that the women and children in Mangus' band be sent to Fort Marion, in the same State. Gerónimo has arrived at Fort Pickens, where he is imprisoned with fourteen other warriors.

The Lignor Dealers' Convention, in session at Chicago, adopted resolutions "in favor of temperance, and strongly condemning intemperance, and appealing to every member of the trade to make proof of this declaration by his daily life and the conduct of his business;" opposing prohibition as an invasion of the rights of citizens; asserting that "instead of attempting to destroy a business that employs immense capital and supports a vast number of honest workmen, the efforts of our enemies should be directed to eliminating the evils existing or resulting from the abuse of liquor;" and concluding by declaring in favor of "absolute non-intervention in politics as an organization, except in such places and at such times as united action is necessary to protect ourselves and our business, and against such legislation as seeks to destroy our trade and not to remedy evils therein existing."

A tract entitled "A Solution of the Labor Question" is getting a wide circulation in Brooklyn. The facts are presented by John Berry, and are illustrated by a map of a portion of Brooklyn, where the black spots, indicating saloons, show seventy-two saloons within a radius of 400 yards of the Brooklyn City Hall, whose annual receipts amount to over $1,000,000.

A circular is being distributed which contains the following paragraph: "Citizens of Pennsylvania, examine your candidates for the Legislature. The Lignor Dealers' Association boast that many of the candidates are pledged to the liquor interest to repeal the present laws, which endeavor to regulate the liquor traffic and put some check upon its ravages." It is stated that more liquor is sold in the City of Philadelphia, than in the five (recently sale) States, of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Tennessee!

On the 22nd instant, earthquake shocks were felt in South Carolina, North Carolina and Georgia. There were two great shocks, the first about five o'clock in the morning, the second about half-past two in the afternoon. The shocks at many points in the Carolinas and Georgia, appear to have been the severest since the great quake of Eighth Mo. 31st. In Charleston, and other places in South Carolina, the shocks "were enough to shake buildings, bring down loose plastering and widen the cracks made in houses by previous shocks." The Custom House in Charleston had its western wing cracked, and the walls supporting the western roof gave way slightly.

Mining shares listed at San Francisco, of a group that were worth, less than ten years ago, $2,700,000, 000, are said to now represent less than $1,000,000.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 341, which was 57 less than during the previous week, and 31 more than during the corresponding week last year. Of the whole number 183 were males and 158 females: 53 died of consumption; 19 of cure; 18 of pneumonia; 15 of old age; 16 of typhoid fever; 14 of heart diseases; 13 of marasmus; 12 of inflammation of the brain, and 11 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels.

Rye flour was in fair request and steady, with sales of 125 barrels at $3.25 per barrel.

FOREIGN.—Returns show that fewer crimes and outrages were committed in Ireland last week than the average weekly number during the last four years. The Government will reorganize the police of Belfast on the Dublin model, and substitute qualified justices for the present borough magistracy.

Scully, a large land owner in Tipperary, has abated 25 per cent. of the judicial rents. This is the largest reduction made in Tipperary since the judicial rents were established. Scully, in notifying his tenants of the reduction, says he could not ignore the condition of circumstances at the present time, and was prepared to share with his tenants inevitable losses.

The St. James' Gazette says, that Waddington, French Ambassador to London, acting under instructions from his Government, has protested, on behalf of France, against the British occupation of Egypt. The paper adds that France and Turkey are in complete accord in their opposition to the occupation, and that Russia supports them.

Lockroy, the French Minister of Commerce and Industry, informed the Guarantee Committee of the proposed Exhibition, that the necessary capital, 22,500,000 francs, had been obtained.

The Journal des Debates says that the three Empires have come to an understanding on the Bulgarian question on the following basis, namely, that Russia shall not occupy Bulgaria, and that Austria and Germany shall not recognize either the Regency or the prince elected by the Sobranje without the assent of Russia.

Gen. Kaukbar has demanded of the Bulgarian Government the postponement of the meeting of the Sobranje. The Government has refused to accede to his demand and have started for Tirnova to attend the sessions of the Sobranje.

St. Petersburg, Tenth Mo. 22d.—News continues to arrive from reliable sources of extensive transport and military preparations in the Black Sea and other southern depots. Furloughs have been stopped, and the reserves are retained under orders.

An electric lighting station is being fitted up at Tivoli, Italy, the power to be generated by the celebrated waterfall of Teverone. Two dynamos of 100 horse-power will be used to illuminate the city of Tivoli. The illumination of Rome from this station is contemplated. The excavation and canals are situated under the house of Mæcenas.

An immense exodus towards Waukarina, in South Australia, is in progress in consequence of the discovery of alluvial gold there.

The Standard, of Buenos Ayres, South America, publishes an account of losses caused to stock owners by a recent drought in the "upper country." More than 20,000,000 sheep have died of a lung and throat disease formerly unknown on the plains, and the loss is estimated at nearly $20,000,000.

The Irazu volcano, near Cartago, in Costa Rica, long considered extinct, has recently emitted smoke.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Third Mo. 26th, 1840. Ezra Comfort lively in testimony respecting the many afflictions of Job; and how he retained his integrity through all. How I craved for myself and my friends, that we might be enabled to keep our ranks in righteousness, thus showing unto the world what we profess to be—an inward and spiritually-minded people.

Fourth Mo. 2nd. Our Monthly Meeting, held at Plymouth, was a season of favor. One more gospel call extended, through our friend R. Scotton, who seemed to fear there was with some of us too much of a pleading excuses, as those formerly did who were invited to the marriage supper of the king's son. They had all, according to human reason, very good excuses, but they were not found sufficient; for the wisdom of this world ever has been, and will remain to be, "foolishness with God." The invitation, as formerly, was now extended; and if there was a pleading excuses, others would be called in as from the highways, for the table would be filled; and those who had rejected the call would be cast out. He set forth the condition of the foolish virgins; and feelingly did he plead with us to close in while the day lasted; for the Lord would have a people, a tried and afflicted people. E. C. followed with a word of encouragement to some who, like the disciples formerly, had "toiled all night and taken nothing."

12th. The covering of my spirit this morning hath been that of stillness; accompanied with deep breathings unto my Heavenly Father for forgiveness and acceptance; and that the way wherein I should go might be made clear, and help given to walk accordingly.

26th. Attended our Yearly Meeting, though under a feeling of great unworthiness, accompanied with a sincere desire that I might rightly improve the favor. With thankfulness I may acknowledge, that the condescending love and mercy of our Heavenly Father towards us hath been great, not only in filling us with his good things, but in giving ability to enjoy them; whereby the poor soul is enlivened and cheered. M. Ratcliff told us: It is as impossible for these poor bodies to live without outward nourishment, as our poor souls without fresh supplies of Heavenly bread.

At our own meeting this morning, E. C. had a word of encouragement for drooping minds, quoting: "For the crying of the poor, and the sighing of the needy, now will I arise," &c. He believed the time was near, that the Lord would arise for the help of such as these. The seasons of desertion such were passing through were not for any disobedience, but that His own name might be magnified; adding, a new song would be put into their mouths, &c.

Fifth Mo. 3rd. A little ability seemed given this morning, during our silent sitting together, to cry unto the Lord for help, and to be shown the way wherein I must go. Feel willing, because of what I have passed through, to be anything or nothing, just as pleaseth Him.

7th. Attended our Quarterly Meeting; at which we had the company of our dear friend Jacob Green. He spoke excellently in the first meeting, arising with: "O come let us magnify the Lord, and let us exalt his name together." Enlarging instructively. Spake comfortingly to the discouraged ones; believed there were better days ahead for this people, &c., and that "The voice of the turtle would yet be heard in our land," &c.

In company with many others, including our dear friend J. G., dined at S. B. M.'s. In the afternoon, previous to leaving, he had a sitting with us, many young persons being present, commencing with: "It is good for a man to bear the yoke in his youth," &c., and believed there were those present who often, even in large companies, have to sit alone and keep silence. The excellency and safety of such a state was shown, though these might appear as fools, &c. He believed the language of some present was: "Here am I, Lord; make of me what thou seest fit." He greatly desired such as these might be kept humble and low, and in the Lord's own time, they would be fitted and prepared for his use. He hoped there would be no Jonahs found amongst the present company! those not willing to go at the command of the Lord! thus causing themselves to be cast into the deeps, with floods encompassing them about, weeds wrapped about their heads, and earth with her bars about them forever. It seemed very solemn. He afterwards addressed our aged friend S. Bettle; believing the Lord had much yet for him to do in his vineyard, and that he would be strengthened for the work. Samuel then spoke to him, reviving the query: "When I sent you forth without purse and scrip, lacked ye any thing? and the answer was, nothing, Lord."

17th. He who remains to be "strength in weakness," was near this morning, giving ability secretly to cry unto Him for help and preservation.

Sixth Mo. 14th. Attended the little meeting at Gwynedd. Fervent desires were raised for myself and friends, that we may know an increasing concern to wait rightly upon the Lord; and thus be prepared for that bread which nourishes up the soul.

18th. Retrace the steps of my childhood; many of which were not spent as they ought to have been: may I be forgiven.

21st. I thought we were favored this morning with a good meeting. A number of strangers sat with us, not of our Society. I felt exercised that we who compose this little meeting, might become more what we should be—a deep indwelling people. Would not others then oftener be drawn to come and sit down with us, and "partake of that inward and spiritual consolation and refreshment which the Lord is graciously pleased to impart to the souls of such as are humbled in his sight, and approach his holy presence with reverence and fear?"

E. C. was largely engaged in testimony respecting the true Church of Christ, and the members which compose it; that it was not made up of any particular sect or sort; but that all those who feared God and worked righteousness, were accepted of Him. These all speak the same language. "They walk by the same rule, and mind the same thing." The Lord is not partial in his dealings with his children. They are all taught in the same school. "The grace of God, that bringeth salvation, hath appeared unto all men, teaching them," &c. But all are not willing to be taught; hence it is there are so many found pursuing the broad way, of which it hath been declared, "wide is the gate and broad the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be that go in there at." The sorrowful condition of these was shown, with tender entreaties to turn into the "narrow way," which alone leadeth unto life.

28th. On first taking my seat in meeting this morning, felt poor. At length a little strength seemed given secretly to plead, that omissions and commissions might be blotted out of the "book of remembrance." The sins of my youth pressed heavily; and were it not that there is forgiveness with the Lord, that He may be feared, I should be undone forever. E. C. excellent to the young people. If we improve not these loud calls, shall we not be left without excuse? "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve" was his subject.

Seventh Mo. 12th. Though clothed with great poverty, yet can say, my soul did secretly travail in earnest application of heart to be helped. The Lord who saw, regarded; and the sceptre was held forth, whereupon my own life was asked for, and that of my people.

23rd. My heart was exceedingly sorrowful this morning. O, the secret conflicts! known to none but the Searcher of hearts. The sin lies not in being tempted, but in yielding. How the remembrance of this has comforted!

Eighth Mo. 6th. Our Quarterly Meeting. We had the company of our friends Wm. and E. Evans, and E. Pitfield. The two Elizabeth's had, I thought, excellent service in the first meeting; William was silent. E. E., after a long time of silence, arose with: "By the rivers of Babylon there we sat down, yea, we wept when we remembered Zion. We hanged our harps upon the willows," &c., &c. She believed this to be applicable to the Lord's poor servants in the present day; they could not sing the Lord's song in a strange land. The preservation of the children, she said, was very near at heart with many of the fathers and mothers in the present day.

Often were her prayers put up for the preservation of the children of this people; yea, often when her lips were sealed, and in the night watches. Her concern for us young people, both in the first and last meeting, was great. In the last, she encouraged us to a faithful attendance of all our meetings; not allowing little trifles to prevent us from going, nor to conclude we are such poor things we are of no use, that we will not be missed, and that we gain little or nothing in going. Said what a strength and encouragement it was to our elder friends to have us come sit down with them, even the rebellious and disobedient. It had been a comfort to her to see them disposed thus to meet with their friends; it showed they were willing to place themselves in the way of good. She could acknowledge that seasons of this kind had, in her youthful days, been blessed to her, when perhaps she had gone to meeting rather unwillingly; and she believed there were those present who could acknowledge the same. For some who had been long called upon to bend their necks to the yoke of Christ, and to follow more closely their dear Lord and Master, how had this language throughout this meeting, sounded in her ears: "The Master hath come and calleth for thee." Pleading with such no longer to stand out, but close in while the day lasted. Dear E. P. followed; a language that had been addressed to her in her youthful days, had been brought to remembrance: "Come with me from Lebanon, my spouse, with me from Lebanon: look from the top of Amanah, from the top of Shenir and Hermon, from the lions' dens, from the mountains of the leopards."

Haines' Mill Pond.—Water Plants.

On the 29th of Seventh Month, in company with a young friend, I visited the waters of a mill pond, which covers many acres of land, and which we were able to explore, by the aid of a boat, which the owner kindly loaned to us. Our object was to examine some of the varieties of water-plants which it contained, especially those less known to non-botanical observers.

One of the most conspicuous of those which nestled on its waters, or rose above their surface, was the Yellow Pond Lily or Splatter-Dock (Nuphar advena), a plant so common as to be known to almost every child; and yet curious enough to repay a close examination of its structure. It belongs to the Water-Lily Family of which there are only six species, divided into four genera, found in the northern United States. Three of these genera were growing in the pond we visited—the only absent one being the Nelumbium, sometimes called Water Chinquapin, which I used to find abundantly in the tide-water streams in the "Neck" below Philadelphia, and which grows in a pond near Woodstown, N. J.; and more commonly in the waters of the Southern States. This is the largest of our native flowers; the pale yellow or cream-colored bloom, being sometimes 10 inches in diameter, and the circular leaves 2 feet across, with the stems rising from the roots which are imbedded in the mud beneath, and attached to the centre of the under sides of the leaves. As they float on the surface of the water they are beautiful objects, but when, as is often the case, the stems lengthen so as to lift the leaves above the surface, they are less attractive.

But if the Nelumbium was absent from our pond, there were plenty of the Yellow Pond-Lily, of the sweet-scented Water-Lily (Nymphaea odorata), and of the curious Water-Shield (Brasenia pellata). These all grow from root-stocks buried in the mud two or three feet below the surface of the water.

Like the Nelumbium, the Water-Shield has an entire leaf, but of oval form, like the shields of the warriors of old, and floating on the surface of the water. The flowers are rather small, of a dull-purple color. On grasping the stems underneath the water, and attempting to pluck them for examination, they were found to be thickly coated with a transparent mucilage, which made it difficult for the hand to retain its grasp. This mucilage was very thick about the expanding buds and undeveloped leaves which had not yet reached the surface of the water. The surface of the leaf exposed to the air is of a beautiful green color, but the under side is a dark purple.

I noticed the same difference in the color of the two sides of the leaves of the Water-Lily. These leaves are circular in outline, like those of the Nelumbium, but much smaller, and on one side they have a cut extending from the edge to the stem in the centre. The difference in the color of the two sides is, I believe, due to the difference in their exposure to light; and I am confirmed in this opinion by the behavior of another water-plant, the Hornwort, a finely divided, brown-colored plant, which grows under the water in ditches or sluggish streams. Some weeks ago I brought a specimen of this to my home, and placed it in a dish of water. Here it continued to grow, and being limited for space, was forced to push its new shoot above the surface, into the air. This aerial shoot became a bright green, while all under the water remained of the purplish-brown color that is characteristic of the plant.

Considerable areas on the surface of the pond were thickly covered with the leaves of the Water-Lily; and scattered among them were the beautiful white, sweet-scented flowers which are so well-known and so much admired in the Eastern part of our country, and so largely sold at the flower-stands in our cities.

Much of the bottom of the pond, to the depth of two feet or less, was covered with a plant whose stems and leaves were scarcely to be distinguished from each other, since all seemed to be a mass of branching threads, divided and subdivided, growing erect and forming a miniature sub-aqueous forest. I gathered some specimens, but when lifted from the water which had sustained them, the whole plant fell like a bundle of wet threads. Some of them had small heads of seed-vessels, which I recognized as being similar in appearance to the larger fruit of a Pond-Weed (Potamogeton) which I had often seen in former years in Chester County, some of whose leaves, 2 or 3 inches in length, floated on the surface of the water; whilst others, which were much narrower, were submerged. The plant I had now found was a species of Potamogeton which remains below the surface, and is destitute of those broader leaves floating on the top, which some of the species of this genus possess. In a pool, previously visited in the course of the afternoon, I had found another species which was new to me (Potamogeton hybridus), which had beautiful little oval floating leaves, less than an inch in length, and numerous others, almost as slender as hairs, on the stems beneath. The spikes of fruit, about half an inch in length, were supported by their foot-stalks above the surface. There are in the Northern and Middle United States, 23 species of Potamogeton, and several other well-marked varieties, which are not regarded as specifically distinct. Indeed this genus, with us, constitutes much the largest part of the Pond-Weed Family, all the other members of which grow under water, and are not likely to attract the notice of many, except those whose botanical zeal leads them to investigate even the more obscure and hidden forms of vegetation. Perhaps the species of these which is most abundant, is the Eel-grass, or Grass-wrack (Toostera marina), which is very common in bays along the coast, growing in sea-water from 5 to 15 feet deep, and bears very long grass-like leaves.

One of the most curious members of the Pond-Weed Family is the Lace-Leaf, a species which grows in Madagascar, whose root-stock is farinaceous, and used for food. It is sometimes cultivated in aquaria in our green-houses. The leaves float just under the surface of the water. The blade of the leaf is of an elongated oval form, and resembles open needle-work of a most regular pattern. The longitudinal ribs or nerves are crossed at right angles by fine tendrils, and the intervening spaces are left open.

Oliver Sansom.

In the year 1683, this faithful witness for the Truth was again imprisoned for his obedience to the commands of Christ, his Saviour. There was among the statutes of Great Britain an old law enacted for protection of the Government against those adherents of the Pope who would not acknowledge their superior allegiance to the King of England. Heavy penalties were prescribed for those who refused to take the oath of allegiance and supremacy, which the act provided. This law, which was designed to apply to Popish recusants, was most unjustly perverted into an instrument of persecution against Friends, who could freely declare their allegiance to the crown, but who could not put that declaration into the form of an oath, because they felt themselves bound by the injunction of our Saviour, "Swear not at all." When other means of ensnaring Friends failed, those magistrates who were of a persecuting spirit often called upon Friends to take this oath, although they well knew them to be of a peaceable and innocent life, loyal to the Government, and repudiating all allegiance to the Pope.

Oliver Sansom was at the Court of Quarter Sessions at Reading, in the Eleventh Month of 1683, on a charge connected with meeting for divine worship; but the testimony of the informers was so false and confused that the justices seemed ashamed to take notice of it. Yet two of them took him to one end of the hall to tender him the oath. Being brought before them, Oliver said, "I know your minds, that you would put me in prison; and you had as good send me thither presently, and not trouble yourselves about the oath, which is but only to cover your designs."

When asked if he would take the oath of allegiance, he answered, "I have practiced allegiance all my life;" and holding up the Bible, which had been given him to swear on, said, "Christ Jesus commands me not to swear at all. Here it is written in this book; and His spirit in my heart confirms me, that it is my duty to obey Him; and now you command me to swear. What shall I do in this case? Shall I obey Christ and the Scriptures? Or must I obey you, contrary to both?" But reason, justice and compassion seemed to have little influence on his persecutors, either at this time or in the subsequent proceedings, which Oliver details at considerable length, and he and other Friends were put into prison.

At the trial of his case in 1685, the jury rendered a verdict of not guilty, in consequence of the manifest errors in the indictment against him, and the irregularity of the proceedings; but instead of discharging him, as the law and justice required, the judges at once tendered him the oath again, and committed him afresh to prison.

A letter to his wife from Reading Gaol, shows that in these afflictions, he had "an eye to the recompense of reward." He exhorts her to be cheerful, for it will not be long ere they come "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest; where the prisoners rest together and hear not the cry of their oppressors." "Our God, as we wait upon Him, will give us more strength to bear afflictions, than they shall be able to inflict upon us." "Oh," he exclaims, "it is a precious thing to be kept in the patient innocent spirit of Christ Jesus, which enables us to love our enemies and pray for our persecutors; when we are reviled not to revile again, but to commit our souls to Him who judgeth righteously, who is our faithful Creator and mighty preserver, and the sure deliverer of all them that trust in Him; who is the only wise, omnipotent God, blessed forever."

In 1686 he was liberated with other Friends, by the proclamation of King James, setting at liberty many hundreds of prisoners who were confined on religious accounts.

After his release, as persecution had abated, he met with little further suffering for religion's sake, during the remaining 14 years of his life, excepting loss of property for tithes and other demands of the preachers of the established church. These he steadily refused to pay, considering it very unjust to have wages demanded of him by men whom he never employed, and whose work he always denied. And he was not wanting in plainly showing to such the iniquity of their course; telling one of the priests, who had threatened to sue him at law, that although Balaam "loved the wages of unrighteousness, yet he durst not take it: but thou wilt have it, and take it by force; and boast such rule by thy means, making the magistrates do thy drudgery, and compelling the parish officers by severer threats to be thy executioners, for thy dishonest gain, to make as spoil upon those thou didst never preach to."

In the year 1690 Parliament levied a poll-tax of 20 shillings on all priests and ministers having a benefice of 50 pounds per year. This tax extended also to preachers or teachers belonging to the meetings of dissenters. "Here upon," says O. Sansom, "I, though very unjustly, was numbered amongst the hirelings that had fifty pounds per annum for preaching, and as they, so I was taxed 20 shillings, although I never received a penny for preaching in my life. And because I refused to pay the said tax, and thereby to own myself a hireling, which I never was, my goods were distrained."

After his return home from prison, he says, "I settled in my business with my wife and family as before. And when I felt the drawings of the love of God in my heart, to visit Friends in their public meetings abroad, I went often forth, both in our county of Berks, and the adjacent counties, and other places."

In 1687 he again visited Ireland, and landed at Dublin at the time of the National Half Year's Meeting, of which he gives the following account:—

"Next morning the national meeting began at the great meeting house, at the ninth hour. And the glorious presence of the Lord was manifested to the great refreshment and confirmation of his people; unto which several testimonies were borne for the space of about three hours, and concluded in prayer and praises to the Lord.

Then the women withdrawing into an upper room, the men continued their meeting in the same place, and entered upon their business; and in great unity, love and sweetness, things were proposed, debated, managed and concluded, to the mutual comfort and satisfaction of all faithful Friends; and then between the fifth and sixth hour in the afternoon, the meeting broke up.

And so sweet and pleasing was this meeting of our Friends, that they agreed to meet again the next day at the same time and place, and to have the meeting as near as might be in the same manner as the other was; which was accordingly performed in all points. And the presence of the Lord and his living power seemed more plentifully to overflow the meeting, and break forth through many vessels, even in the time of business, which did pleasantly obstruct it for a time; and so in great sweetness the meeting concluded at that time. But another was appointed to be held next day as a parting-meeting to conclude the national half-year's meeting.

Accordingly Friends came together at the ninth hour in the morning, and an heavenly openness and tenderness by the Lord's power, was over the meeting; and therein many living testimonies of the love and goodness of the Lord, were borne to the great satisfaction of faithful Friends. And about the second hour the meeting concluded, and Friends parted with comfort; rejoicing in the Lord, who had been so exceedingly good unto us, in our solemn assemblies, even all the time of this half year's meeting."

He often speaks of the Lord "being exceeding good" unto them during the course of this visit in Ireland; so that, although much spent with continual and hard travel, "yet did our tender God still give us fresh encouragement, by renewing our strength from day to day."

His friends testify of him, that "he was a serviceable instrument in the hand of the Lord, for turning many from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God; and for the convincing, converting and confirming them in the faith of the gospel."

A short time before his departure from this world, which took place on the 23^d of the Second Month, 1710, he bore this testimony:—"By reason of age, it is not likely I should continue long with Friends here. But, be you faithful as I have been, and you will have the same reward as I am like to have; and be you followers of Christ, as you have had me for an example, for I have been true to what the Lord committed to my charge."

For "The Friend."

The Word of God.

We are told by divine inspiration, that "In the beginning was the Word and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." This was before man was made; or the power of human speech given. It was from everlasting to everlasting; and will remain when tongues shall fail.

The Word of God is a divine intelligence which speaks to man, either in the form of words, or in a mere feeling that is often more deep and expressive than can be reduced to words. For the words of man are only given to convey our ideas from man to man. That Divine Word which is quick and powerful, and which speaks to the heart, is without words, a swift witness against evil, and is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart. The words of man are earthly; and often tinctured with the earthen vessel through which they pass in the attempt to convey that spiritual intelligence which is deeper than words can reach. But the Word of God, at times, gives unmistakable evidence that it possesses a quickening power, which enlivens the soul, and produces a joy unspeakable and full of glory.

It is the unction from the Holy One, a heavenly anointing, which human language can never fully describe. But the children of God know his voice, and understand his Word, for it is high them, even in their hearts and in their mouths; and it is the Word of faith which the apostles preached, and which all truly anointed ministers preach, in the ability that God giveth. It is the Word that our Saviour spoke of to the believing Jews, saying "If ye continue in my word, (not words) then are ye my disciples indeed, and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." But we must be, not only hearers of the word, but doers of it, and continue in it, if we would be his disciples indeed, and would know the truth, and witness it to set us free from the law of sin and death.

God speaks to the soul of man through Christ, the Word, without the sound of human speech, for He is a spirit; and so is the soul of man, hence the communion between God and man must be spiritual. Man may pronounce words, but he cannot of his own ability, impart the spirit. Though the words may entertain the fancy with all the charms of eloquence, yet if the spirit be absent, where is the life to come from? If it comes from man, it can do nothing towards raising the soul to heaven. But Christ says, the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life; and as they come from Him, either immediately or instrumentally, they impart life to the hearers, because He is the light and life of men; and without Him we can do nothing that has spiritual life in it, but with Him we can do all things that He requires of us.

This inspeaking word may appear to us in the silence of all flesh, and in the absence of all thought, for it is not needful that our feelings or our prayers should be formed into words; for the inward sensibilities or heavenly aspirations of the soul, are spiritual and between man and his Maker.

So it is only the eternal Word that can convey Divine intelligence to the soul. For that which is born of the flesh is flesh, and belongs to the earth; but that which is born of the spirit is spirit, and belongs to God, for him to give to man; and a manifestation of the spirit is given to every man for his profit, if he will use it. But the words or language of man belong to man; and are understood by man. While God speaks to man through Christ, the eternal Word, in a language that the natural man can never fully comprehend until he is born of the spirit; then he can say, "speak Lord, for thy servant heareth."

It is the spirit only that quickeneth, but man may be instrumental in conveying the power of the spirit to his fellow man after he himself has been baptized with the Holy Spirit.

For the same Christ that once offered himself outwardly as a sacrifice for the sins that are part, now still offers himself continually and spiritually to all the world, that He may take away the sin of the world out of the heart; and bring in an everlasting righteousness in its place, that would rule and reign there as in the beginning before sin entered. But we must witness the first heaven and the first earth to pass away, and all things to become new, and all things of God being created in righteousness and in true holiness, by the same creative Word that made heaven and earth. For He is able to create us anew in Christ Jesus, the second Adam who never fell, as our first parents did who lost their primitive righteousness. And thus, I believe we may have an everlasting righteousness brought into our every individual heart, even this side of the grave, by abiding in the Word that Adam and Eve departed from and so lost it. For Christ, the Word, came to our sinful world to seek and to save that which was lost in the fall, and "to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness" into our hearts; and "to seal up the visions and prophecy concerning Him, that He might be anointed the most Holy, ruling and reigning in our hearts, as before the transgression. For He is able to restore and to uphold all things by the word of his power.

But this invisible and eternal Word should never be brought down to a level with the Scriptures, by calling them the word of God, as many do, because they were written by men of God; for they were not in the beginning with God, and have no power only through Him. While all power is given to Christ, the Word, both in heaven and in earth; for in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily.

So let me commend you to God, and to the word of his grace, which is able to keep you from falling, and to build you up, and to give you an inheritance among them that are sanctified, when the conflicts of this probationary life are over.

For "The Friend."

A Reminiscence of Huldah Hoag.

Narcissa Coffin, residing on Nantucket, gave the following account to a friend of hers, respecting her grandmother, Huldah Hoag. The writer recollects hearing his mother relate a similar occurrence:

She was travelling abroad on a religious visit, and had an appointed meeting, which was quite small. She was constrained to address the meeting, and to describe the state of a person as dreadful in the extreme, and then detailed the course of his life; and, speaking of his being tempted to take his own life, further said, "I believe thou hast now the instruments of death with thee." She entreated him to forbear, and solemnly warned him of the fearful consequences which must follow such an inconsiderate act. "I believe," she said, "that the door of mercy is still open for thee, or I would not be led thus earnestly to plead with thee."

This communication seemed so unsuitable to any there present, that much uneasiness was felt by her friends on the account. But there was a person listening outside of the door, to whom it was all applicable. He afterwards stated, "I was at first never before so much offended as on hearing that aged Quaker preacher describing my doings and telling my designs to all at the meeting." At length the thought occurred to him, "She does not know thee; nor do many of those present know of thy being here at this time." So he received it as a divine interposition and message, and was deeply humbled and penitent. He finally became a consistent Friend, and all of his family members of our Society.

It may here be remarked of Huldah Hoag, that in her advanced years, after she was unable to travel in the ministry, she continued her ministerial services in Quarterly and other meetings, and frequently appeared in supplication as formerly she had been led to do.

It was the practice of Friends of Ferrisburg Quarterly Meeting, to hold a meeting for worship following the day of the Quarterly Meeting, which was usually pretty largely attended by others than Friends, at which times there was often much religious exercise in the line of the ministry.

Holland Prisons, and the Death Penalty in Holland and Switzerland.

The Secretary of the Howard Association of London has recently contributed to the Times, some interesting observed facts relative to the prisons of Holland, together with the status of capital punishment in that Country, and in Switzerland. For some years past, the Dutch government, following the example of Belgium, has manifested an increased interest in the extension of the cellular (separate confinement) system of penal establishments; there being now eleven of that sort in the kingdom. The writer states that, systematic instruction and the system of visitation of prisoners by members of local committees, is a fundamental part of the procedure prevailing there, and favorably distinguishes it from the Belgian plan. It is gratifying to read, that "there has been an effective check to all the more serious crimes, as cellular imprisonment has been more generally extended," and that "the effects of the cellular system, so far as tried, and extending over a period of many years, have been considered to be so decidedly advantageous, that the new penal code has raised the maximum duration of absolute separation to five years, instead of two as heretofore."

Capital punishment was discontinued in Holland in 1870, imprisonment either for life or for long periods being substituted therefor. Statistics issued by the Minister of Justice prove that the crime of murder has not increased in Holland since 1870, but has rather diminished.

The writer of the above account records a curious inconsistency or anomaly, which he noted while visiting the prison at Groningen, to wit: that the first book he picked up in one of the cells happened to be a Dutch translation of Dr. B. W. Richardson's temperance manual, "Popular Instruction on Alcohol," a handy book for such a place, seeing that the prison governor had pronounced drunkenness to be a chief cause of crime; yet, on proceeding further around the establishment, it was observed that nearly all the inmates were employed in making straw covers for wine bottles.

Relative to capital punishment in Switzerland, it appears that, notwithstanding the federal constitution was so modified in 1879, as to permit the cantons to re-impose the penalty of death; only eight cantons (representing about one fifth the total population of Switzerland) have taken advantage of this provision and declared it operative. Nevertheless there has not been a single execution under the restored law down to the present date, though the average of homicide cases appears to be nearly the same as previously.

A quaint writer has said that as they immerse copper in aquafortis before they begin to engrave it, so the Lord usually prepares us by the searching, softening discipline of affliction for making a deep and lasting impression upon our hearts.

TO AN INFANT.

Lovely immortal,
Here at life's portal
Entering so bravely on time's stormy sea!
Would that some fairy,
Down from her eyrie,
The weal of thy future could whisper to me.

So frail and so tender!
No visions of spender
From earthly allurements, can dazzle or win;
Oh! must the pure whiteness
Of innocent brightness
Be soiled by the world with its touches of sin?

Is the way lengthy?
Will the next century
Cast its meridian light on thy brow?
Or, is the Father
Waiting to gather
My lamb to the joy of His fold even now?

Will there be sadness,
Will there be gladness,
Most in the path that is ordered for thee?
Blessings attend thee?
Kind hearts befriend thee?
Or, cheerless and lone will thy journeying be?

For lightly pondering,
Wilt thou go wandering
Far from the faith that thy fathers did hold?
Or, lowly in spirit,
Wilt thou yet for it
Stand like those valiants, the worthies of old?

Like the owl calling
When the night's falling,
Out thro' the darkness scending her cry,
From her perch lonely
Listening only
To the wild winds' and echo's reply,

Lo, I am sending
Thro' the unending
Mysterious gloom that envelops us all,
Question on question,
Rife with suggestion,
And naught but the echo responds to my call.

Ah! wiser and better,
No fancy to fetter
With knowledge too great for the finite and dim;
Thy' life is before thee,
God's care still is o'er thee,
And the hairs of thy head are all numbered by Him.

Whatever betide thee,
His Spirit will guide thee,
As humbly before Him thy nature shall bow,
And over the river
Present thee forever
As spotless and pure as I'm holding thee now.

WHEN THE STARS COME OUT.

BY MARIAN HARPER.

After the heat and noise of day,
Upon the fragrant grass I lay,
Gazing toward heaven's immensity
With upturned face, till in the sky
The stars came out.

The day departed silently;
The blue grew paler, and the eye
Caught here and there a point that shone,
With gathering light, as one by one
The stars came out.

Is it not true, O soul of mine!
That all day long the stars still shine?
Yet day must perish, ere unfurled
Before our gaze the glorious world
Of stars shine out.

Then answered back a soundless voice:
"O soul, look upward, and rejoice!
For as the lights of earth all flee,
Thy lifted eye shall surely see
God's stars come out!"

The Christian will find his parentheses for prayer in the busiest hours of life.—Cecil.

Records of Our Meetings.

Seeing a notice that some of the old records of one of the Monthly Meetings of Philadelphia have been mislaid or lost, has reminded me of the careless way in which such records are frequently kept, especially in country places, and of the importance of having some place where all such, as are not in use, may be deposited for safe-keeping.

Their custodians too often look upon them as old and nearly worthless, and store them carelessly among rubbish in out-of-the-way corners of their houses, where the mice may gnaw them, or where they may be forgotten, or where, in case of fire, they are almost sure to be consumed.

Some years since, having occasion to consult the early records of the Rahway and Plainfield Monthly Meeting, I found them in a small, frame house, piled away on the floor in a dark closet, under the stairs.

In order, so far as possible, to avoid the danger of the records of marriages, births and deaths from being entirely lost, I made an abstract of the first, and copied the others, and sent the whole to the New York Genealogical Record for publication.

As a sort of introduction the following sketch of the origin of the Meeting and of some of its members was prepared. This, with some little modification, I have thought might not be uninteresting to the readers of "The Friend."

As will be seen by the dates given, the two hundredth anniversary of the first establishment of the Monthly Meeting will occur the coming month.

HUGH D. VAIL.

Santa Barbara, Tenth mo. 4th, 1886.

The Rahway and Plainfield Monthly Meeting of Friends is one of the oldest in New Jersey. Exactly at what date the first Friends settled within its limits is not known. As early as 1669, there were several English Friends, or Quakers, living on the opposite side of the Raritan, at Middletown and Shrewsbury. In 1672 these were visited by George Fox, the founder of the Society, who came there, as he relates in his "Journal," from a Dutch town called New Castle, across that wilderness country since called West Jersey, where he travelled "a whole day together without seeing a man or woman, house or dwelling-place."

As neither George Fox nor William Edmundson, who visited Shrewsbury about three years later, makes any mention of other members of their Society in New Jersey, it is hardly probable there were any such at that time; though as early as 1679, Nathaniel Fitz Randolph, who, in 1678, had been fined as a Quaker by the Plymouth magistrates, removed from Barnstable to Woodbridge.

In 1683, after East Jersey had come under the control of the "Proprietors," Robert Barclay, the author of the "Apology," was appointed Governor for life, and through his influence many of his friends and relatives, a number of whom were of the same religious Society as himself, emigrated from Scotland to New Jersey, and settled near Amboy. Among these were John Reid, George Keith, and John Barclay, the Governor's brother.

The precise date of the first meeting at Amboy we do not know; but in 1686 a Monthly Meeting was set up there, as a branch of Shrewsbury Quarter, of which John Reid was clerk.

The first entry in the "Minute Book" is the following:

"The 3d of the 8th month, 1686. Friends at Amboy agreed to have a Monthly Meeting there, and that upon the second 4th day of each month, and the first to begin the second 4th day of the 9thth month, 1686.

The next entry is:

"At the Monthly Meeting held in Amboy the 19th day of the 9th month, 1686. Agreed that all Friends belonging to the Monthly Meeting bring Minutes of y^e Births and Burials [since they first come into this place] that they may be recorded."

Whether this was done or not, the Minutes do not state; but no such records of this date have been preserved. On a blank part of a page among the Minutes the following entry is made in a different hand from that of the clerk's:

"Mary Forster, Daughter of Miles Forster & Rebeckah Forster, was born the 18th day of the 8th month, 1687."

The earliest regular registry of births and deaths begins in 1705, at which time the meeting, after having been suspended a number of years, was re-established at Woodbridge.

There appears to have been no early record of marriages. The oldest date of a recorded certificate of marriage is 1712, and this must have been copied into the records long after that time. But as all the members of the Society were then required, before marriage, to declare their intention publicly in the Monthly Meeting, the fact of the marriage, and the approximate date of it can be obtained from the Minutes of the Monthly Meeting.

The following is the first record of this kind:

"At the Monthly held in Amboy the 12th of the 11th month 168⁶, Miles Forster & Rebecka Laury proposed to the meeting their Intention of Marriage. The Meeting apoynts John Mill and Wm. Bethell to Inquire into the Matter to see if all things be clear with these persons in order to there marriage and to make Report thereof against the next Monthly Meeting."

"At the Monthly Meeting held in Amboy the 9th of the 12th month 168⁶. Miles Forster & Rebecka Laury came the second tyme to the Meeting expecting friends answer. The Meeting being satisfied had nothing to object against there Marriage & y^efore allowed them to apoynt a meeting of Friends wherein to Solemnize the same."

These minutes are in the handwriting of John Reid, who remained clerk until December, 1687, when he makes the following minute:

"At a Monthly Meeting held at Amboy the 14th of the 10th Month 1687. John Reid who hitherto kept the book for this meeting being now removed with his family to another County, desired friends to order another in his stead. Whereupon the Meeting apoynt'd Ben: Griffith to keep the book and receive the contributions."

Soon after this the troubles caused by George Keith occurred in the Society, and we find no entry in the minutes from the Ninth Month, 1688, to the Eighth Month, 1689, and then only this single one:

"At a Monthly Meeting in Woodbridge the 17th day of the 8th month 1689. It was agreed that the monthly meeting should be kept the third fifth day in every month at Benjamin Griffiths in Woodbridge."

After this there is no further entry until 1704, when it is:

"At a Monthly Preparative Meeting at Nathaniel FitzRandolphs in Woodbridge y^e 16th day of the 9th mo 1704;" with the following memorandum on the opposite page, apparently in the hand of Benjamin Griffith, who was still clerk:

"The above said Monthly Meeting fell from y^e year 1689 to y^e year 1704, by reason of George Keith's Separation, which was 15 years: there was appointed to be kept at Woodbridge a Preparative Meeting, and about 2 years after kept a Monthly Meeting."

In a subsequent minute we are informed that the "Yearly Meeting held at Shrewsbury the 29th day of the 8th month 1706;" changed the Preparative Meeting at Woodbridge to a Monthly Meeting.

The scattered residences of the members of this meeting, who were mostly farmers, rendered it difficult for many of them to attend it in winter, and, for the convenience of these, small meetings were allowed to be held, during part of the year, at the dwellings of some of the more prominent Friends. Among these was one "at the house of Wm. Roberson at Rahway," in 1707; and one "at John Shotwell's on Staten Island," in 1710, and another at the house of John Laing, near Plainfield, in 1721.

In the course of a few years the Rahway and Plainfield Meetings were made permanent ones; meeting-houses were built, and about the middle of the century, the Monthly Meeting itself was transferred from Woodbridge, and held, alternately, (as it now is,) at Rahway and Plainfield.

Besides these two meetings, there was also, for a number of years, a small one at Mendham, in Morris County, that was a branch of the Woodbridge Meeting.

Although this Monthly Meeting was, until quite recently, wholly subordinate to the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, it is a singular fact, indicating a different origin of its members, that very few of their names are to be found among the Friends of West Jersey and Pennsylvania.

The most common names in the records are, Laing, Shotwell, Vail, Fitz Randolph, Marsh, Thorn, Webster, and Pound.

The Laings are all, or nearly all, descended from John Laing, of Craigforth, Aberdeenshire, Scotland, who came over with his family in 1685, and settled near Plainfield.

The ancestor of the Shotwells was Abraham Shotwell, one of the original settlers of Elizabethtown, who, in consequence of too freely expressing his opinion of the ruling powers, was banished the province, and his land at Elizabeth confiscated. In 1683, after his death, the property was restored to his son, John, who married Elizabeth Burton, in New York, in 1679, and who was, for a number of years, a prominent member of the Woodbridge Meeting.

The Vails belonging to this meeting were originally from Westchester County, New York, and are the descendants of two brothers, Samuel and John Vail. The latter came with his mother into New Jersey when quite young, became a minister in the Society, and died in 1774, at the age of 89. He left a large family; very few of whom, however, remained with Friends, or in that section of the province.

Samuel Vail, who was a member, lived and died at Westchester. But two of his sons, John and Stephen, settled near Plainfield, married members of the Woodbridge Meeting, and became the progenitors of all, or nearly all, of the name to be found among Friends in that section, or in Ohio, or Iowa.

The Fitz Randolphs, F. Randolphs, or Randolphs, as the name is variously written by themselves, are the descendants of Edward Fitz Randolph, of Barnstable, Massachusetts, who, in 1637, married Elizabeth, the daughter of Thomas Blossom, one of the elders of the Plymouth church.

Nathaniel, the eldest son of Edward, who was born at Barnstable in 1642, in 1662 married Mary, the daughter of Joseph Holley, and, it is probable, about the same time joined the Society of Friends. He came to New Jersey, with his family, in 1679. After the establishment of the Monthly Meeting at Woodbridge, he appears to have been one of its most active members. For a number of years prior to the completion of their meeting-house, in 1713, the meeting was held at his house. It is believed that he and his descendants are the only persons of the name who were Friends.

The Marshes are descended from Samuel Marsh, senior, one of the original "Associates" in the settlement of Elizabethtown, who came there from New Haven, Connecticut. His grandson Samuel, the son of Joseph, is the first of the name mentioned in the records.

It is told of St. Antony—the reputed founder of the monastic system, whose still-existing monastery in Egypt is claimed to be nearly sixteen hundred years old—that he was the first recluse to adopt the custom of both praying and working, having made the discovery that "continuous corporal inactivity impaired the vigor of the mind, and continuous prayer tended to positive mental disease;" so he prayed while he worked, and worked while he prayed. "Continuous corporal inactivity," now-a-days, is responsible for a good deal more mental disturbance than can be charged to continuous prayer; but it would be fortunate if Antony's conclusion could bring one modern Christian to discover what spiritual health and material advantage is to be found in the habit of sending little prayers up to God in the busiest moments of our busiest days.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Sleeping between Damp Sheets.—The London Lancet, calls attention to the peril of sleeping in a damp bed. As a matter of fact, this peril is of the greatest, and it is almost ever present.

The experienced traveller rarely hazards the risk of sleeping between sheets, which are nearly sure to be damp, until they have been aired under his personal supervision at a fire in his bedroom. If this be impracticable he wraps his rug around him, or pulls out the sheets and sleeps between the blankets. The direst mischief may result from the contact of an imperfectly heated body with sheets which retain moisture.—The Medical Journal.

A Queer Partnership.—As most of my young readers are doubtless well aware, there is a continual warfare between insects and birds, the latter finding in the former their natural food. Knowing this, any exception we may find to the rule must seem very remarkable, especially when it is a bird and a spider on terms of the closest friendship, and actually partners in house building. The bird is the purple sunbird, named by naturalists Nectariniu Asiaticea. It is common in many parts of India, where it flits among the trees in gorgeous garbs of deep purple-blue, flashing green, gold and yellow.

At the nest-building time, the sunbird searches the woods until it finds the large shining web of a certain kind of spider. This it proceeds to appropriate without further ceremony.

The web is generally spun between two stout limbs, and upon this web the bird begins to place all sorts of rubbish, such as bits of grass or fibre, and pieces of paper and cloth picked up or stolen from some neighboring camp. Curiously enough, as fast as the bird places these objects on the web, the spider secures them with its silk, spinning industriously and assisting its friend as much as possible. Finally when the materials have accumulated until they reach the limb, they are fastened to it, and bound over and over, first by the bird and afterward by the spider. The nest begins to assume a definite shape; in appearance like a bottle, flask or dome; the grass and twigs being generally wound in and out by the bird and then covered by the silk of the spider, both bird and insect working harmoniously, until they have made a perfect dome-shaped nest hanging in the midst of the web, partly supported by it and partly hanging from the limb. In some nests an entrance is left at the bottom; but usually it is at one side near the upper end, with a little platform or awning built out over it by the bird, to keep out the rain.

The nest would now naturally be a very conspicuous object; but the spider's work is not yet done. It continues to spin its silken web around the nest, carrying the threads from one part to another, inward and outward, forward and back, until finally, the nest is completely hidden behind a screen of web.

Here, together, the partners live; the spider rearing its young on the outside, and the sunbird caring for its eggs and young within. In this queer partnership the spider is, evidently, not the loser, as it certainly gains peace and protection from the presence of its feathered friend.—St. Nicholas.

The Papaw.—There is a South American tree (Carica Papaya) of this name, altogether different from what is known as Papaw, in the United States, which has peculiar properties. The leaves and fruit grow in a cluster at the summit of a branchless stem, similar to the palms. The fruit is edible. The milky juice of the tree is very acid, and has the property of rendering tender the toughest meat; it contains a substance, papaine, which has a remarkable power of producing artificial digestion. An interesting application of this property has recently been suggested by Professor Finkler of Bonn. He finds that the membranes of croup and diphtheria are rapidly dissolved by it.

By painting these membranes with a weak solution of Papaine, and repeating this process frequently, many cases of these diseases were successfully treated, and the membranes formed by the disease removed in a few hours.

Speed of Swallows.—Two hen swallows taken from broods at Pavia have been released in Milan. They returned to their nests in thirteen minutes, showing their rate of flight to have been eighty-seven and a half miles an hour.

Aluminium Alloy.—A new white alloy, containing ten parts of tin and one hundred of aluminium, is recommended by Bourbouze for instruments requiring lightness. Its specific gravity is 2.85, it can be easily soldered, and is not readily corroded.

Sugar in Soap.—Many of the finer transparent soaps in the English market are said to be quite free from the glycerine which they are represented to contain, sugar, which is very cheap and seems to be as well adapted to making transparent soap, being substituted.

Deep Wells in London.—The large number of deep wells sunk in and about London during the past thirty years, is said to have so lowered the general level in the chalk which underlies the district, that the water has fallen about a foot a year. The supply seems to be abundant still, however.

Milk Sickness.—In some sections of the country, especially in the Western States, a disease often prevails in the fall of the year, which is believed to be caused by the cows eating unwholesome food, particularly the different species of Eupatorium (of which genus, the common Boneset is a species). The cows themselves do not seem to suffer, as the poison passes off in the milk they secrete.

That the character of the milk is affected by the condition of the animal producing it, is a physiological fact so well known to physicians, that in treating nursing mothers they are careful not to harm the infants through medicine given to the mother. It is recorded that a family partook of poisonous mushrooms, and all died but one woman, a mother who was nursing an infant. The infant died, who had not tasted the fungus, but the mother escaped with a slight sickness. In like manner the milk of the cow carries off any poison which may have been taken in the food or water.

J. Collet, ex-State Geologist of Indiana, attributes milk-sickness to a species of Eupatorium, known as "White Snake Root," or "White-top" (Eupatorium ageratoideis.)

A Donkey's Sagacity.—A family donkey disappeared from the field at Carshalton some weeks ago. The young friends whom he had been wont to carry in panniers were inconsolable at his theft; for it was well understood that he had not strayed. One day last week there was a noise like beating carpet outside his old home; it was a costermonger, endeavoring by his usual arts of persuasion to get a donkey past the gate. The children rushed to the window, and recognized his large round ears; and pater familias, summoned to the rescue, confirmed the views and claimed his property. The costermonger had bought the animal fairly enough of the man who had stolen him, and could not understand why it should have come to such a full stop opposite Acacia Lodge. He had broken two sticks and exhausted his vocabulary of abuse in vain.

"There is no place like home," replied the intelligent animal, in his quiet, patient way, "and this is it."—Jas. Payne in the Independent.

Power of Declaring War.—In the British Government this is now vested in the Crown, which during the recess of Parliament, may thus plunge the nation into conflict with other people. At a meeting lately held in England, in the interest of peace, one of the speakers, W. R. Cramer, M. P., "urged that the House of Commons should take into its own hands the power of making wars, and deprive the Crown of that power. Until that was done these wars would go on. There was no justifiable reason for annexing Burmah, and if the power of making war had been rested in the House of Commons, it never would have been annexed.

The "Real Horrors" of War.—Patrick Ford, of Brooklyn, Editor of the Irish World, who had served two years in the Union Army, during the civil war in America, and was present at the battle of Antietam, says:—"People think that battles and being killed are what make war horrible, but these things are as nothing in comparison with war's real horrors. The being kept for weeks and weeks and months at a time in bare, wretched quarters, with nothing in your life really suited to body or mind, without books or cheerful companionship, with hard dry food, and coarse, rancid, fat meat, and too little of it at that; with vermin and scurvy, and damp and cold, until heart despair and pigsty greed are facts, and home and decency a fading dream; and then, on the march and after battle, to see the dead lying stark, or being hustled while yet dying into holes hastily dug, while a stick marked "unknown" is jammed in above them; to see the wounded huddled together, mangled and gory, in the mud and snow, hoping and hoping vainly for help; to hear their terrible moans and cries, and to have to go on about your own business as if you saw and heard nothing—these, and worse, are some of the things which teach a man what war means, and the awful responsibility of him who promotes war."

—Marriage Licenses.—A recent convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, held in New York, adopted a resolution in favor of the enactment by that state of a marriage license law, similar to that of Pennsylvania. The Independent in commenting on the subject, says: "We believe that all marriages should be consummated under such circumstances, and with such formalities of ceremony, as will give to them the element of reasonable publicity. Marriage is the foundation of the family, and the family is the foundation of society."

—Changing Church Connections.—A remarkable event which is reported by a correspondent of the Odenburger Zeitung, reads more like a chapter from the history of the Reformation epoch, than an incident of the present age. The Roman Catholic inhabitants of Acsa, a village in the county of Stuhlweissenburg, have had a grievance against their parish priest for some time past. They appealed to the bishop to remove him, and, if their report of his conduct be true, he is certainly unfit for the office of a pastor. The bishop refused, so they appealed to the Hungarian Minister of Worship, who declined to interfere. Hereupon, after a precedent, which was common in Germany and Switzerland in the fifteenth century, the Communal Council of the village convoked a full meeting of all the adult inhabitants, in order to settle what action they should take. "As neither bishop nor minister will help us," said the president, "we must now help ourselves." He made the bold suggestion that the entire parish should go over bodily from the Roman Catholic to the Evangelical Lutheran Church. His advice was adopted without one dissident. A deputation was sent to the Evangelical Lutheran Consistory, requesting to be received into communion, and in one single day 134 Roman Catholic heads of families registered themselves as Protestants.—Selected.

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 6, 1886.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING.

From the accounts of this meeting published in various Journals, the following is condensed. The Meeting of Ministers and Elders gathered on Ninth Mo. 27th. There were many persons in attendance with certificates from other Yearly Meetings, to whom the Clerk, Timothy Nicholson, extended a welcome in about these words:—"We understand that all these Friends for whom minutes have been read are in unity with Indiana Yearly Meeting, with its doctrines, its practices, and its legislation to protect its meetings and its membership. As such we most cordially welcome them to the Yearly Meeting." The remark respecting "Legislation designed to protect its meetings," &c., we suppose refers to a minute passed a year before, closing the way for service in the meetings of Indiana Yearly Meeting of those ministers who favor the use of the "ordinances." The same subject probably had some influence in the conclusion come to in the Yearly Meeting at large, to propose to the different bodies, with which it was in correspondence, to hold a Conference of delegates from each to consider matters appertaining to the welfare of the Society, and "to promote unity in important matters of faith and practice." The conclusions of this Conference are "to be only advisory," and it is not to be held unless at least five Yearly Meetings unite in it.

Allen Terrell was re-appointed as Clerk. A new Quarterly Meeting was granted, to be composed of Birch Lake, Vandalia and Penn Monthly Meetings, to be called Vandalia Quarterly Meeting, and to be held at Vandalia, Michigan.

In these days, when in some quarters there is so much of a disposition to neglect those things which heretofore were valued amongst us, it is pleasant to notice the remark made by a Friend, when the report of the Book and Tract Committee was being considered. He "trusted that our tastes may not get away from the writings of Early Friends; because loyalty to the doctrines they taught does not involve disloyalty to Christ; but the contrary."

The report of White's Indiana Institute showed that it had had 78 scholars during the year, of whom 71 were Indian children. One-half of the time is spent in manual labor.

At a joint session to hear the report of the Committee on Temperance, the following addition to the report was adopted: "We are unalterably opposed to all excise laws which sanction the traffic, or in any manner protect those engaged therein."

The number of members was stated to be 20,612—many having joined during the past year.

The following account of Kansas Yearly Meeting (smaller Body) is condensed from a narrative forwarded by a Friend residing in that section:

The meeting of Ministers and Elders met, on Tenth Month 7th, at two o'clock, p. m. Some visitors from other Yearly Meetings were acceptably in attendance. We were reminded that obedience was better than sacrifice, and to hearken, than the fat of rams. We were also warned of the danger of attempting to build up ourselves, by pulling down, or at the expense of others.

On Sixth day, the 8th of the Month, the Meeting assembled for divine worship at ten a. m.; followed by a business session. Epistles were received and read from all the Yearly Meetings with which we correspond. A committee was appointed to prepare replies; also, to produce an Epistle, if way opened for it, to Philadelphia. A request came from Walnut Creek to establish the Yearly Meeting at Emporia. A committee was appointed to consider the subject, and report next year. The representatives were directed to confer together, and propose the name of a Friend for clerk, and one for an assistant.

Seventh day the 9th of the month.—The representatives reported they were not prepared to give the names for clerk and assistant. They were directed to report the next sitting. The Meeting then entered on the state of society by reading the queries and answers. While considering them, many Friends were much exercised on account of deficiencies reported; and abundance of good counsel and advice was handed forth.

First day, the 10th of the Month.—Meetings were held at ten a. m. and 3 p. m. A great many temporary seats were placed in the aisles, and the house was filled to overflowing. Very good order and attention were observed; and the Lord's servants were much favored in handing forth to the multitude what He saw fit to give them, to the satisfying (I have no doubt) of many hungry souls. It was a much-favored season.

Second day, the 11th of the Month. The representatives reported that they were not able to agree on clerks. The old ones were re-appointed without a dissenting voice. The meeting was dipped into deep suffering on account of our condition; and many hearts were lifted in prayer to Him who alone is able to keep us.

Much good counsel and advice was handed forth. The business that came before the meeting was transacted in unity. Not much done.

Third day, the 12th of the month. The little difference that has existed between a few Friends, that has caused so much suffering and deep mourning in this Yearly Meeting, has now been settled, and a full acknowledgement, in writing, was brought to the Yearly Meeting at large this morning, and a minute made, that the clerks now stand appointed with the full unity of the Meeting, which was the cause of much rejoicing, and many eyes were filled with tears.

Standing committees all made satisfactory reports. A new committee was appointed for further religious labor throughout the Yearly Meeting, especially among those that have not identified themselves with us. The time for closing the door against those who have not identified themselves with us was postponed another year.

Fourth day, the 13th of the Month.—Meeting for worship was held this morning; followed by a business sitting. The Minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings were read and approved.

The committee appointed at the first sitting on correspondence produced Epistles for Ohio, Western, New England, Iowa, Canada, and also one for Philadelphia. The clerk was directed to sign and forward them.

The Meeting then concluded, having transacted the business that came before it in much unity.

Kansas Yearly Meeting—(the Larger Body.) The Yearly Meeting of Ministry and Oversight began on 7th of Tenth Month; and the Meeting for business met on the following day, at Lawrence, Kansas.

On the minutes of one of the Quarterly Meetings there was a reference to a concern of one of its members (Elwood W. Weesner) to go to Alaska and enter upon missionary labor there. This was referred to a committee, who at a later sitting of the Yearly Meeting made a favorable report, which was adopted, and $300 appropriated for this purpose.

A committee was appointed to report the proceedings of the Yearly Meeting to the Lawrence daily papers.

The statistical reports represent the number of members as 7,071—of these 3,098 are under 21 years of age.

The proposition of Indiana Yearly Meeting for a Conference of Yearly Meetings was concurred in; and delegates appointed.

A committee was appointed to labor with the State Legislature and oppose the repeal of the law respecting capital punishments. Under this law, all criminals condemned to death, have a respite of one year in the penitentiary, and it is then optional with the Governor of the State to sign the warrant for execution, or to allow them to remain in prison. The effect has been, that no person has yet been executed. An attempt was made in the last Legislature to change this law, and make capital punishment compulsory.

During the fifteen years this Yearly Meeting has been in existence, 76 persons have been recorded as ministers, of whom three-fourths were men.

We have received a letter dated Tenth Mo. 23d, from Elias Rogers of Toronto, referring to the lawsuit among Friends in Canada, and to the communication from Arnoldi Haight, published in "The Friend" of Tenth Mo. 9th. Accompanying it, is a copy of a letter dated Tenth Mo. 11th, from Samuel Rogers, one of the committee, representing the plaintiffs in the suit, to Arnoldi Haight, one of the defendants; which states the terms of settlement which the plaintiffs were willing to accept.

On comparing these terms with those mentioned by A. Haight, we notice no material difference except in regard to the costs of the suit. The plaintiffs propose, "Each party paying their own costs since the decision of the Court of Appeal,—costs previous to that to remain as decided by the Court of Appeal," or, in other words, to be paid by the defendants.

The defendants propose that each party pay all of their own costs from the beginning of the suit.

This question of the division of the costs, appears to have been the obstacle which prevented the agreement of the two committees. Whether this obstacle will be overcome, or whether the suit will take its regular course, we cannot tell. But the above information may enable our readers to have a clearer understanding of the situation in which the matter was left.

The "Ordinances."—The determination shown by some of the members of the Binns Meeting to persist in teaching and practising the use of water-baptism, &c., and the weakness of that meeting in refusing to prohibit it, may have led to the action of the Representative Meeting of New England Yearly Meeting (Larger Body), at a special meeting held Tenth Month 16th, in again calling the attention of their members to a minute of the Yearly Meeting adopted in 1885, which says:

"We desire to protect our membership from all influences which are not in accordance with the clear testimony of our religious Society and the teaching of the New Testament. We believe in the Spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom, and that all outward ceremonies have been fulfilled and ended in Christ. This Meeting records its judgment for the guidance of its Subordinate Meetings, that those holding or teaching a contrary doctrine cannot be received as acceptable Ministers of the Society of Friends, within our limits."

In addition to this reminder, and the more effectually to enforce the directions of their Yearly Meeting, the Minute of the Representative Meeting says, it "authorizes and directs that Subordinate Meetings in said Yearly Meeting shall not receive the certificates or issue returning Minutes for Ministers or others in cases in which any doubt exists as to the unity of such persons with said Yearly Meeting or its instructions. And it further authorizes and directs the clerks and correspondents of such Subordinate Meetings to withhold their signatures from such Minutes, if issued or attempted to be issued."

It also appointed a committee to advise or assist in preventing such Ministers from being received or endorsed by subordinate meetings.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement for Tenth Month shows a decrease of $13,201,619. Total cash in the Treasury, $451,068,033.

On the 28th ultimo, Bartholdi's colossal statue of a "Liberty Enlightening the World," on Bedloe's Island, New York, was presented to President Cleveland, who accepted it on behalf of the United States. An enormous influx of visitors from the surrounding country and other cities, swelled the multitude of spectators in New York.

There were slight earthquake shocks on the afternoon of the 31st ult., at Charleston and Columbia, South Carolina, the time of the shake being about 20 minutes past 2 o'clock. There were two slight shocks at Summerville, the second at 4.46 p. m., on the 1st instant.

There was another shock of earthquake at Summerville at 25 minutes past 8 o'clock A. M., but no damage was done.

On the 28th ultimo, a limited express train on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad, ran into an open switch at East Rio, thirteen miles east of Portage, Wisconsin, shortly before one o'clock. The engine, baggage car and two coaches left the track, were badly smashed, and caught fire from the stoves. Four sleepers remained on the rails, and three of these, with the rest of the train, were consumed by fire. In one of the coaches fourteen passengers were burned to death. All those in the sleepers got out uninjured, except for slight bruises, but many of those who escaped from the coaches were severely injured.

According to the Scientific American, seventeen per cent. of all persons engaged in the tobacco industry in this country are children. There are 3750 children under fifteen years of age working all day in the mill, foundries, and factories of Chicago. Girls are found "working in the brick factories, wheeling bricks in the broiling sun to earn the bread that their father's wages will not buy," say the Knights of Labor. The number of children employed in our country, between 1870 and 1880, increased 59 per cent., while the number of adult males increased only 25 per cent., and the most of these children are only twenty-five cents a day.

The "Correction," in Kings county, N. Y., reports an excess of $10,564.14 in receipts over expenditures for its past year, and the Warden attributes the satisfactory result to the payment for their keep forced from tramps, who are compelled to work—and only two of the tramps so employed were recommitted during the year.

Silver has been discovered in the neighborhood of Caldwell, Kansas, and that place "now presents the appearance of a mining town." Samples of the ore were sent to the State Assayer at Denver, and the Assayer of the Mint at Philadelphia. The former reports an assay of three hundred and forty-two ounces per ton, the latter three hundred and ten ounces, each with a trace of gold. "The ore crops out in many localities."

The Women's Christian Temperance Union has issued a protest against the display of liquor dealers' advertisements in the street cars.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 378, which was 37 more than during the previous week, and 51 more than during the corresponding week last year. Of the foregoing 174 were males and 204 females; 63 died of consumption; 21 of croup; 22 of pneumonia; 16 of typhoid fever; 15 of diphtheria; 15 of convulsions; 14 of old age; 14 of marasmus, and 13 of Bright's diseases.

Cotton was dull on a basis of 9½ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum was quiet, but steady, at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 83 cts. for 110 test in cases.

Feed was firm, with light offerings and a moderate inquiry.—Sales of four cars choice winter bran at $15 per ton.

Flour and Meal.—Flour met with a fair inquiry from the local trade at former rates. Sales of 125 barrels of Pennsylvania family at $3.50; 250 barrels Ohio, straight, at $4.25; 125 barrels Illinois, straight, at $4.35; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.50 a $4.70; 125 barrels, at Minnesota, clear, at $4; and 500 barrels do. patent, at $4.75 a $4.90. Rye flour was steady at $3.25 per barrel for choice.

Beef cattle were active at 3 a 5½ cts. Sheep were dull, at 1¼ a 4½ cts. Lambs, were fair, at 3 a 7½ cts.

Hogs were ½c. lower; Western, 5½ a 6½ cts.; State, 5½ a 6 cts.

FOREIGN.—William E. Gladstone, in response to a request to contribute to a book defining the Liberal programme, says: "My friends forget my years. I hold on to politics in the hope of possibly helping to settle the Irish question. But general operations of the party and particular subjects I am obliged and intend to leave to the hands of others."

A large number of landlords in West Clare, Ireland, have made a reduction in their rents. The rents on the Browne estates are reduced 40 per cent., and on the O'Kelly estates 30 per cent. Col. Stewart made a reduction of 20 and Capt. Morgan of 15 per cent. The tenants generally are paying. The Marquis of Headfort has refused to reduce the rents on his estates in County Cavan. The tenants have accordingly resolved unanimously to refuse to pay rents at the present rate, and each will subscribe a shilling for every acre of land he occupies towards a defence fund to be used to prevent their ejection.

Advices received in London from Rangoon, say that officials of Burmah state that it will be impossible to subjugate that country under four years, and that a large army will be needed to restore order.

The Customs Committee of the French Chamber of Deputies, have decided in favor of the bill raising the duty on foreign wheat from three to five francs.

The French in the New Hebrides are constructing roads leading from ports to the interior, and are erecting many substantial buildings. These improvements point to the permanent occupation of the islands by France.

General Kaulbars, the Russian Military Agent, has addressed a fresh note to the Bulgarian Foreign Minister in which he says: "In view of the arrival at Varna of Government emissaires, who are spreading reports that the presence of Russian gunboats there is without importance. I am compelled to inform you that those gunboats will vigorously affirm their importance, if events render it necessary."

In view of Europe's apathy to Bulgarian interests, it is believed to be useless to struggle against Russia's ascendancy, and Bulgaria is willing to accept almost any terms of compromise.

The Government of Bulgaria has ordered that the Russian language shall no longer be taught in the public schools of Bulgaria, but that the German language shall be taught instead.

News was received in New Zealand, on Ninth Mo. 31st, that some native villages were destroyed by a volcanic eruption on the island of Niau, in the Tonga group of the Friendly Islands. The whole island has been devastated by volcanic deposits. White Island, in the Bay of Plenty, is in a state of active eruption, a vast column of smoke ascending from the island to the height of 1000 feet.

The San Francisco Bulletin, publishes a letter from Apia, dated Tenth Month, 15th, which says that "authentic news has reached Samoa to the effect that on the morning of September 10th, over one hundred heavy shocks of earthquake occurred on the Island of Nainofu, one of the Tonga group, and that from the bottom of the lake, which is two thousand feet deep, a mountain has arisen to the height of three hundred feet above its surface;" also that this mountain has burst out in flames, and thrown out hot stones and sand in such quantities as to destroy two-thirds of the coconut trees on the island. In Samoa "light shocks of earthquake occur so frequently now that they no longer cause any alarm."

The revenue of the Dominion of Canada shows an increase from Seventh Month, 1st, to Tenth Month, 20th, of $1,362,000 as compared with the corresponding period of last year.

She endured many years of suffering with patience and resignation to the Divine will. She was a bright example of uprightness and true humility, possessing a meek and quiet spirit, with love to all. This language seems applicable to her experience:—"Many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth him out of them all."

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Eighth Mo. 9th, 1840. Desire to feel sensible of the privilege of thus meeting together to wait upon the Lord.

13th and 16th. Hope I am not losing ground in best things! but feel very poor.

20th. Again a little comforted by being given to see that seasons of stripping and poverty are for my good.

Ninth Mo. 10th. Afresh made sensible that nothing short of following the path of duty will give peace.

13th. E. C. ministered this day from the faithfulness and faith of Abraham; his being willing to offer up his son, his only son. When the Lord had sufficiently proved him, then fulfilled He his covenant with him. It was through faith that Abraham obtained this blessing, and it was through faith that Daniel was preserved in the lion's den, and Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego in the midst of the burning fiery furnace. Many others we read of who, "through faith obtained a good report." His exercise was, that none of us might neglect or call in question the Divine will when made manifest; for the Lord is able to strengthen even the very weakest. May we lay hold of the help and encouragement held forth this day.

20th. Never more sensible of the presence of the dear Master being in the midst. And a little encouragement was afforded that He would bless all his rightly concerned ones.

27th. This has been a day of secret exercise; desiring to be rightly directed in regard to entering Westtown School as teacher. I believe my will is given up; and am resigned to go or stay as my friends see best.

Tenth Mo. 25th. It is now decided that I go to Westtown as teacher in the writing school. In about one week I leave home. "If Thy good Spirit go not with me, carry me not up hence."

Eleventh Mo. 1st. The last opportunity for some time that I shall have to mingle with my friends here in a meeting capacity. Many precious seasons I have witnessed, and covenants made; some of which I am about entering upon. May it please my Heavenly Father to go with me, to be with me, and to strengthen me to go in and out before the dear children aright; for sensible I am, not one right step can I take without his Holy Help.*

5th. Have now been at my new home three days; feel very much like a stranger in a strange place. Had I ever been a scholar here should not feel my awkwardness so much. Hope ere long not to labor under so much embarrassment.

8th. First-day. Feel my exposed situation, placed before the dear children. How nature shrinks from it!

22nd. Had the company and labors of Wm. Kirkwood, a Friend from Sadsbury. He spoke in our meeting, in collection, and lastly had an opportunity with the teachers. He believed there was no situation in which we could be placed, in which a life of prayer was more needed, so as to be able rightly to govern ourselves, and then the dear children. That we could not do the work aright without Holy Help. All who come unto Christ, in living faith, He will help, &c., &c. Don't be afraid of suffering, he said; but be willing to go again and again into the furnace, till all is consumed that is offensive in the divine sight. His supplication in our afternoon meeting was very solemn. How did he intercede, that helpers from amongst the young people might be raised up! that the Church might be seen coming up as out of the wilderness, leaning on the arm of her beloved, "Fair as the moon," &c. He believed there were of this description, who are preparing for the work in this family.

24th. Got along to-day comfortably with my school. What a satisfaction it is to instruct good children; such as are not only desirous to learn, but who are endeavoring to do that which is right. It has been cause of secret rejoicing to me to see such a number of this class amongst the dear children. May the Lord keep and preserve them, is my secret prayer.

29th. On arising this morning, desires were raised for an increase of stability and watchfulness. There is such a disposition in me to soar above the pure witness for Truth, that I need constantly to be on the watch. During our sit-conveyed by our Diarist in the foregoing memoranda. Her simple dependence upon, and prayerful application to, the Lord of life and glory, accompanied with the earnest desire to be strengthened with might by Him for the very responsible duty of the oversight of children, even to go in and out before them with holy discretion and godly fear, are well worthy the regard and deep consideration of all who assume such an accountable vocation as tutor of the youthful heart and mind. Children's susceptible age, their quick perception of right and wrong, of consistency and inconsistency, makes it a time when principles, actions, and particularly the example of those so influentially set over them, are photographed too strongly to be easily erased.

Subject as all are to temptations and weaknesses, can aught serve instead of the invaluable aid and blessing of religion, and the need of "holy help" in those, especially, who take upon them the teacher's office—the nurture of our youth? lest the absence of the fruits of piety and virtue, that we would so hopefully look for in the after life of such children, be in measure traced to the want of guarded restraint and religious exercise on their behalf, in those set over them, not only for intellectual, but also for moral and religious instruction and growth. For should not education ever be the handmaiden of the religion of Jesus, to whom we owe every thing we have and are?]

ting together in meeting this morning, a sense of my condition was given me, with a little strength to ask help; self was humbled and put down. Near the close of the meeting our dear friend, Sarah Emlen, was led to supplicate in a very solemn manner, for the preservation of those who had none but their Father in heaven, nor none in all the earth to look unto—the fatherless and motherless. How sweetly did she intercede for these! that their faith might be more and more increased; that those who were secretly saying, "Lord, I believe, help thou my unbelief." She interceded that these might be kept. And continued: "Thou who hast been with some of the fathers and mothers, who have gone before, in their wilderness journey through this world, where they had none to look unto but Thee, be with the dear children. Enable them to draw nearer and nearer unto Thee. Be with us when we lay on our pillows; when we eat, drink, and walk by the way and are sad. We are sensible that we are halt and lame; and that it is only through Thee we are enabled to walk aright," &c.

30th. Attended, with some of the other teachers, Chester Monthly Meeting. We had the company of the Quarterly Meeting's Committee, appointed to visit the subordinate meetings on account of the neglect of the attendance of our members. Had also our dear friend Wm. Kirkwood; who was excellent in testimony to those who felt poor and deeply tried. It was as a balm to my wounded spirit! how encouraging his language to press on and not give out, but wrestle the whole night season through, &c. Benjamin Cope spoke in a lively manner, particularly to the young people, in respect to the attendance of meetings. Also our dear friend S. Emlen, in the last meeting. Was it not, she said, for want of faith, a little more living faith, that our meetings were so neglected by some? She had craved there might be an increase of faith among us! and said that were we only sufficiently sensible of the obligations we lay under to our Heavenly Father, we should not be willing thus to absent ourselves, letting little things hinder us from going to meetings. How much more true comfort we should have, did we only press through and forward! Then a way would often be made for us, where we could see none; and our meetings would often be blest to us, when we least expected it.

Twelfth Mo. 13th. On arising this morning, I think I may say, sincere desires were raised to walk aright through this day. Had a good quiet time previous to going into meeting. Was self-humbled in reading in the life of Jane Pearson, the exercises and trials she had to pass through! How the enemy was permitted to buffet! yet was she enabled to say, "The Lord liveth, and because He lives, I shall live also." On gathering into silence in our meeting, a little strength was given secretly to cry, that the Lord's hand might not spare, nor his eye pity, till there was a change, a right change, in me. Near the close of the meeting, dear S. Emlen was lively in testimony, quoting: "The dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live." Said, the power is the same it ever was to raise up from the grave—the grave of sin and transgression—if there is only a right application of heart unto Him. Among the dear children she believed there were lambs of our Heavenly Father; who, though they had not yet openly confessed their dear Lord before men, the time, she believed, was not very far distant when these would have both in their conduct and conversation, to confess Him whom their souls loved; the language of whose hearts often was, O God, thou art my God, early will I seek thee; my soul thirsteth after thee, in a dry and thirsty land where no water is. I could set my seal to this testimony: for I do believe there are a precious number of this class amongst the dear children; and how I have craved their preservation.

Glen Summit.

At the station of Glen Summit, on the Lehigh Valley Road, twenty miles south of Wilkesbarre, stands the Glen Summit Hotel, which bids fair, as the place is better known, to become a favorite resort for the invalid in quest of pure air, or the overworked plodder needing rest and quiet. Standing on the Nescopce Mountain, a ridge dividing the waters of the Susquehanna on the one side, from those of the Lehigh on the other, the position commands an extended view for many miles of wooded mountain sides and valleys intervening, with here and there a clearing and its farm-house. As is often the case at this season of the year, the autumnal haze at times cuts off much of the distant view; but when a storm that swept over us had cleared the atmosphere, and sent the mercury from 60° to 33°, the sight that greeted the eyes of those that rose betimes the next morning, was grand beyond description. The orb of day appearing above the mountain at the rear of the house, illuminated the peaks of the farthest range, miles and miles away, the great stretch between resting as in the twilight. Gradually the belt of light approached, bringing into view range after range that had escaped our notice, until in due time, the whole landscape was bathed in glorious sunshine; and the mountain sides and valleys displayed their variegated autumnal tints in gorgeous and most attractive variety.

But few buildings are in sight from the porch of the house, and were it not for the numerous trains that rush to and fro over the Lehigh Valley Road, immediately in front of us, and on the Lehigh and Susquehanna Road, a few rods farther off, but almost wholly concealed from view by the foliage of the woods, it would not be difficult to imagine oneself far removed from the habitation of any family, outside of that occupying the Glen Summit Hotel. These passing trains are objects of much interest, those for passengers arriving from our own neighborhood, being closely watched for familiar faces they may bring; and the arrival of the mails three times daily, awaited with an eagerness that only sojourners from loved ones at home can know.

The heavy trains of coal cars, seventy-five or eighty in each, puff by, loaded with the black diamond from the Lehigh region, by which we are here surrounded, bearing their freight to the cities of New York and Philadelphia and intermediate places, while the inscriptions on the freight cars, show the distant roads over which many of them must pass, before unloading their diversified burdens. Being but about four hours ride from Philadelphia, our morning mail arrives at 9.30, and the daily papers and letters are not far behind their city delivery.

Glen Summit is emphatically a place for restful leisure, there being less to occupy the attention and provoke to activity, than at most other resorts. But the pure mountain air is most invigorating, and the long nights at command are an important element in the rejuvenating effects of such a change.

A favorite ride is by rail to Wilkesbarre, affording, as the road winds down and around the mountain, the view of the famous Wyoming Valley, so well and so deservedly known. Some take the other direction, and steam down to Mauch Chunk, for the favorite Switchback, and Onoko Glen, taking for this excursion the day, from 9.30 A. M., to 7 P. M. The Wilkesbarre trip is a morning affair, and affords an opportunity for a ride through the town, and a return by dinner time.

Located nearly due East from our hotel, in the midst of mountain scenery, is the little settlement of Bear Creek, connected by rail with the Lehigh Valley Railroad, and known principally for its lumbering interests. A party of friends who were spending a few days at Glen Summit, heeding the advice of others not to omit Bear Creek, hired a team of good Wilkesbarre horses, and were driven over the mountains on a road that would do no discredit to Delaware or Chester Counties. A large lake, Crystal by name, was passed, having on its banks one house, which was only the second one seen on the drive of seven miles. Here and there, especially as our distance from the railroad increased, we found groves of fine trees, particularly hemlock and pine; but as a rule, the forest fires that so often sweep over these mountain regions, prevent much of a growth beyond the stunted bushes of a few feet, which were beautifully tinted with autumn hues. Just before reaching the settlement, our driver turned his horses up a steep ascent, to give a view of the little world at our feet, and a view we had from which it was difficult to tear ourselves away.

But just here let us say that the moving spirit in the settlement of Bear Creek is a lumber prince, formerly of White Haven, who, marrying a delicate woman, brought her here with the hope that the pure mountain air, and the luxuries with which he could surround her, might for a length of time overcome disease, if not effect a permanent cure. A neat cottage was erected, having about it the air of a true home. A dam across Bear Creek forms a large lake, in the midst of which is a little island a few feet square. On it stands a summer arbor, where the invalid could enjoy the fresh air from over the water; a rustic bridge leading to it from the main-land. In the grove of fine and noble pine trees, was erected a miniature log-cabin, on the porch of which the medicinal air could be inhaled. Roads, smooth as those of our Fairmount Park, wind in and out between little gardens enclosed, and through groves of evergreens of such dense growth the sun's rays could penetrate with but little force. A neat station-house accommodates the traveller on the little railroad of Bear Creek; another shelters a private car, on which our lumber prince travels, and which has borne him as far from home as to New Orleans. Sheltered by trees, so as to be invisible a few feet away, stands a little chapel, where the summer visitors form quite a congregation—for here, in this retired nook, is a boarding house where a number of families from the neighborhood of Wilkesbarre, enjoy the season's quiet. On one occasion the invalid wife expressed her feeling it would be pleasant to have, on the elevated point we were first driven to, a cottage for use in the heat of summer. At once the devoted husband had made a smooth road to the summit, with a house of hexagon shape, commanding a view as lovely as eye could ask to rest upon.

Immediately at our feet, completely embowered in trees, is the little chapel whose spire just peeps above the surrounding foliage. To the left is the home of the Proprietor, with the cottages of a few relatives, rivalling each other in neatness and taste. Just beyond lie the lake, and island, with the summer-house, while farther away, and part way up the mountain side, stand one of the three saw-mills used in preparing the timber for market. To the right, the railroad winds around the mountain, following the sinuous course of Bear Creek on its way to the Lehigh River; the shore on the far side being skirted by the drive, emerging here from the pine grove. It is a rare combination of natural beauty and the skill and taste of the masterhand that so successfully directed the improvements on this charming spot. But less successful proved his efforts to arrest the progress of the disease that consumed the life of his cherished wife. About a year before our visit, her remains were laid in an enclosure immediately fronting the little chapel, where she was wont, when able, to assemble with her neighbors. In accordance with her desire to be laid where the birds would sing over her grave, means were adopted to induce them to build there, and our attention was called to a nest directly on the shaft over the tomb, in which the birdlings of last summer were hatched and reared.

While many of us feel that beyond securing the decent and proper disposal of the remains of our dead, and the due care of places of interment it makes little matter where the final resting place may be; we doubt not our friend of Bear Creek, in whose history so much interest has been aroused, felt it proper to carry out as far as practicable, the wishes of his lost one. And we turned from the spot, deeply impressed with the sadness of the sequel of this young life at the early age of thirty-one years; and with the hope that others may find their way, when sojourning at Glen Summit, to the lovely settlement of Bear Creek. N. M. E.

For "The Friend."

Would it not be profitable for us in these times of unsettlement, to consider those duties and doctrines laid down by the inspired writer in the 4th chapter of his Epistle to the Ephesians? That thus a religious life might be promoted, the church edified, and we be made helpful one to another.

"I therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called, with all lowliness and meekness, with longsuffering, forbearing one another in love; endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; one Lord, one faith, one baptism; one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all. But unto every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ." &c.

These are doctrines and duties that should not be neglected, indeed, the whole chapter is none other than a plain, practical exhortation to a Christian life; and a conduct in accordance with it, would be more convincing than so much stir; and exemplify the lives of our worthy forefathers in the Truth, who were faithful in their day and generation.

Bible Readings.

The interest and instruction derived from reading many portions of the Holy Bible are increased by a proper understanding of the historical facts related. If the books of the prophets are read in connection with cotemporary historical parts of the Scriptures, light is thrown on many obscure passages or allusions that it is impossible to acquire by desultory or routine reading. In order to pursue such research, it is important to have a good reference Bible. The quarto edition published by the "Bible Association of Friends" in Philadelphia, has the notes, references and dates in a centre column on each page with an index heading at top of each column, with a concordance and index appended in the back of the book. A good Bible dictionary and map afford important aid in satisfactorily pursuing such study.

We were recently much interested in reading in this way the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, with their cotemporaries, the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, which give the history of the Jews during an important period of their national existence.

The closing scene recorded in the 2nd book of Chronicles (which is supposed to have been compiled by Ezra) is the account of the total overthrow of the Jews under Zedekiah, and the destruction of Jerusalem, by Nebuchadnezzar, and of the last remnant of the Jews being carried into captivity to Babylon 588 B. C. With this event, the kingdom of Israel was virtually ended. During the next seventy-four years we have no recorded history of the Jews and but few allusions to their existence. The book of Ezra is a continuation of the book of Chronicles and gives account of the Jews' return to Jerusalem from this captivity, and of their rebuilding the temple, in accordance with the orders of King Cyrus, and King Darius. Smith's Bible Dictionary says: "The edict of Cyrus, King of Persia, in the year 536 B. C. for the rebuilding of the temple of Jerusalem, was the beginning of Judaism." By this decree, the Babylonian captivity was brought to a close. Cyrus granted permission to all who chose to do so to return to Jerusalem and participate in the rebuilding of the temple, which had lain waste for many years. A portion of them, about 42,000, returned under the command of Sheshbazzar or Zerubbabel, 535 B. C. Another company returned with Ezra, in 458 B. C., and others with Nehemiah in 445 B. C. The first efforts of each of these companies were directed to restoration of the temple. The book of Ezra gives an account of this work, which was commenced under the direction of Zerubbabel and Jeshua 535 B. C., according to the decree of Cyrus. When Artaxerxes became king, the adversaries of the Jews asked permission to build with them. Zerubbabel and Jeshua replied, "Ye have nothing to do with us to build an house unto our God, but we ourselves together will build unto the Lord God of Israel as King Cyrus the king of Persia hath commanded us. Then the people of the land weakened the hands of the people of Judah and troubled them in building, and hired counsellors against them, to frustrate their purpose all the days of Cyrus." The Jews were much discouraged by this opposition; the temple was neglected, and for several years the work upon it was entirely suspended during the reigns of Ahasuerus and Artaxerxes the next two monarchs who succeeded Cyrus, "even until the reign of Darius, king of Persia," who was the next successor.

It was during this interval of opposition and discouragement that the prophets Haggai and Zechariah prophesied unto the Jews that were in Judah and Jerusalem in the name of the God of Israel." Their influence appears to have been considerable. It is recorded in Ezra 6th chapter, 14th verse, "And the elders of the Jews builded, and they prospered through the prophesying of Haggai the prophet, and Zechariah the son of Iddo." The temple was finished and dedicated in the year 515 B. C. The history of this restoration is contained in the first six chapters of the book of Ezra, which are supposed to have been written by Haggai. There is then a gap in the historical record of 58 years. It would appear from subsequent events, that during this period the Jews had again relapsed into a condition of sinful indifference, and become contaminated by contact with their heathen neighbors.

The last four chapters of Ezra tell of the reformation that he was largely instrumental in effecting among them. All that is really known of Ezra is contained in these four chapters. From these it appears that he was a learned and pious priest in Babylon, during the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, from whom he obtained permission to go to Jerusalem, and to take with him a company of Israelites. "His great design was to effect a religious reformation among the Palestine Jews, and to bring them back to the observation of the Law of Moses, from which they had grievously declined. His first step was to enforce a separation from their wives upon all who had made heathen marriages. This was effected in a little more than six months after his arrival in Jerusalem. With the detailed account of this important transaction, Ezra's autobiography ends abruptly; and we hear nothing more of him till 13 years afterwards, when we find him again at Jerusalem with Nehemiah."

Nehemiah was cup-bearer to Artaxerxes Longimanus. In the year 445 B. C., certain Jews arrived from Judea and gave him a deplorable account of the state of Jerusalem. He immediately conceived the idea of going there to endeavor to improve their condition and obtained the king's consent for his mission. Nehemiah's great work was rebuilding the city walls that had lain in ruins for 141 years since their demolition by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 B. C. After he had captured the city, he left Nebuzaradan the captain of his guard there to complete the destruction of it, and the pacification of Judea.

"To the restoration of the walls of Jerusalem, and restoring the city to its former state and dignity, as a fortified town, Nehemiah directed his whole energies, and in a wonderfully short time the walls seemed to emerge from the heaps of burnt rubbish and encircle the city as in the days of old."

The main history contained in the book of Nehemiah covers about twelve years, from 445 to 433 B. C. The whole narrative gives us a graphic and interesting account of the state of Jerusalem and the returned captives in the writer's times; and, incidentally, of the nature of the Persian government, and condition of its remote provinces.

The first arrival of Nehemiah as governor of the province of Judea aroused the jealousy of Sanbalat and Tobiah, two civil or military officers who also held appointments under king Artaxerxes, and they did all in their power to retard his great work. After several unsuccessful conspiracies against him, they finally succeeded in arousing such suspicion in the mind of the king that he issued a decree stopping the work till further orders. "It is probable that at the same time he recalled Nehemiah, or possibly his leave of absence had expired. But after a delay, perhaps of several years, he was permitted to return to Jerusalem and to crown his work by repairing the Temple, and dedicating the walls. Nehemiah does not, indeed, mention this adverse decree, nor should we have suspected his absence at all from Jerusalem, but for the incidental allusion in the 2d chapter 6th v., 13th chapter 6th v., coupled with the long interval of years between the earlier and later chapters of the book. It seems that the work stopped immediately after the events narrated in 6th chapter, 16-19 v.; and that chapter 7th goes on to relate the measures adopted by him upon his return with fresh powers."

During his government, Nehemiah firmly repressed the exactions of the nobles, and the usury of the rich; and rescued the poor Jews from spoilation and slavery; and devoted himself, with assiduous firmness and impartiality, to correcting the evils that had crept in among them, and to reforming the civil and religious customs of the city. Ezra was high priest during his government, and was of great service to him in effecting the much needed reformation in Jerusalem.

Notwithstanding all the pains taken by these good men to reclaim their people from infidelity and idolatry, in a few years they relapsed again into irreligious depravity, as is evident from the close expostulations of the prophet Malachi, who was sent by the Lord to reprove them for their profanity and broken covenants. The latest record that we have of Nehemiah's services was in the year 433 B. C.; and Malachi, the last of the prophets recorded in the Old Testament, wrote about 37 years later, 397 B. C.

Workingmen on the Sunday Question.

A deputation of workingmen once appeared before Lord Palmerston and requested him "to be kind enough to hear what they had to say" on the opening of museums and public shows on the Sabbath. With great courtesy he replied, "What workingmen have to say on the Sunday question I shall be very glad to hear."

At the invitation of the Secretary, two workingmen stepped forward and were introduced to his lordship, who received them with marked courtesy and expressed his desire to hear what statements they wished to make. One was a smart-looking man, and from his dress and clean white apron I concluded he was a cabinet-maker. The other was both tall and big, and had to do with the coal trade. "Well," said the former, "which of us shall speak to us?" "Why, you to be sure, for you have more gift of the gab than I have." And so the conversation began.

"Now, sir, I said to my comrade, 'Bill,' says I, 'Well,' says he, 'what's up now?' 'Why can't we have some meetings all our own, and argefy this matter out?' 'Agreed,' said he. And so, sir, we went and got a good-sized room, and drew up a bill, that each side should choose a chairman, and the chairmen should choose an umpire; that there should be three speakers on each side, and no one should speak more than twenty minutes; for don't you think, sir, that any man of sense ought to be able to speak his mind on this 'ere subject in twenty minutes?"

With a gracious smile, and evidently interested and amused, Lord Palmerston replied, "I quite agree with you. Well, and how did you get on?"

"Excellently. The room was full, the chairmen were chosen, and the umpire, and we settled who should begin. I spoke first, and the rest in order, and then it was put to vote, and we carried our resolution that it was not fair nor right to open such places on Sunday by three to one."

"Had you any other meeting besides this?" his lordship inquired.

"Bless you, sir, ever so many; and our majority got larger at every meeting. And we held some at the West End as well as the East End. And so at one of our latest, they, finding they could not beat us in argeyfing, took to hollering. Very foolishly, some of our side began to holler too. But we told them to be quiet, for people soon get tired if hollering is all on one side. There is no good in hollering, for any fool can holler. I hear that you have lots of it in the House where you go so often. Did you ever know any good come of hollering, sir?"

"I can assure you that I do not."

"Well, sir, at that meeting we beat them ten to one, and so on up to the last."

"May I ask in what capacity you are here?"

"Like the rest of the gentlemen, to be sure. We are deputies, we are!"

"Deputies from whom or what?"

"Why, from these meetings, in course."

"Then am I to understand that the workingmen of London are your way of thinking on this matter?"

"No, no, sir, we musn't go as fast as that. But the great majority of the workingmen are, and our large majorities prove it."

Well, now kindly tell me what you want."

"Why, nothing at all sir. There is plenty of laws about Sunday if you would only see to it that they were put in force. But for pity's sake, sir, don't you make any laws to break the Sabbath!"

It is impossible to express in words the fervent earnestness with which this expostulation was uttered. We were all moved by it, and Lord Palmerston evidently felt it.

"Will you kindly listen to one word more? For every twenty or thirty people who would go to the Crystal Palace, or any other public place, several would be deprived of that which is the right of man or beast—the day of rest. Now, is it right or fair that, for the amusement of such persons, that many should suffer? And then we should have the play-houses open, too, and then we should come to work on Sundays, and very likely get six days' wages for seven days' work. Would that be right, sir?"

"This is a new argument to me; kindly repeat it."

"With all the pleasures in life," and it was repeated, and if possible with fresh emphasis and force.

So, taking the memorial in his hand, his lordship said:—"The Cabinet meets this afternoon. I cannot, of course, commit my colleagues. But I shall have great pleasure in laying this memorial before them, and heartily supporting it. But what these intelligent workingmen have said I shall not forget to enforce."

We most heartily thanked his lordship for his patience and courtesy, which he gracefully acknowledged, and we retired, feeling that our cause had been materially advanced by the homely but intelligent statements of these workingmen. It is worth noting, though I do not wish to intimate that it was wholly owing to this incident, that the question was never raised in the House of Commons during Lord Palmerston's remaining life.—The Quiver.

It is the crushed olive that yields the oil; the pressed grape that gives forth the wine; and it was the smitten rock that gave the people water. So it is the broken, contrite heart that is the most rich in holiness, and most fragrant in grace.

BRAMBLE.

[In reading the following verses it must be remembered that the subject of them is the English bramble, and the tender little autumnal picture, though we may enjoy it none the less, would not suit our American landscape in all points.]

The corn is reaped, the bare brown land
Is sleeping in the sunshine bland
Of late September time;
Now after harvest toil and mirth
In restful calmness lies the earth,
Like good lives past their prime.

Red tints of autumn touch the trees,
That rustle in the freshening breeze
And wave their branches strong;
From hillside meadows loud and clear
Comes, clarionlike, a note of cheer—
The thrushes' thrilling song.

The busy wild bee flitteth by
Where honeysuckle waves on high,
And late clematis grows;
A fair brown butterfly floats round
A bramble bush, that on the ground
Its dainty tangle throws.

The lowly bramble taking root
In common hedgerows, bearing fruit
For common hands to pull;
A boon to travellers on the road,
It shows its gracious, purple load,
With blossoms beautiful.

White flowers, like pearly-tinted snow,
Fair foliage, red with autumn's glow,
Ripe fruit—on one fair spray;
Ah me! my heart, what beauty lives
In lowliest things that nature gives
To blossom on our way.

Ah me! my heart, what beauty shows
In lowly lives that to their close
Bloom sweetly out of sight;
Meekest hearts that seek not worldly praise,
That find in life's secluded ways
Dear love and deep delight.

Fair lives that have a humble root,
Sweet lives that bear a gracious fruit,
Yet keep their spring-time flowers
Upon the bough when fruit hangs ripe,
And when the fading leaf is type
Of life's decaying hours.

We meet them in our daily path,
These humble souls, and each one hath
A beauty of its own;
A beauty born of duty done,
Of silent victories dumbly won,
Of sorrow borne alone.

And when the frosts of death fall chill
On those fair lives that blossom still,
Though summer time is past,
We, sighing, wish for quiet ways,
Wherein, like theirs, our shortening days
Might blossom to the last!

LINES WRITTEN IN THE WILDERNESS OF SINAL.

THOMAS C. UPHAM.

I mark'd the bright, the silver star,
That nightly deck'd our desert way,
As, shining from its depths afar,
Its heavenly radiance seem'd to say,
"Oh, look! from mists and shadows clear,
My cheering light is always here."

I saw thee, and at once I knew,
Star of the desert! in my heart,
That thou didst shine, the emblem true
Of that bright Star whose beams impart,
From night to night, from day to day,
The solace of their inward way.

There is a beam to light the mind,
There is a star the soul to cheer;
And they that heavenly light who find
Shall always see it burning clear,—
The same its bright celestial place
In every change of time and place.

Star of my heart, that long hast shone
To cheer the inward spirit's sky,
Illumined from the heavenly throne,—
Thou hast a ray that cannot die.
'Tis God that lights thee! And with Him
No sky is dark, no sky is dim.

Reflections by a young female at the age of seventeen; found amongst her Papers after her Decease.

About a twelvemonth ago, I remember feeling a great resignation and sweetness; I think I then knew what is meant in Scripture by the words, "the silence of the flesh." A feeling very difficult to attain, but which I am convinced every true Christian must strive for till it is attained. For many months past I have believed it to be my duty to do so, to endeavor to feel a mental stillness, or a total resignation of feeling, and cessation from thinking, and in this state to wait for the influences and teachings of Divine Grace and Truth on the heart. When we attain this stillness, the Holy Spirit directs us what to do, what to pray for and how to pray, and shows us when vocal supplication is required of us, and when secret mental prayer is most acceptable to the Father of Spirits. I have often felt anxious to know what is real religion, and have entreated my Heavenly Guide to lead me into it, however painful a surrender of heart and life may be, for without that there is no true and lasting peace to be found, and no preparation for the enjoyment of the Divine presence, in a state of perfect holiness hereafter. I have at different times been desirous to know, whether that profession in which I have been educated, is the right one for me to retain; and whether any other form of worship could be more acceptable to God from me. I never made use of vocal supplication on the subject, but I believe my secret prayers were accepted by Him who knew the sincerity in which they were addressed.

After waiting to be instructed, my desires are at length fully answered, for inward revelation assures me, that mine must be a religion of stillness and total resignation of self; that whether the feeling of devotion excited be that of prayer, praise, gratitude or adoration, I must be immediately influenced by the Spirit of Christ before I can feel union and communion with my Heavenly Father; which (whether words are used or not) alone constitute the essence of worship. I feel convinced that whatever the outward form of worship may be, the only true and acceptable offering is a sacrifice of the heart, and the more I feel of a devotional spirit, the more I am led to be still, and not to look for instrumental aid; for I feel that Christ, the inward teacher and comforter, is all sufficient, and that He is waiting to do me good. In these precious moments, I should feel any ministry a burden that was not prompted by the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit, for any but such ministry must break that inward stillness, in which the Divine will is shown to us, and Heavenly consolations are administered. I often keep silence (mentally) that I may renew my strength, then I mount as on "Eagle's wings." Till within the last year, I knew but little, if any, of this stillness, and my devotions consisted chiefly of supplication and praise, and sometimes, of gratitude to the Supreme Being. Now, on a bed of sickness, perhaps of death, (being in a very precarious state) I feel confirmed in the assurance, that in mental silence only, is to be felt that peace and joy, and union with our Maker, which is, and ever will be, the Christian's only hope and confidence, in the solemn and certain hour of dissolution.

For "The Friend."

For some months, many of the street cars in Philadelphia have displayed in large letters, advertisements of a form of "whiskey." This fact naturally aroused the members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union to some action, and a committee was appointed to visit the Presidents of the lines displaying the signs, and intercede to have them removed. After explaining the cause of their objections, the Remonstrance continues:

"If it is for gain that you allow this, we would cite to you that close query put by our Blessed Master, 'What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?' Will you not with us, strive for that Christianity that will, by precept and example, prove us to be our brothers' keepers in the Lord?"

Though no results are yet apparent, we trust the appeal may reach some hearts and lead them to consider the temptation they are placing before the youth of our city.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 105.

MINISTRY.

In the Journal of James Gough there is mentioned an interesting incident which illustrates the remarkable power that attended the ministry of some of the early members of the Society of Friends. A person of some note, who had been an officer under Oliver Cromwell, related the anecdote as follows, to some people at an inn, among whom was James Wilson, who thereby became more favorably disposed towards Friends, and willing to attend their meetings, he having been, before that time much prejudiced against them.

"After the battle of Dunbar, as I was riding in Scotland at the head of my troop, I observed some distance from the road, a crowd of people, and one higher than the rest; upon which, I sent one of my men to see and bring me word what was the meaning of the gathering; and seeing him ride up and stay there without returning according to my order, I sent a second, who stayed in like manner; and then I determined to go myself.

"When I came thither, I found it was James Naylor preaching to the people, but with such power and reaching energy, as I had not till then been witness of. I could not keep from staying a little, although I was afraid to stay; for I was made a Quaker, being forced to tremble at the sight of myself. I was struck with more terror by the preaching of James Naylor than I was at the battle of Dunbar, where we had nothing else to expect but to fall a prey to the swords of our enemies. I clearly saw the cross of Christ was to be submitted to, so I durst stay no longer, but got off and carried with me condemnation, for it was in my own breast. The people there, in the clear and powerful opening of their states, cried out against themselves, imploring mercy, a thorough change, and the whole work of salvation to be effected in them. Ever since, I have thought myself obliged to acknowledge on their behalf, as I have now done.

The "power and reaching energy" of which this military officer was a witness, were due to the Divine authority which accompanied the message of salvation delivered by James Naylor; and they could not be derived from any other source. Some men are gifted with great natural eloquence, and a wonderful ability in swaying the feelings and passions of men by their oratory, and such men may undertake to preach the Gospel, and may produce much excitement for a time by appeals to the feelings of their auditors; but it is the Lord's power alone that can seal conviction on the heart, and bring into a willingness to bear the cross by bringing all to the Light of Christ that everything may be judged, and that only embraced which is in accordance with the will of God.

Sevel, in his History of the Quakers, mentions the case of an evilly-disposed trumpeter, who, coming into a meeting of Friends, began in an insolent manner to sound his trumpet, thereby to drown the voice of him that was preaching. This stirred up the zeal of the preacher the more, so that he went on as if none disturbed him. The trumpeter at length, to recover his breath, was fain to cease blowing; but being still governed by an evil spirit, after some intermission began to sound again; but whatever he did, he was not able to divert the preacher from his course, though he might hinder the auditory from hearing what was spoken. Thus he wearied himself so much, that he was forced to rest again for respiration, whereby in spite of his evil will, he came to hear what the preacher spoke, which was so piercing that the trumpeter came to be deeply affected with it, and burst into tears, confessed his crime, and came to be a true penitent.

Some years ago, there appeared in the Vermont Courier an interesting relation of the effect produced by a practical sermon, from the text, "He that is unjust in the least, is unjust also in much." The preacher stated that men who take advantage of others in small things, have the element of character which would lead them to wrong the community and individuals in great things, when detection or censure is as little to be dreaded. He pointed out various ways by which people wrong others; such as borrowing improperly; by mistake in charge; by error in accounts; by escaping taxes and custom house duties; by managing to escape postage; by finding articles and never seeking owners; by injuring articles borrowed and not making the fact known to the owner when they were returned, &c.

"One lady met the minister the next day and said, 'I have been up to Mr. — to rectify a mistake he made in giving me change a few weeks ago, for I felt bitterly your reproof yesterday.' Another individual went to Boston to pay for an article not in her bill, which she had noticed was not charged when she had paid it. A man going home from meeting said to his companion, 'I do not believe there was a man in the meeting to-day who did not feel condemned.' After applying the sermon to a score or more of his acquaintances, he continued, 'Did not the pastor utter something about finding a pair of wheels?' 'I believe not, neighbor A. He spoke of keeping little things which had been found.' 'Well, I thought he said two or three times something about finding a pair of wheels, and really supposed he meant me; I found a pair down in my lot some time ago.' 'Do you know,' said his companion, 'whom they belong to?' 'Mr. B — lost them a short time ago.' The owner was soon in possession of his wheels."

Though all spiritual good comes from God, the source and fountain of all our blessings, yet He is often pleased to bless the services of those whom He calls to preach the glad tidings of salvation to others, and to cause the word spoken to profit in that whereunto He directs it.

It is related that Thomas Willis of Cornwall was once preaching from the passage, "My grace is sufficient for thee," and mentioned the following circumstances. A serious young woman was laboring under a strong temptation to drown herself. The enemy so far succeeded, as to prevail on her to go to the river to put the plan in execution, but as she was adjusting her clothes to prevent her from floating, she felt something in her pocket; it was her Bible, and she thought she would take it out and look in it for the last time; she did so, and the above mentioned text caught her eye. It was, under the Divine blessing, applied with energy to her soul; the snare was broken, the temptation was removed, and she returned praising Him who had given her the victory.

The relation of this incident by the preacher proved the means of the conversion of a man and his wife then present, and of effecting a similar deliverance. These persons had been living in a state of almost continued enmity; and their home exhibited a scene of discord and confusion. In one of these unhappy seasons, the wife came to the dreadful determination to drown herself; she accordingly left her house for the purpose, and came near the river, but it being too light, she feared on that account she should be detected. Seeing the place of worship open, she thought she would go in; and when the services were over, it would be sufficiently dark to accomplish her purpose. When she entered Thomas Willis was preaching, and the striking incident described by him so affected her mind, that through mercy, she returned to her home with changed feelings. When she entered the house, her husband looked at her with surprise; her countenance had lost its malevolent expression, and indicated meekness and gentleness. Struck with her appearance, he asked her where she had been, she told him, "And did you," said he, "see me there?" "No," she replied; "but I was, and blessed be God, I found his grace sufficient for me also." The reality of the change thus begun was shown by their future lives, which were such as became the Gospel of Christ.

An interesting illustration of the goodness of the Lord, who sometimes commissions his ministers to extend the offers of mercy to those who have long lived in rebellion to Him, is furnished by an anecdote told of our late beloved friend, Elizabeth L. Redman, of Haddonfield, N. J. In 1833 she was liberated by her Monthly Meeting to attend the Yearly Meeting of Baltimore. While there she was introduced into much exercise on account of an individual whom, three years previously, she had observed at an inn a few miles from that city. Feeling that she could not with an easy mind proceed homeward, without endeavoring to see him, she mentioned the subject to her companion, who inquired his name. She replied, "I know not his name nor his home; I can only say that I saw him not far from this place; but whether he is a traveller or a resident here, I am unable to tell. But I believe if we can see him, we shall find him in affliction."

It being thought right to make the effort to discover him, it was mentioned to a friend, with her description of the appearance of the individual; which was so striking that it was immediately believed to be that of a person known as a slave dealer, noted for great inhumanity. Inquiry was made for the man, and after much search it was ascertained that he resided near where she was then lodging. Elizabeth with her companion went to see him. He was confined to his chamber by indisposition, she at once recognized him; and taking a seat by him, sat for sometime in profound silence. He also sat with his eyes fixed upon her in apparent amazement. She then addressed him in close but kind language, describing his condition as being desperate in the extreme; but said she believed the door of mercy was now open to him, if he would submit to the terms of salvation. After this she knelt and supplicated in a remarkable manner, interceding with the Father of mercies, that in the day of final retribution, the blood of none might be found upon him unrepented of. He was greatly broken by this appeal to the Throne of Grace, and tears flowed down his face abundantly. She then took a kind leave of him, much to the relief of her own mind. He did not recover from this sickness, but after this interview became greatly humbled and changed.

For "The Friend."

I believe that Paul's expression, "woe is unto me if I preach not the Gospel," has been misused; and may have occasioned a holding back from service that was really called for.

Least I should be misunderstood, let me say that I firmly believe the Lord alone can qualify for his service; and that in our meetings for worship, the silence should not be broken by any offering, except by the direct leading of the Holy Spirit. But when a father says to his son, "My child, I should be pleased to have thee do an errand for me," would it not please the father better to have the boy rise at once, and cheerfully do his bidding, than to have him wait until, after repeated injunctions he is told, "If thou does not do it, I shall certainly punish thee?" Surely any wise father would prefer that his child should obey him from love, and for the sake of pleasing him, rather than from fear of punishment.

Though it is, indeed, a solemn thing to speak for the Lord, I believe it is quite right that the words, "I delight to do thy will, O my God," should express our feelings in regard to it. Let us seek diligently to know the will of our Master, and ask Him for grace to enable us to render loving and prompt obedience. E.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Staminate and Pistillate Plants.—To American botanists mainly is due the credit of the discovery that whether a plant be male or female, or a flower on the plant be male or female, is a mere question of nutrition. The primary cell seems capable of developing to an individual of either sex, according to the amount of nutrition it assimilates. In coniferous trees the female flowers, ultimately the cones, are only borne on branches which have plenty of light at command and are endowed with vigorous vitality. When these branches become overshadowed, or weak from age, they are given up to male flowers only. In Indian corn and similar plants, the ears are located where the most favorable conditions for nutrition exist, the male flower or tassel, forming merely the "tail end" of the stalk.

A paper by Hoffman, in the Botanische Zeitung, for 1885, states that he sowed seeds of numerous kinds of diocious plants closely together, so as to give little food to each plant, and the same plants thinly, so as to give each plant nearly all the food it could use. Where they were thickly sowed, he counted 283 males to 700 females. In the well fed lot there were but 76 males. In our own country, the common rag-weed, Ambrosia, is a good illustration of this fact. In a potato or corn field where the plants grow very strong and vigorous, the proportion of female flowers are largely in excess of the male, and it is not uncommon to find plants with nothing but female flowers under these circumstances. But in fields where grain has been cut, and the rag-weed comes up in thick masses late in the season, and nearly starving each other, male flowers are very numerous, and some are wholly male. Female flowers are always few on each plant.

Initiation Rubies.—A Swiss firm has attempted to put on the market, rubies formed by a process of fusion from small stones of the same kind. As the gems were of the same material as the true ruby, they agreed in hardness and specific gravity. But they are readily detected by the different appearance of the microscopic cavities enclosed by the stone. In the genuine, these are angular or crystal-shaped, or sometimes arranged in a "feather" form. In the manufactured stones, the cavities are round or pear-shaped bubbles arranged in cloudy masses, or strings.

Transmission of Infectious Diseases by the Mosquito.—Dr. Charles Finlay, of Havana, has published an article in the American Journal of the Medical Sciences, in which he details some experiments and observations which give color to the theory that the common mosquito is an agent in spreading Yellow Fever.

His plan was to catch a female mosquito while in the act of stinging and before it was filled, by inverting an empty phial or tube-test over it and closing the mouth of the phial with a plug of cotton-wool. The insect is thus in readiness to renew its bite as soon as it has become accustomed to its place of confinement. Indeed, it will die of inanition if not allowed to do so in the course of a few hours (four to twelve in summer.) The captive is then taken to a confirmed case of yellow fever, and the tube being inverted and the cotton plug carefully removed over the bare surface of the patient's arm or hand, the insect is allowed to fill at leisure with the tainted blood, and the plug reinserted. After this blood has been digested, generally between the second and fourth day, the mosquito is applied in the same manner to the arm of a subject liable to the disease, and then allowed again to fill itself completely. This is the inoculation; and when successful, at the end of from five to twenty-two days' incubation, the first symptoms of mild yellow fever will manifest themselves in the inoculated subject.

This is caused by the disease-germs which adhere to the sting and its sheath of the mosquito, after piercing a sick person; and which are introduced into the arm of the person subsequently bitten.

Dr. Finlay inoculated 24 persons in this way. Six of these had mild attacks of fever, which seemed to confer on them immunity from similar attacks. He remarks in the conclusion of his paper:—"A careful study of the habits and natural history of the mosquito shows a remarkable agreement with the circumstances that favor or impede the transmission of yellow fever. So far as my information goes, this disease appears incapable of propagation wherever tropical mosquitoes do not or are not likely to exist, ceasing to be epidemic at the same limits of temperature and altitude which are incompatible with the functional activity of those insects; while, on the other hand, it spreads readily wherever they abound. From these considerations, taken in connection with my successful attempts in producing experimental yellow fever by means of the mosquito's sting, it is to be inferred that these insects are the habitual agents of its transmission."

Australia's Rabbit Plague.—The farmers of Australia seem to be still troubled by rabbits, which breed in that country at a most enormous rate. One man has just accepted a tender for wire netting which is to make a rabbit-proof fence from Narromine to Bourke, and will extend over a distance of 203 miles. If the unfortunate rabbits search along to find the end of the obstruction they will get a bit weary before they have arrived at their destination. It is said that the work will cost £15,000, and at that rate, if a man could offer such a figure, it proves that the rabbit must be the most destructive animal in the antipodes.—Galvani's Messenger.

Artesian Wells in Denver.—In 1883, an owner of land in North Denver on the highlands across the Platte River, began boring for coal. At a depth of about 300 feet a stream of water was suddenly projected with great force, from the bottom to a height of 30 or 40 feet above the surface. At first, it was thought to be temporary, but it continued day after day without any perceptible decrease. Since then many wells have been sunk, varying in depth from 250 to over 700 feet, which together produce about 3,000,000 gallons per day of pure water.—Scientific American.

Eels Hibernating.—In the spring of 1879, while watching the progress of the work of grubbing and otherwise clearing a piece of swamp-meadow I was surprised to find a group of eels, seventeen in number, in a mossy mass of earth and roots of loose texture, through which water from a spring near by freely circulated, but not in such quantities as to enable a fish to swim. These eels were not a tangled mass, so interwrapped as to suggest the idea that they sought contact with each other for mutual aid or warmth, but each was twisted rather than coiled, in quite a snake-like manner by itself, and while each was very near its neighbors, probably no two were in contact. On taking them up—they varied from six inches to a foot in length—they seemed somewhat sluggish and indisposed to escape until revived, as it appeared, by the warmth of the hand, when they struggled to be free.—Rambles about Home.

Items.

—Art not the Handmaid of Religion.—"The highest art may go hand in hand with the lowest civilization. The most exquisite specimens of artistic handicraft in metal are to be found in old Indian work; and the artists were men who drowned their parents, offered human sacrifices to their gods, prostituted virtue in their temples, revered filthy and degraded priests, and had their wives burned on their own funeral pyres. Herbert Spencer laughs at the belief in the moralizing effect of intellectual culture. He says it is 'flatly contradicted by facts,' and points to the criminal record of the country most highly educated for his proofs. Vienna is to-day the most magnificent city in Europe. Nowhere has art made such vast advances as in the streets, the galleries, the churches, the public buildings, the parks, and the homes of the Austrian capital. In no city is there more unbridled and shameless vice. Munich is the art-centre of the Old World. It is, for its size, even more immoral than Vienna."—T. H. Pattison in Baptist Quarterly Review.

—Mission Hospitals.—J. Chamberlain, in The Independent, speaking of the hospitals in India, says:—"The tickets which we give the patients at our mission hospitals and dispensaries are really little leaflets. I have lying before me one in the Telugu language, of which I have myself printed thirty thousand and given them to patients that have come for treatment. It is the size of a gentleman's visiting-card, and has two leaves. It is printed on thick, strong paper that will not wear out. On the front page, with ornamented border, is printed 'Madanapalle Free Hospital,' with blanks for number, date, and patient's name. By that number he is registered, and his disease, symptoms and treatment are entered in the book. This ticket is given to the out-patients. Each time he comes for further treatment or for more medicine, the patient must show this ticket. They keep them very carefully, often for years, lest perchance they want to come again and need this as an introduction. As the patient is registered and receives his number, he seats himself to await his turn for treatment, and opens his folded ticket to see what directions it contains inside. As this may be the only glimmering of truth that some will have in the villages from which some of these patients come, a hundred miles away, I prepared the most concise statement of Christian truth I could and printed there. He reads:

"There is but one true God. He created, controls, and preserves all things that exists. He is sinless. But we are filled with sin. He, to take away our sin, sent his own Son, Jesus Christ, into this world as a Divine Redeemer. That Divine Redeemer, Jesus Christ, gave his life as a propitiatory sacrifice, and now, whoever believes on Him, and prays to Him, will receive remission of sins, and eternal life. This is what the True Veda, the Holy Bible, teaches us."

He turns over to the last page, and finds a quotation from one of their favorite Telugu poets, who wrote six centuries ago. He reads in Telugu:

"The soul defiled with sin, what real worship pays it? The pot unclean, the cookery, who eats it? The heart impure, though it essays devotion, Can Deity receive it? Nay, nay. Be pure, O, man!"

And we add below this: "To give us this very purity of heart spoken of by your poet, our Divine Redeemer, Jesus Christ, came into this world. Believe in Him."

—"Pastors" among Friends.—The action of Iowa Yearly Meeting (Larger Body) in advising Monthly Meetings to support ministers as "pastors," is commented on in The Interchange of Baltimore, by R. H. T., as follows:—

"This step is simply the last one thus far taken on the road to a professional ministry, and that is why it is specially mentioned. If any deny it is a step in this direction, church history as well as the recent history of Friends justifies me in my assertion. Look at the progress of the movement in our Society. We have one particular meeting after another, till there are now said to be twenty of them, supporting some minister among them without secular labor, who is regarded by that meeting as its pastor, and who is expected to do pastoral work. We see a number of our ministers assume the clerical dress, and some of them already allow themselves to be styled 'Reverend.' We find reports of committees in various Yearly Meetings, speaking of the need of stationed pastors, and we now have the recent action in Iowa. In the meantime, one of the leading organs in our Society teaches us that a call to the ministry involves generally at least a call to leave off secular employments, and that it is our duty to support such as are called, as it is to pay clerks in our offices. Finally, the importance of an intellectually trained ministry is insisted upon, and in certain places initial steps looking to this end have been undertaken. Is not all this sufficient to show us the goal to which we are advancing? Could the advance be more rapid than it has been? And because the customs and doctrines of two hundred years have not been upset in fifteen in every place where the new pastoral system has obtained, are we justified in saying that they will not be overturned? Or are we to wait till everything is swept away before we protest? A little boy in Holland was able by thrusting his hand into a little break in the dyke, to keep out the ocean till assistance should come. Had he let that little stream of water from the ocean flow on, while he went to the village for help, the whole country would have been flooded. We see our position. Every new step taken has been one away from the position of Friends and of the early church on the ministry, towards a professional clergy." "It now remains for us to answer the question: Are we to preserve our meetings for worship on their original basis, that is, are we to continue to hold them in dependence upon the Lord to choose whom He will to speak to us? We cannot long do this under any conceivable system of stated and supported pastors. As we value the one we must flee the other."

—The Chinese out-break in Se-Chuen.—Advices from Hong Kong state that there is a dispute between the Methodist and Catholic missionaries in China as to which denomination is responsible for the indiscretions that incited the recent wholesale massacres of Christians in the province of Se-Chuen. The Catholic Bishop of Chun-King has attributed the outbreak to the indiscreet conduct of the Methodists. The latter, however, declare that in Chun-King the massacre of the native Christians and the destruction of their churches and property were due entirely to the popular indignation aroused by the Catholic Bishop, who, the Methodists say, persistently used yellow tiles in the construction of his new cathedral, in spite of repeated warnings that it was dangerous to do so, because it outraged the native faith by making common use of a color venerated as sacred and reserved exclusively for the use of the Emperor.—The Presbyterian.

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 13, 1886.

At the last sitting of the Meeting for Sufferings in Philadelphia, a concern was expressed, in which several of the members participated, that in the funerals of our members all things should be conducted with the quietness, order and solemnity appropriate to such serious occasions.

The large expense sometimes incurred in dressing the corpse in costly materials, was alluded to as one of the improper things which should be avoided. Unnecessary expense and show are out of place at such times, when, if ever, pride and vanity should be humbled as in the dust.

It is often the case that the former dwelling houses of the deceased are too small to comfortably accommodate those who assemble to pay the last tokens of respect to their former friend or relative; and those who are on this account compelled to stand without, often enter into conversation which prevents their giving proper place to those serious impressions which the death of a friend is calculated to produce. In view of this drawback, it was the judgment of several of those who spoke on the subject, that it would be advisable, where circumstances favored, to look towards an increasing use of our meeting-houses as places where the funeral company might convene and quietly wait on the Lord, and partake together of the feeling of solemnity, before the interment.

While it is not desirable that a company should long be kept standing around the grave, especially under circumstances which might endanger the health of the more delicate ones among the mourners, yet, it is often the case that after the body is lowered to its resting place, a very precious and solemn feeling overspreads those present; and it is important that this should not be too hastily interrupted. Would it not be proper that the judgment as to the right time to commence filling the grave, and for the company to leave, should not be left to the undertaker; but that some intimation should be given to him by one of the Friends, whom the Discipline directs Monthly Meeting to appoint to see that proper order is observed at funerals.

Another point that was spoken of in the meeting, was the importance of uniformity in practice in giving notice of funerals. In some neighborhoods the time specified is that for the removal of the corpse to the burying ground; in others, and probably in most, the time given is one hour earlier, that being the time at which the friends of the deceased are expected to assemble.

Our friend, Josiah W. Leeds, has sent us a small tract which he has published, on Simplicity of Attire. He has had some experience in suppressing the exposure of demoralizing show-bills and other prints opposed to social purity; but he is persuaded that it is in the power of Christian women to accomplish more for purity by their adherence to simplicity of attire than can be done by such efforts as he has been engaged in. A note accompanying the tract says: "It may serve to suggest to our young women Friends an added reason for not following after the world's gay fashions."

The following paragraphs are taken from it:—

"Some weeks ago having occasion to cross from Jersey City to New York, I observed on the opposite side of the ladies' cabin of the ferry-boat in which I was seated, two young women of probably eighteen years of age, who appeared to derive excessive entertainment from scanning and criticising the apparel of those of their own sex who successively entered the cabin. Each lady, as she came inside the door, was rapidly 'looked over' by the two giddy watchers, who would then exchange meaningful glances, arch their eyebrows, and give way to a remark, giggle, or laugh. Evidently, dress was in all their thoughts. In noting their general demeanor, it seemed to me that those girls were such as would surrender everything, that they might themselves become the recipients of the favors and bestowments of that fickle, and withal merciless, goddess—fashion. For I have not forgotten what was said to me some years ago by a friend who had just returned from the city of Washington, when, in referring to the frivolity and the licentiousness prevailing there, he repeated the remark of a high official—that it was not in most cases mere 'badness' that led so many young women astray, as it was the craving to be richly and fashionably dressed, to gratify their love of adornment and display, to shine above others.

"A worthy woman said to my wife, when discoursing upon this subject in connection with benevolent work among the poor and the outcast, that upon a certain occasion, dressed in elegant attire, she had made a visit to a home for the fallen. Upon leaving the house she felt decidedly pleased with herself at the orderly behavior of the inmates, and the seemingly respectful attention with which they had received her moral remarks. Afterward, however, when the matron observed that 'the girls were so glad to have you come, for indeed it did their eyes good to feast on so fine a dress and to see the latest fashion,' she said that she felt humbled to the dust, and as though she could sink through the floor. The lesson was never forgotten, for she has always since then been careful to dress with simplicity when duty called her to such places.

"Corroborative of the above is the following: A repentant female convict in one of our penitentiaries, pleadingly said to a benevolent woman visitor, that she wished the ladies who came to the prison to speak and pray with them would dress more simply, for the prisoners' thoughts were often so drawn away to the visitors' fine or fashionable attire, that they received no good impressions whatever, but rather the reverse. Her own fall had been caused by dress. A visitor to our county prison, looking upon a number of young women who had been locked up over night for disorderly conduct, wondered that she should see females so finely dressed in such a place. She was given to understand that it was the love of gay attire which, more than aught else, had been the cause of their downfall.

"It is not, therefore, simply against sensuous or indecent attire that I plead, but against such attire in general as is out of conformity with what the Apostle commends in his well known remarks to Timothy, that the apparel of those professing godliness needs to be of that modest character which properly accords with the 'shamefastness and sobriety' of Christian women. Probably it may seem to some that it may be a rather tame, and not a particularly direct and heroic method of combating the social evil—this of going counter to the generally accepted styles of dressing and adorning, and so appearing in a way which might cause one to be mistaken for a primitive Methodist or even a Quaker,

Some may even deem it to be ridiculous or despicable. Nevertheless, unless there is a breaking away from this enslaving spirit of fashion, it seems to me there can be no permanent progress made in the direction of social purity reform."

We have received from "The Interstate Publishing Company," No. 30 Franklin St., Boston, a small book by Arthur Gilman, entitled "Short Stories from the Dictionary;" and have been interested in its examination. It gives the derivation of many words, traces the steps by which their present meanings have been acquired, and brings to view some curious historical facts associated with them. The reader can scarcely fail to derive from it useful information; and to be impressed with a sense of the wide field of research which our large dictionaries open to him.

Secret Societies.—To organize a secret association for the sake of combating any evil, seems to us so decidedly in the line of doing evil in the hope that some good may result from it, that we are pleased to see the Editor of the Advocate of Peace has too clear an insight into the workings of such associations, to be beguiled into such a course—as appears by the following extract from that paper:—

"An honored friend has suggested that if we would effectually oppose the secret machinations of the enemies of Peace, we should, like them, organize a secret society with the badges, passwords, &c. The people would be pleased and our work greatly benefited. There can be no doubt of the great popularity of secret societies. But we have grave doubts whether such a course would help the cause of Peace. Whether it would or not, such are our views as to secret societies, that we could not conscientiously favor forming or joining one."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Elections were held on the 2nd instant in 35 of the States and in the Territories, for members of Congress and other officers. The general result is to reduce the Democratic majority in the House of Representatives to a small margin. By a change in the complexion of the newly elected State Legislatures, U. S. Senators will be chosen by which the Republican majority in the U. S. Senate will be nearly or quite obliterated. Other unexpected changes have resulted. For instance, Virginia chooses 6 Republican and 4 Democratic Congressmen. Prominent free trade Democrats in the South and West, are either defeated, or else elected by reduced majorities. On the other hand, California goes Democratic, and Abram S. Hewitt is elected Mayor of New York City by something more than 90,000 votes, over Henry George, Labor candidate, who received about 68,000 votes, and J. Roosevelt, Republican, whose vote was a little more than 60,000.

It is believed the Prohibitionists have about doubled their vote since the last election, which is encouraging.

The Supreme Court of New Jersey has decided the Excise laws of 1877 and 1878 to be unconstitutional. "The result of this decision is that no saloon keeper has the right to sell liquor until the Legislature meets and enacts a new law."

Lawrence Donovan, of New York, who some time ago jumped from the Brooklyn bridge into the East river at New York, jumped from the new suspension bridge at Niagara Falls into the river below, at seven o'clock on the morning of the 7th instant. His jump was witnessed by four or five persons. He went straight down, feet first. He came up somewhat dazed, but struck out for a boat, in which were two persons, was taken in and stimulants were given him. One rib is broken and his hip is bruised. He said before he got out of the water that he would not jump again for a million.

Sabine Pass, Texas, is not to be abandoned, as was stated soon after the recent floods. Over 200 men have returned there and are building new homes. The river is full of flatboats loaded with lumber, which was purchased with the relief money. There are only three women in the colony, the rest being left at Beaumont and Orange. The men say they could not stay at Beaumont in idleness. They must do something, and so concluded to return. Their new homes are higher above the river level than the old ones were. Many of them are elevated on piling.

On the 5th instant shocks of earthquake were felt in Georgia, the Carolinas and Virginia and the District of Columbia. The shock at Charleston, experienced at half-past twelve o'clock P. M., was slight, though "marked." Another moderately strong shock was felt in Charleston about eleven o'clock on the night of the 6th. It was of perhaps ten or twelve seconds' duration, and was generally felt throughout the State. It was followed in about five minutes by another shock, which, however, was beautiful meteor, resembling a ball of electric light, and leaving a long trail, was seen between 9 and 10 o'clock on the night of the 4th instant, from Jersey City and New Haven. "It was fully two feet in diameter," and the trail of light left by it "did not disappear for fully a minute." About half-past six o'clock the same evening a brilliant meteor, which before it disappeared grew smaller, and "left behind a luminous wake composed of innumerable stars, only visible for a moment," was seen by many people of Brooklyn, New York.

The silver product of Montana for the present year is estimated at $12,000,000. The deaths in this city last week numbered 397, which was 19 more than during the previous week, and 63 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing 208 were males and 189 females; 70 died of consumption; 34 of pneumonia; 22 of convulsions; 22 of croup; 22 of diseases of the heart; 17 of typhoid fever; 16 of old age; 11 of debility; 11 of marasmus, and 9 of casualties.

Petroleum was quiet, but steady, at 63 cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 83 cts. for 110 test in cases. Feed was scarce and firm, with a fair demand. Sales of 2 cars choice western winter bran at $15 per ton.

Flour and Meal.—The situation of the flour market was unchanged. Jobbers bought only enough to supply current requirements at former rates. Sales of 125 barrels of Pennsylvania family at $3.65; 125 barrels Pennsylvania, roller straight, at $4.20; 125 barrels Indiana, clear, at $4; 375 barrels Ohio and Illinois, straight, at $4.25; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.50 a $4.65; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4; and 500 barrels do. patent, at $4.65 a $4.80. Rye flour moved slowly at $3.25 per barrel for choice.

Grain.—Wheat was quiet. No. 2 red closed at 83 cts. bid and 84 cts. asked. Corn—No. 2 mixed closed at 44 cts. bid and 45 cts. asked. Oats were quiet but steady. No. 2 white closed at 35 cts. bid and 35½ asked. Beef cattle were fairly active and prices closed steady at 3 a 3½ cts.

Sheep were active and higher, at 2½ a 5 cts. Lambs were fair, at 4 a 6 cts.

Hogs were active and firm, Western at 5½ a 6 cts. FOREIGN.—John Bright writes to the papers refusing to accept the principle of political clubs and associations, that whoever the leader of a party goes, the whole party is bound to follow. He says:

"We (the Liberals) have not yet had an infallible leader, and until he appears I must preserve my liberty of judgment. The Liberal party will not be destroyed. It will be instructed and become more competent for future work. The reunion of the party will not come until a change comes, which I may hope for, but at present discover no signs of. Smooth platform talk will not bridge the chasm in our ranks."

There has been a marked decrease of crime in Kerry, owing partly to landlords' reductions, and partly to General Buller's system of closely watching suspects, instead of guarding persons liable to attack. The new system has been so effective that the demolition of the police protection huts has been commenced.

A Hanburg correspondent of a London paper hears that a scheme is far advanced for a second Suez Canal, to be exclusively English, and that there is an enormous amount of capital at the disposal of the projectors.

Completed statistics show that the year's increase in the value of German exports to America is $17,000,000, including $4,000,000 worth of sugar. Compared with the exports in 1876, the increase amounts to $50,000,000. The total exports for the year are placed at 3,000,000,000 marks, of which 10 per cent. went to America.

The Dantzig Zeitung predicts terrible distress during the coming winter in that city. It says that trade is paralyzed, and that work is failing everywhere; that the authorities of the State dock yards discharge men weekly, and that in the arm factories there are also many hundreds idle.

Geschoff, Bulgarian Minister of Finance, has resigned. It is announced from St. Petersburg that the Czar intends to intrust the administration of Bulgaria to the Russian Senator Stojanowski, until a Prince has been legally elected. A number of Deputies are signing a manifesto calling upon Bulgarians to arm themselves and rise against Russia.

CORRECTION.—In the poem "To an Infant," in the last number of "The Friend," the 1st word in the 5th stanza should read "Too" instead of "For"; in the 3rd line of same stanza, "did hold" should be "have held"; and in the last line of same, "old" should be "eld"; the 1st word in the 7th stanza should be "So" not "Lo."

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting-house, Germantown, on Fifth-day, Ninth Mo. 16th, 1886, LOYD BALDERS, Jr., and MARY F. ALSON.

DIED, at his residence, near Barnesville, Belmont County, Ohio, 6th of Ninth Month, GEORGE TATUM, in the 74th year of his age, a member of Stillwater Particular and Monthly Meeting. He was confined to his room somewhat more than two weeks, with typhoid fever, and was enabled to bear his illness with patience until the end. Firm in his attachment to the doctrines and testimonies of the Society of which he was a member, he was concerned to walk consistently therewith, in humility and watchfulness of spirit. He was diligent in the attendance of all our religious meetings, and enjoyed the daily perusal of the Holy Scriptures. Although he expressed but little, yet it is believed the work of preparation, kept pace with the day, and the peaceful quiet felt at his bed-side seemed a forestate of the rest prepared for the righteous.

—, on the morning of the 26th of Tenth Month, 1886, of paralysis of the brain, JOHN PENNINGTON, a beloved member of West Grove Preparative and New Garden Monthly Meeting, Pa., in the 75th year of his age. Though the summons was sudden that called this loving Friend from the enjoyment of a good degree of health to the realities of eternity; yet it was an event which, we believe, he was for a considerable time past increasingly concerned to be prepared for; often speaking during the past year or more of his life, as feeling that his time here might not be long. His daily walk amongst us evinced his having, through Divine love and mercy, attained to that state in which he was enabled to fulfil the injunction of the Apostle, "Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil-speaking be put away from you, with all malice. And be ye kind one to another, tender hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you." We humbly believe, that through receding love, our dear friend has been gathered from the enjoyment of his family and friends to the enjoyment of the heritage of the "just made perfect."

Twelfth Mo. 20th, 1840. Tears seemed to give some relief this morning; forgiveness and acceptance were asked for. Dear Sarah Emlen again engaged in testimony; representing that the piety of a child is sweet; and it does rise up before the Lord as a sweet incense. What an interesting company would we be were each child found endeavoring, particularly when thus met, to be found waiting upon the Lord! O what a little army would be raised up! and remember, dear children, that "those that love Him, he will love, but those who despise Him, he will lightly esteem." She hoped there was not one now present, who were despising their dear Lord. On the contrary, she had been comforted in believing there were those who were sincerely desirous more and more to become members of his church; for He hath even on earth a church; He hath called it by the endearing appellation of "sister," and yet more endearing, a "spouse." As we become more and more members of it, the Lord will cause the north and south wind to blow upon us, and sweet spices will flow out. What are these spices, dear children? why they are love to your Heavenly Father. The more you become members of his militant church the greater will your love be to Him; and you will fear to be found offending Him. She believed there were dear children, who could set their little seals to what she had been saying, and as these kept faithful they would indeed be made members of his militant church, and when done with time here would join the church triumphant in Heaven. In the evening I indulged in too much conversation, which lessened my strength.

First Mo. 16th, 1841. Dear Sarah Emlen was engaged in testimony. She arose with saying, "How very awful would it be should any of us in an unprepared state, hear sounded in our spiritual ears, 'this night thy soul shall be required of thee;' when, whether prepared or unprepared, we must go to stand naked and bare before Him who will judge us according to our deeds! How dangerous was it to be trifling with Divine visitations day after day! From feelings which had attended her mind, she feared there was present an individual or individuals, who were hiding as it were their talent in a napkin; not feeling as they ought the necessity of improving it; and how much depends upon it! Remember, my brother or sister, it is as needful that thou should improve the one as the five. How often were we shown the dangerous consequence of delays herein! She pleaded to let the past suffice; and begin from that very hour to serve our Heavenly Father with the whole heart, accompanied with living faith: for without faith it is impossible to please God. She referred to the language of the Saviour to Thomas: "Be not faithless, but believing;" adding, "Blessed are they which have not seen and yet have believed." She said it were already the eleventh hour with some of us; but if we would only be faithful, acceptance would yet be found.

29th. Felt comforted in my morning reading; a season of quietness followed. My heart was poured out as water.

30th. Comforted in receiving one of mother's good letters. What a favor to have such a mother.

Second Mo. 6th. Several days have passed since last note. Renewed desires have attended this morning to be strengthened more firmly to maintain the watch against every wrong thing; in a particular manner against a light trifling disposition and conversation. Often have I to experience, that the "end of mirth is heaviness," and "even in laughter the heart is sorrowful."

14th. Feel inability to lay hold of any thing that's good. Not till near the close of our afternoon meeting was any relief obtained. Christopher Healy had considerable to say in our morning meeting. His concern seemed to be for the children; commencing with: "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift." He set before us, in a very plain manner, what this gift of God was. Pressed upon us the necessity of receiving and obeying it if ever we expect to become the saved of God, &c. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that we through Him might be saved;" and there is no other name given whereby we can be saved; pleading with the dear children to give heed to this inward monitor, this "inspeaking word," which reproved them when they did wrong, &c. This being nothing less than the Spirit of your Heavenly Father pleading with you, and as ye attend to it it will be a leader and a teacher to you. In our afternoon meeting he set before them the excellency of silent waiting upon the Lord: remarked what a strength in our meetings, was even the countenance of a good child to the rightly exercised. It was one of his greatest comforts to see the children coming up in the Truth, and said, the Lord would care for and strengthen such as these to walk aright before Him; and when thus met together they would feel his comfortable presence to be near. He set before them the account of Samuel, how the Lord called him when but a child; his reply, when instructed, being, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." Think I never heard a communication more adapted to the capacities of children. We also had our dear friend Thomas Kite, who was lively in testimony from, "Blessed are those that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." The circumstance of the poor widow was also set before us; how closely her faith was proved when called upon to bake a cake for the servant of the Lord, when she had but a handful of meal in the barrel, and a little oil in a cruse; yet through her obedience, it wasted not, &c. At the close of our evening collection, our dear friend T. K. appeared in supplication. The feelings attending, also preceding and following it, were to me, very solemn. What an unspeakable favor to be thus interceded for, when we have hardly ability to raise one secret aspiration for ourselves! After the children retired we had a reading below stairs for the servants, the superintendents and teachers being present. Which Thomas attended, and again was led to minister, and in a very close manner. He said, since we had been sitting together, the dying expressions of a devoted servant of our dear Lord had been brought to his remembrance, and he believed it right to revive it amongst us: "The soul is an awful thing; I feel it so. You that hear me, mind, it is an awful thing to die; the invisible world, how awful!" If this was the experience of one who had devotedly followed his dear Master, what would be the feeling of those who have been living in forgetfulness of Him who gave them a being? How strikingly do we see here exemplified this Scripture declaration: "If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?" What, my dear friends, will it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? or what can a man give in exchange for his soul? He was deeply exercised for some amongst us, who had been visited season after season; had had line upon line, precept upon precept, and still there was no advancement. Said, if there was not an improvement he feared the day was hastening in which the hand-writing on the wall would appear against them, "Thou art weighed in the balance, and art found wanting." A word of encouragement also went forth to the "trembling believer." It was a remarkable communication throughout.

21st. First-day morning. On retiring to bed last night, sincere desires arose that I might be found walking more carefully. Though I cannot see that I have offended during the two days just past, yet believe more deep inward retirement would more advance a growth in grace. Evening: a day of renewed favor. What shall I render unto Thee, O Lord, for all thy benefits! has been the language of my heart this evening. To have a little evidence given that we are not forsaken, how it comforts and consoles. May I be kept humble, low, and watchful; that the good presence of my dear Master may go with me day by day. Dear Sarah Emlen was engaged in testimony in our morning meeting. Her concern seemed to be for the children; but we all could be instructed. She spoke of the young man that came to our dear Lord enquiring, What good thing should he do to inherit eternal life? when shown the terms he turned away sorrowful. She desired this might not be the situation of any of the dear children, and warned of the consequence of making reserves, or of loving any thing more than the Creator—the gift more than the Giver. His Spirit will not always plead with us. By and by, if we persist in following our own way and devices, we shall be left to ourselves; a sense of his goodness will be withdrawn; and it is possible for us to arrive at such a state as not even to feel condemnation when we do wrong. She encouraged all to yield unreservedly to the Divine will. The day closed comfortably.

26th. A new year of my life entered upon! may there be a doubling of diligence; that so a growth in grace may be experienced.

28th. Our meeting this morning was held in silence; and was a season ever to be remembered. I was broken as it were all to pieces. Our afternoon meeting, also precious. The evening spent in much quietness. Peace followed. When there is a peaceful mind, what a different aspect does every thing wear!

Third Mo. 4th. Though cast down this morning, was greatly comforted in our silent meeting. A door of access was opened; so that my heart was poured out as water before the Lord. More "wisdom and understanding" were asked for, and that my spiritual eye might be anointed to see more clearly the way my Heavenly Father would have me to go; so that the great work of sanctification may be perfected.

10th. O, for more of that wisdom which is profitable to direct! felt the need of it when engaged with other of the teachers in speaking to the children in regard to their conduct not having been what it ought.

15th. Got through yesterday satisfactorily, and enjoyed a comfortable night's rest. Arose with, I think I may say, sincere desires to improve this day aright. Had a quiet time in reading previous to meeting, which seemed to prepare the way for a good one.

16th. "Every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give an account thereof in the day of judgment." Fear I indulged last evening in too much conversation.

18th. Instructed by a remark in dear mother's letter yesterday, viz: "Be cheerful and solid, not sad and unhappy." Innocent cheerfulness is wanted.

19th. A day of favor. A good meeting; wherein sincere desires were raised that the good hand may not spare, nor his eye pity, till all is consumed that stands in the way to happiness! Much, I am sensible, remains to be done away.

25th. O for a more earnest hungering after that bread which can alone nourish up unto eternal life! Meeting day. May I settle down into quietness, craving best help to enable me to draw near unto my Heavenly Father. Near the close of our meeting, help from the sanctuary came, causing great brokenness of spirit, and the creature to be laid very low. May every weight be laid aside, and the sin which doth so easily beset.

Egg Harbor City.

Mary Treat, in her lively sketches entitled, "Home Studies in Nature," says: "Southern New Jersey has ever had an irresistible fascination to the botanist, unequalled by any other section in the Union. Picturesque New England, with her charming flowers cannot equal it; nor the great plains of the West. And even Florida—the land of flowers—must yield the palm to the pines of New Jersey." Among the plants found in this sandy and comparatively barren region, are some of the rarest of American species, and therefore the most highly prized by the student and collector. It was no cause for wonder, therefore, that some of the members of a botanical club should have come from the City of Baltimore and the mountains of southern Pennsylvania, to visit a district so often mentioned in their botanical works as the home of species described therein.

Egg Harbor City was the point selected for their explorations, and on the 7th of Seventh Month, I left my home to point out to them some of the minute yet peculiar and attractive forms of vegetable life, which are found there, and which might probably escape the notice of strangers. The grass and grain were ready for gathering, and the farmers by the way were at work harvesting the produce of their fields. This brought to remembrance the remarks made by a Friend at Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting, held at Evesham on Sixth Mo. 13th, eight years before. He said, as he rode to the place of gathering in the morning, he observed the care with which the land had been tilled, and the promise of an abundant harvest; and he had felt no doubt that the fruits of the earth would be gathered and cared for by the inhabitants. But his thoughts had also been turned to a harvest of another kind, to the men and women whose souls were to be gathered into the heavenly garner; and his heart had been lifted up in petition, that the Lord would send forth more laborers into this harvest. He believed that those who became faithful followers of the Lord, would find a measure of labor for others required of them.

It was an interesting incident, and illustrates the manner in which passing events and objects often suggest instructive reflections to the thoughtful mind.

On reaching Egg Harbor City, I found the strangers among the bushes, eagerly gathering the plants that were new to them, of which they found many kinds. Among the plants collected here, the following are enumerated for the benefit of the botanical reader (the list may be skipped over by any who choose). The rarest of all was the diminutive fern, Schizaea pusilla. Other plants were Aselepias obtusifolia, A. rubra, A. tuberosa, Gratiola aurea, Proserpinaca pectinata, Eriocaulon ———, Polygala lutea, and P. cruciata, Rhæcia virginica, Aletris farinosa, Drosera filiformis, D. longifolia, and D. rotundifolia, Schwalbea Americana, Calopogon pulchellus, Pogonia ophioglossoides, Lobelia Nuttallii, Sabbatia lanceolata, Gaultheria proembens, Sarracenia purpurea, Acyrum stans, Vaccinium macrocarpon, Ceratophyllum demersum, and Utricularia inflata. This is only a selection from the full list.

Like true botanists, the visitors were careful not to despoil the localities by plucking more than they needed for specimens.

All of the species of Drosera, popularly called Sundew, are thickly studded with red, translucent, glandular hairs, which secrete a very sticky liquid. When a gnat or small insect alights on one of their leaves, it is at once made a prisoner by this secretion, and the adjacent hairs gradually bend themselves down upon its body, and digest the soft parts; so that these plants are to some extent carnivorous. So sticky is the fluid which the glands secrete, that on touching a leaf bathed in dew, glutinous threads of an inch or more in length, followed my fingers as they withdrew.

The most interesting of all the plants to me, was the Bladderwort, Utricularia inflata, many of which were blooming in a pond by the side of the railroad. The long pale-green stems, as slender as threads, were floating in the still water. They were subdivided into numerous fine branches or hair-like leaves, which were thickly studded with minute bladders or air-floats which keep them from sinking. The bright yellow flowers, fully half an inch in diameter, were lifted two or three inches into the air. To maintain them in that position, the plant had developed, at the point where the stem emerged from the water, four or five rather bulky cylindrical leaves or branches, mainly composed of a mass of air-cells. These radiate from the stem, and lie as floats on the surface of the water, and by their buoyancy support the aerial stem and flowers, which are thus enabled to perfect their seed.

A similar provision of an all-wise Creator, I had before observed in the swamps of North Carolina, in the case of the Water Violet or Featherfoil (Hottonia inflata), which has a widely radiating circle of leaves that rest on the surface of the water and support the flower-stem.

I crowded several of the Bladderworts into a wide-mouthed vial, with some of the water of the pond. On my return home these were transferred to suitable vessels of water, where they seemed quite at home, and proceeded to develop their buds and flowers; and have proved objects of much interest.

On placing a small branch of the Bladderwort under the microscope, the very delicate cellular tissue which formed the little floats was distinctly and beautifully brought to view; and when one of them was pressed with the point of a fine needle and thus ruptured, a tiny bubble of air was seen to escape through the surrounding fluid. The animalcule which abound in summer time in stagnant waters, enlivened the drops of water that adhered to the plant. Most of them were little oval, oblong creatures, incessantly darting about in their miniature pond, and often suddenly rebounding like an elastic ball when it strikes a hard surface. Others spun round like a top, varying this exercise by occasionally shooting off out of sight. Another was considerably larger and furnished with a spiky tail and another was long and slender like an eel. Almost constant motion seemed to belong to them all.

Spiritual Blindness.

Paul says, "Blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in." And as the Gentiles, or disbelieving part of the world have not yet come in to the fullness of the gospel day, it is equally true that blindness in part still rests on some who profess to be of the Israel of God. All are not Israelites who are of Israel, or who belong to the outward church, or have a nominal right in it. "But he is a Jew which is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter, whose praise is not of men, but of God."

It was said of Israel formerly, "The heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed; lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their hearts, and should be converted and I should heal them." So it appears that they voluntarily closed their eyes against the gospel light, because they loved darkness rather than light, as their deeds were evil. So "the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and they will hear it." And as the blessings of the gospel are embraced, and fully received, all the true Israel of God will be saved.

Paul was sent to the Gentiles, "to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God; that they might receive forgiveness of sins, and an inheritance among them that are sanctified, by faith in Him." And for this same purpose all truly anointed ministers of Christ are sent forth, that they might be instrumental, through Him, in opening the blind eyes, and in turning the people from spiritual darkness unto the marvellous light of the gospel, which is the power of God unto the salvation of all who have their eyes opened enough to receive it.

This opening of the spiritual eye is only done through the power of the same Christ that opened the eyes of the outwardly blind while He was personally on earth. If the opening is only partly done, we are liable to look upon men as trees walking; or as something great, instead of looking to the greatness of the power that opened our eyes, but that suffers not even a sparrow to fall to the ground without his notice.

I have for a long time had a fear that a great portion of the professors of Christianity are stumbling along through life too much in darkness; not having much of the light of the knowledge of the glory of God to enlighten their pathway to the heavenly kingdom. And this, mainly because their faith stands more in the wisdom of men than in the power of God; therefore they have the light of the earth, more than the light of heaven to guide them; and no wonder if they should miss of the joys of God's salvation, both here and hereafter; because the things which belong to their peace are hid from their eyes. "But (as saith the apostle) if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost; in whom the God of this world hath blinded the minds of them that believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them." So they content themselves with a natural light; and, as their spiritual eyes have become darkened through disbelief in the true and universal light, they stop short of the joys of God's full salvation. And all because they lack a practical belief in Christ, "the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world," and prefer the light of nature to the light of grace. But Christ says, "ye believe in God, believe also in me."

It is the god of this world that blinds the eyes and the minds of the unbelievers; and not the God of heaven. For God is light, and He is called the Father of lights, and in Him is no darkness at all. Yet He suffers our hearts to be darkened, because we prefer it, and choose it as a cloak to hide our evil deeds under. While we have the light, we must believe in the light, or we shall never become the children of light. For if we disbelieve in the light, and turn from it, the light that is in us will become darkness, and the darkness will be very great; so that we cannot tell good from evil, nor discern between the voice of the true Shepherd and the voice of the stranger.

This spiritual blindness is nothing new. Our first parents closed their eyes against good, and opened them to evil, so a mixed condition of good and evil, of blindness and sight, of darkness and light, of death and life then entered the world, and is still in it to try us. And the power of choice between good and evil, and between light and darkness, is given to us. If we prefer to keep our eyes closed against the good, and remain in darkness and blindness, we can do so; and thus strengthen the bonds of iniquity upon us. But the fault, if we are lost, will be our own; because the way for our escape from the evil, and from the wrath to come, is plainly set before us. And glorious rewards are promised and awaiting those who prefer the light which leads out of the evil, and enables us to overcome it. For light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart. And they have the glorious privilege of reaping the fruits of their labor. So be of good cheer, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not. "And at evening time there shall be light."

What ailed Pharaoh in his opposition to Israel, but spiritual blindness? He could not see that he was working his own overthrow, and the exaltation of Israel. But the more they were oppressed the more they prospered. Is there not something of the same blindness and hardness of heart now against such as are laboring to come out of Egypt, and to bring others out from the bondage of spiritual wickedness in high places? But Israel, after a long wilderness journey, finally came out victorious, and gained the promised land; while the opposing hosts were overwhelmed in the Red Sea. So let the tribulated remnant take courage, for the Lamb and his followers shall have the victory.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 106.

EXERCISE OF MINISTRY—INDUSTRY.

It has often happened that religiously-minded men, even among those who do not fully hold the views of the Society of Friends as to the necessity of experiencing the immediate guidance of the Holy Spirit in the exercise of the ministry of the Gospel, have been sensible on especial occasions of its extension leading them into a line of service quite different from that for which they had prepared, and in which they had expected to labor.

In the life of Dr. Leifchild it is related, that when he arose from sleep one First-day morning, he could not recollect any portion of the discourse which he had prepared the day before, nor even the text on which it was founded. He says: "I was perplexed and walked before breakfast in Kensington Gardens, and there a particular text occurred to my mind, and my thoughts seemed to dwell so much upon it, that I resolved to preach from it, without further attempting to remember what I had prepared, a thing which I had never attempted to do in all my ministry. From this text I preached, and it was, 'Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.' I preached with great liberty, and in the course of the sermon I quoted the following lines:

"Beware of desperate steps: the darkest day—
Live but to-morrow, will have passed away."

I afterwards learned that a man in despair, had that very morning gone to the Serpentine to drown himself in it. Some passengers, however, disturbed him on the brink, and he returned to Kensington, intending to drown himself in the dusk of the evening. On passing the chapel, he saw a number of people crowding into it, and thought he would join them in order to pass away the time. His attention was riveted to the sermon which seemed to be in part composed for him, and when he heard me quote the lines alluded to, he resolved to abandon his suicidal intentions."

The following incident has reached me through two separate channels. It illustrates the peculiar manner in which the ministers of the Lord are sometimes led in the performance of their duty; and also the weakness of the instrument when passing through those humbling seasons which often seem needful to prepare for service.

Many years ago James Simpson visited Goshen Meeting, in Chester County, Pennsylvania. He arrived at the house of a Friend named Eldridge, in the evening before. In the morning James did not make an appearance. When the Friend went to his room, he found him much discouraged (as was frequently the case with James Simpson) so that he thought he was too unwell to get up and eat his breakfast. After much persuasion his host succeeded in getting him down stairs, telling him it would soon be time to start for meeting. James replied that it was not worth while to talk of that, as he could not go to the meeting. The Friend said, he must go, for the people had been invited to be present, and it would not do to disappoint them. On arriving at the house they found a large congregation gathered. After taking his seat James' head soon dropped low, a position he was apt to assume when under much exercise of mind. At length he raised it, and startled the people by calling out in a loud voice, "How is butter going, and what is the price of eggs to-day?" From this he enlarged, saying he feared some of them were more engaged in thinking of these things, and of their worldly concerns than of the things which pertain to their eternal welfare; and spoke powerfully of the danger of being too much taken up with temporal business.

The person who described the scene said, that by the time the discourse was ended he did not believe there was a dry eye in the house.

The people in the neighborhood were at that time much in the way of attending markets in Philadelphia, with the produce of their farms; and the questions so startlingly uttered in their hearing by James Simpson, would naturally be very frequently in their minds and on their lips.

True religion not only preserves the mind from being swallowed up in outward cares, but it also leads to industry and a proper attention to the ordinary duties of life.

In the Memorial respecting that zealous minister of the gospel, Daniel Stanton, issued by the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, it is said: "He was very exemplary in his industry and diligence, in laboring faithfully at his trade, to provide for his own support, and, after he married and had children, for their maintenance; and was often concerned to advise others to the same necessary care; yet he continued fervent in spirit for the promotion of truth and righteousness."

Daniel himself says: "I wrought hard at my outward calling when at home, yet not so much confined but that I kept close to religious meetings; in which the good presence of Christ, our dear Lord, would many times overshadow them, and I have had to sit under the shadow thereof with great delight; and after such precious meetings with his people, I found my mind better qualified to attend to my necessary business and the affairs of life."

In another place, after describing a religious visit to New England, he adds: "After I came home I kept close to meetings, and faithfully labored in that ability God giveth, being much concerned for the prosperity of his glorious work amongst us; my outward endeavors were also blessed, as I kept to industry, and I always found it best to be diligent and not slothful in business, yet fervent in spirit, serving the Lord." At another time, when travelling in the Southern States, he mentions being at a meeting at Dann's Creek, of which he remarks, it "was a laborious time, and I wish it may have a good effect on the minds of the people, for I trust they were faithfully warned both on account of their slothfulness in the things of God, and the things of this world."

This hint of the nature of his concern for the people of Dann's Creek brings to mind the remark made by John Parker, of Chester County, Pa., after his return from a religious visit in a section of country where the people manifested too much slothfulness. The substance of it was, that usually he had felt a concern to labor with his hearers to bring them out of the earth, but on this visit he had been concerned to exhort them to enter into it.

In his diligence in business, Daniel Stanton followed the example of the great Apostle Paul, who, by the labor of his hands, ministered to his own necessities, and to those of his companions. The habit of industry is good for all, and it is especially valuable to those who are called to the work of the ministry. The restraints of outward business, when not carried to excess, tend to steady a man's course, and prevent him from falling in with every suggestion of the imagination as to religious service. I remember hearing one, who had had much experience in the work of the ministry, say, that some of his precious seasons of divine communion and of pointings to religious labor had been dispensed while he was following the plough.

Many of those who have been eminent as ministers in our religious Society have been laborious in both spiritual and temporal things. Among these was John Banks, one of the early Gospel laborers in the north of England. In his Journal, he says:—"In my native county in Cumberland, and also in many places elsewhere, it is well known to Friends, with what diligence I labored among them in the work of the Gospel, early and late, far and near, through much hardship to my body, in heat and cold; and yet, through the strength and ability given me of God, I was preserved in, and through all, having faith therein. And with all diligence, when I was at home, I labored with my hands, with honest endeavors and lawful employments, for the maintenance of my family."

In another place, he says:—"In temporal things as well as spiritual, diligence must be used, with a Godly care and honest endeavors, with what labor and pains the body is able to answer; which always was my concern when at home; but still in and through all to have a true regard to God in our hearts; this is the way to bring a blessing and increase upon all our endeavors."

To the same purport is a letter of counsel to his wife, in which he thus advises:—"The Lord be with thee and thine, and comfort and refresh thy soul in the assemblies of His people; with whom meet as often as thou can'st, First-day and week-day, with the rest of the family, for thou knowest it was always my care when present; wherefore, I did rise early and sit up late, and worked and labored with all diligence, that the same might be effected according to the desire of my heart; and that through diligence in lawful business, with the blessing of the Lord, I might also provide for and maintain thee with the children in decent and comely order, according to truth and my ability."

The union of fervency of spirit with industry in business, indicated in some of the preceding passages, is shown in the memoranda of John Simpson, a brother of James, and like him, a minister of the Gospel, some account of whom was published in "The Friend" a few years since. He says:—"Let us often retire into silent meditation, even when our hands are engaged in labor; this has been an unspeakable comfort to me, when I saw no other way to do justly, than to work harder than some might think right, rising early and lying down late. But the Lord was my portion to whom I could appeal. "Thou knowest I wish to do right;" and though my slips were many, yet He who seeth not as man, often replenished my heart with a measure of His heavenly grace; and to this day, I am made thankful that I have been industrious."

In one of John Simpson's letters, this passage occurs:—"These long wilderness journeys have been trying in younger life, and in all probability will be more so when advanced in years. Yet this is trifling in comparison with life eternal and the good of souls, for which I have for the most part of thirty years labored diligently, during which time my own hands have ministered to my necessities, working day and night rather than to make the gospel chargeable; and the Lord has blessed me in basket and in store."

REST!

"Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place, and rest a while."

This, this is rest, Lord Jesus,
Alone with Thee to be;
The desert is a gladsome place
With Thy blest company.
Ah, sweet to hear Thy tender voice,
Bidding me "come apart,"
Alluring me to its retreat
And "speaking to my heart."

This, this is rest, Lord Jesus,
Alone with Thee to be;
And when I sigh for fellowship
To find it all in Thee.
Thy saints on earth, how dear they are,
Their love how passing sweet,
Yet would I leave them all to sit Alone at Thy dear feet.

Such precious rest, Lord Jesus,
Alone with Thee to be,
Thy secret words of love to hear,
Thy looks of love to see;
To feel my hand tight clasped in Thine,
To know Thee always near,
A happy child alone with Thee,
My heart can nothing fear.

This, this is rest, Lord Jesus,
Alone with Thee to be;
The desert is a happy spot
With Thy blest company.
Amid the throng I might forget
That I am all Thine own,
I bless Thee for the "desert place,"
With Thee, dear Lord, alone.

SUNLIGHT ALL THE WAY.

"Good-by, Jennie; the road is long,
And the moor is hard to cross;
But well you know there is danger
In the hogs, and the marshy moss.
So keep in the footpath, Jennie,
Let nothing tempt you to stray,
Then you'll get safely over it,
For there's sunlight all the way."

The child went off with a blessing
And a kiss of mother-love;
The daisies were down at her feet,
And the lark was singing above.
On, on the narrow footpath—
Nothing could tempt her to stray;
So the moor was passed at nightfall,
And she'd sunlight all the way,

And I, who followed the maiden,
Kept thinking, as I went,
Over the perilous moor of life,
What unwary feet are bent.
If they only could keep in the footpath,
And not in the marshes stray,
Then they would reach the end of life
Ere the night could shroud the day.

DWELLERS IN TENTS.

BY R. S. P.

A little while on earth we roam
In these frail houses which are not our home;
Journeying toward a refuge that is sure,—
A rest secure.

Only a little while,
We dread the frown of life, and count its smile,
A dwelling then we have, not made with hands;
In other lands.

Therefore, we need not mourn
That sudden clouds across our skies are borne,
That winter chills us, and the storms make rents
In our frail tents.

Therefore, we need not fear,
Though moth and rust corrupt our treasures here;
Though midnight thieves break in with silent stealth
To seize our wealth.

For in our Father's house,
A mansion fair he has prepared for us;
And only till His voice shall call us hence
We dwell in tents.

A DAY IN MID-SUMMER.

A Sabbath stillness hovering over all,—
The sleepy quiet of the sun-browned hills,—
The soothing lullaby of lazy rills,
In resinous woods, where length'ning shadows fall.

The dreamy calm of summer lake and sky,—
The billowy swarths of scented clover bloom.—
Distilling in the sunshine sweet perfume,
As willing in the blaze of noon they lie.

The cow-bell's drowsy tinkle, faint, afar—
The hum of insects in the hazy air,—
The swallows homeward flying here and there,
The lowing herd beside the pasture bar.

The languor of a long mid-summer day.—
What thoughts arise that never here find speech!
And soon the day has drifted from our reach—
Ah! peace too deep—too tranquil long to stay.

God's Guidance.—A captain's wife once told a little story from which a very important lesson may be drawn, to show how God can guide us safely through dangers if we put our whole trust in Him.

"We were on shipboard," said she, lying in a Southern harbor, and we were obliged, first, to make our way ashore. The waves were rolling heavily. I became frightened at the thought of attempting it, when one came to me, saying, 'Do not be afraid: I will take care of you.' He bore a peculiar shaped dark-lantern, only a single ray of light being emitted from a small, circular aperture. 'Now,' he said, 'take my hand; hold fast, do not fear. Do not look about you, or on either side of you, only on the little spot lighted by my lantern, and place your footsteps firmly right there.' I heard the rushing of the waters, and was still conscious of fear; but by looking steadily only where the light fell, and planting my footsteps just there, not turning either to the right or the left, clasping firmly the strong hand, the danger was overcome and the shore reached in safety. The next day, my kind guide said, 'Would you like to see the way by which you came last night?' Then he showed me where our vessel had been lying, and the very narrow plank (just a single one) by which we had reached the shore. He knew that, had I turned either to the right or to the left, I should in all probability have lost my balance, and gone over into those dark waters; but by 'holding fast,' and treading just where the light fell, all danger would be averted."

Is not this a beautiful comparison of the way in which Christ leads His children? He also commands them to come to Him, to doubt not nor be afraid to trust to His guidance. Then he tells us "to walk in the light" of His blessed teachings, "turning neither to the right nor to the left" and follow Him where He leads us. By doing as He bids us and "holding fast" to His almighty arm, we too are led safely over the dark, troubled waters of life and will at last be landed safely on that shore where no more sorrow, distress or affliction can mar our happiness.

For "The Friend."

What Makes the Friend.

A conversation with a fellow-traveller on the pilgrimage journey of life, seeking alike to know and to do the right, has led me to open the following, in answer to the query, "What makes the Friend?"

In the writings of many of the early Friends, we find it recorded of first one and then another, he or she, as the case might be, became convinced of the blessed Truth. The right understanding of what is implied by this expression, will, I believe, answer the query, "What makes the Friend?"

To become convinced of the Truth, is indeed blessed, for it is the mind awakened to the knowledge of a power in man but not of him, all-sufficient to redeem and save him, which as hearkened unto, obeyed and followed, will not only bring peace to the mind, but also as a consequence a flowing from obedience, salvation and deliverance. For Christ becomes the leader, by His holy light in the soul, discovering the darkness of our own nature unto us, and leading thereout.

Vanity and pride have their root or seed in the heart and mind of man; and where these dwell, there Christ cannot abide. Therefore, the axe is laid at the root of the corrupt tree, and if the root be destroyed, the fruit of the corrupt nature cannot be brought forth. Therefore, to be awakened to the knowledge of a power all-sufficient to make man sensible of his true condition is in itself an unspeakable blessing; but to know an advance in the way of redemption from the power of our evil nature by this, the manifested power of God, is a still more blessed experience, and is that by which the true Friend is made and distinguished from the nominal professor, bear he what name he may.

This is the pathway, but not the end of the journey; for, with an increased sight and sense, there comes a quickened sensibility in knowledge of the things of God. Truth speaking and honest dealing are the necessary outcome of purity in heart. The pure in heart must be clean in lip. The lowly in heart will not seek, but shun the badges of pride and vanity in life and in attire.

The true Friend is a whole man, he serves not his Lord by halves. He recognizes the truth of the language of Holy Scripture in practice, "Ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price, therefore glorify God in your bodies and in your spirits, which are His."

Bound, yet free, for he is the Lord's free man. It is a freedom by subjection. "Thy will, not mine, be done," is the language in heart and in life of that soul who seeks conformity to the mind Divine; and to seek conformity to the Mind Divine is to know in measure the Divine in life revealed in and to the human soul, in order to draw it out of its own selfish nature and ways, and to know a pure and holy mind in measure brought forth to the glory of the great and good Giver of every good and perfect gift. To be a true Friend is no light matter, for nothing short of Divine power can make the Friend. To be obedient, therefore, unto this Heavenly visitant, is absolutely necessary, if we would come into the nature and condition of those to whom the language applies, "All thy children shall be taught of God, and great shall be the peace of thy children." In short, to be a true Friend is to be a child of God.

Sonship denotes fatherhood, fatherhood be speaks reverence, obedience, subjection—in short, love. And love fulfils all. For God is love, and he who dwells in love dwells in God, and God dwells in him.

O, how can the Christian fight, swear, or follow the vanities and follies of earth! For, if he be not redeemed from these, he is not a new creature, he is not in Christ, knows not Christ dwelling in him. Ah, the matter may be brought down to very close limits; and it behooves us to see, each one for himself and herself, the true test, which the Lord is willing to apply to each heart, if on our part there is but the willingness to be so tried and proved by Him, so as to know for ourselves the verity of His own language, "My sheep hear my voice, and they follow me, and a stranger will they not follow, for they know not the voice of strangers."

Such as these are Christ's friends; therefore, obedience to Christ makes the true Friend.

May it be ours, therefore, each one to know that which does make known the way of life; and, having been brought thus far, to experience His power to keep us in life; and to be willing to travel on to know the fulfilling of the fulness of God's gracious purpose, in the redemption of man—the restoration of the soul to innocency and purity.

Such is the prayer of him who subscribes this for himself, and for the Israel of God, the world over.

CHARLES W. THOMSON.

West Phila., Eleventh Month 5th, 1886.

It is well for us that the rugged path of duty is so hemmed in by personal and social restrictions, and that the cross-cut passages from that path to the path of forbidden pleasures are so swept by flank firing continually, that it often requires a larger measure of immediate courage to go astray than to keep on in the course of virtuous action. It is well that we are watched as we are by our fellows, and that we know that we should instantly be the losers, in our reputation and in our social standing, were we recognized as having departed in the least from the strictest measure of uprightness which has hitherto been counted as ours. It is well that even though we dared to brave all this for ourselves, we are still confronted by the added danger of involving our dear ones in our ruin; and so again we are held to the right by our linkings with those who are worthier than ourselves. Ay, and it is well that even when we are ready to take a step towards our own ruin, in spite of all its possible results of harm to those to whom we are bound by the dearest ties, God himself, in love, puts hindrances in our way and forcibly restrains us from the evil which we have purposed.—S. A Good Man's Tenderness.—George Stephenson went one day into an upper room of his house, and closed the window. It had been left open a long time, because of the great heat; but now the weather was becoming cooler, and so George Stephenson thought it would be well to shut it. He little knew at the time what he was doing. Two or three days afterward, however, he chanced to observe a bird flying against that same window, and beating against it with all its might, again and again, as if trying to break it. His sympathy and curiosity were aroused. What could the little thing want? He at once went to the room, and opened the window to see. The window opened, the bird flew straight to one particular spot in the room, where Stephenson saw a nest,—that little bird's nest. The poor bird looked at it, took the story in at a glance, and fluttered down to the floor, broken-hearted, almost dead.

Stephenson, drawing near to look, was filled with unspeakable sorrow. There sat the mother bird, and under it four tiny, little young ones,—mother and young all apparently dead. Stephenson cried aloud. He tenderly lifted the exhausted bird from the floor, the worm it had so long and bravely struggled to bring to its home and young still in its beak, and carefully tried to revive it; but all his efforts proved in vain. It speedily died, and the great man mourned for many a day. At that time, the force of George Stephenson's mind was changing the face of the earth; yet he wept at the sight of this dead family, and was deeply grieved because he himself had unconsciously been the cause of death.—Manchester Times.

Anecdote of Bishop Simpson.

When Bishop Simpson was President of Indiana Asbury University, he occasionally preached in the adjoining towns and villages. Upon one occasion he visited a neighborhood where a number of Methodists had settled, and was the guest of a brother named Swank. He had immigrated from Kentucky, and had brought with him the means of purchasing a fine estate, and at the time of which I write was very prominent as a citizen, a man of wealth and a church-member.

After dinner, Swank invited the bishop to walk out and look at his improvements and lands. They looked at his glossy imported cattle, at his numerous beautiful horses, and his flocks of sheep, over his wide meadows, and luxuriant fields of corn and wheat.

In the presence of these broad acres, where every clod blessed its owner, and where every creature was basking in the sunshine of the highest enjoyment of which its nature was capable, the bishop expressed the greatest pleasure.

"Bro. Swank," said he, "you ought to be one of the most grateful of men. God has filled with all good things your basket and store. Where did you obtain the means for all these improvements and purchases? Did you not tell me that you sold land in Kentucky?"

"Oh yes, all I had there I sold before I left," he replied.

"Had you negroes, Bro. Swank?"

"Oh yes," he answered. "I sold them all; I could not bring them here."

"And you sold your negroes; and some of them members of the same church with yourself, were they not?"

"Oh yes," replied Swank; "how could I do otherwise? Everybody, members of all churches sold their slaves; what else could I do with them?"

"You could have emancipated them, Bro. Swank; taken them, if necessary, to a free state, bought land for them, and paid them back something of what they earned for you. Brother Swank," said the bishop, stopping and looking most earnestly into his face, "you want to be saved, don't you?"

"Certainly I do," replied Swank, rather crustily.

"Then," said the bishop, "go and find those negroes and buy them back; for in selling them you sold Jesus Christ, your Lord; for what you did to the least of his brethren, you did to Him."

Swank made no reply, walked home in silence, did not attend the evening meeting, went not with the bishop on the Sabbath, and never entered the church again. The buried spear pierced the heart of his covetousness, and its point developed a cancer that never healed.—St. Louis Evangelist.

Face your Trouble.—"I had ploughed around a rock in one of my fields for five years," said a farmer, "and I had broken a mowing-machine knife against it, besides losing the use of the ground in which it lay, all because I thought it was such a large rock that it would take too much time and labor to remove it. But to-day, when I began to plough for corn, I thought that by and by I might break my cultivator against that rock; so I took a crow-bar, intending to poke around it and find out its size once for all. And it was one of the surprises of my life to find that it was a little more than two feet long. It was standing on its edge, and so light that I could lift it into the wagon without help."

"The first time you really faced your trouble, you conquered it," I replied aloud.—Selected.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Dr. Schmeinfurth's Botanical Explorations Among the Egyptian Tombs.—The chaplets and garlands and funeral flowers of the Egyptians, wrapped up with the bandages and hermetically sealed in their tombs, are found to be as well preserved as in the best modern herbarium, and when soaked, dried and properly pressed out, have their colors so well preserved as to shame many a herbarium of the present time. He has been able to determine fifty-nine species of plants, and though over 4,000 years have elapsed since they grew in Egyptian fields and gardens, he cannot trace the slightest departure from the forms of to-day.

Among the plants are the common red poppy of Europe, the blue larkspur, one of the common docks of the East, the present field mustard of Europe, the bur clover, or medicago, which, introduced from Europe, is to-day at once a blessing to the sheep-raiser and a curse to the wool-grower of the Californian plains, the pretty blue African water lily, or nymphaea, and the wild celery. Dates, figs, grapes and other fruits are there just the same, even to the lobings of the leaves as we have them to-day, with marks of insects on them, bothering the Egyptian gardeners as the insects bother the fruit-growers of our own time.

Ancient Herbaria.—A history of herbaria has been written by Dr. Saint-Lager, of Lyons. From this it appears that the oldest collections of pressed plants now extant, or partially so, are those of Aldrovandi, begun about 1553, and containing at least about 5,000 specimens; of Girault, of Lyons, dated 1558; and of Cesalpin, dated 1563. The collections are now in Bologna, Paris, and Florence.

Scientific Poetry.—The natural rate of respiration is from sixteen to twenty-four breaths per minute, the average being twenty; and Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes has explained the popularity of the octosyllabic verse by the fact that it follows the natural rhythm of respiration more exactly than any other. Experiments with such poetry show that an average of twenty lines will be read in a minute, so that one respiration will suffice for each line. The articulation is so easy, in fact, that it is liable to run into a sing-song. The twelve-syllable line, on the other hand,—as in Drayton's "Polyolbion"—is pronounced almost intolerable on account of its unphysiological construction. From this it follows that, while the poets disregard science in many ways with impunity, nothing in poetry is likely to win favor that is not calculated with strict reference to the respiratory functions.

A Use of Bee Stings.—At a meeting of the Physiological Society of Berlin, it was stated that when a bee has filled the cell either with pure honey or a mixture of pollen-dough and honey, and has completed the lid, a drop of formic acid obtained from the poison bag connected with the sting is added to the honey by perforating the lid with the sting. Numerous experiments show that this formic acid preserves honey and every other sugar solution from fermentation. If this be well established it will show that the sting and the poison apparatus of the bee has a further purpose than that of a defensive or offensive weapon. Another interesting fact suggests itself in connection with this. So far as is known, most of the insects that have stinging apparatus similar to that of the bee are collectors and storers of honey.—Science Gossip.

Scratching the Head.—Why some people, when they cannot remember a thing, are apt to put up their hands to their heads and scratch has long been a mystery. But as far back as 1600 Sir Henry Vaughn, who had a great deal to write on odd topics, advised a gentleman of quality, "when handsomely apparelled" and ready to meet guests to "comb his head softly and easily with an ivory comb, for nothing recreated the memorie more."

The Tallest Chimney.—The highest chimney yet built in the world has recently been completed at the Mechniechik Lead Works in Germany. The whole height of the structure is approximately 440 feet, 11 feet of which is underground. The subterranean portion is of block stone, 37 feet square in plan; all the rest is of brick. The plinth, or lower part of the chimney above ground, is 34 feet square, so that the height of the shaft is nearly thirty times the lower diameter. For about 34 feet the chimney continues square, then becomes octagonal in plan for a little distance, and finally changes to a circular form, retaining this shape to the top. The exterior diameter of the shaft at the top is about 11½ feet. The flue is 11½ feet in diameter at the bottom and 10 feet at the top. Until the completion of this chimney, that of the St. Rollix Chemical Works, near Glasgow, which is 434 feet high, was the tallest in the world.

The Horned Larks and the Sparrow-Hawk.—"During a Winter morning's walk, I heard a faint chirp, and then an answering one; then a clear, ringing twitter filled the crisp air, and a great company of horned larks came flying by and settled daintily on the broad expanse of snow before me. There were fully an hundred of them, and they ran with wonderful speed over the snow, sometimes carrying their heads well up, and then thrusting them eye-deep into the snow. I saw all about me the oblique holes they had thus made, and I judged it must have been done in picking up grass-seed that the winds had scattered, and in catching a small red spider that was abundant near the top of the snow.

"I thought that in every instance of their taking flight, I heard a clear, bell-like chirp, when every bird rose instantly, and, although much scattered at the time, they closed their ranks promptly, and moved with a wary motion, almost as a single object. I likened it to a sheet of paper carried gently along by the wind. With the same unity of purpose they alighted; no one lark touched the snow a second in advance of its fellow. But no sooner were they again on foot than they were wholly indifferent to each other, and went seed-gathering and spider-hunting, each one strictly on his own account.

"A shadow floated quickly over the sun before me, a faint, cat-like scream came from overhead, and as I turned I saw, between me and the scene, a restless, impetuous sparrow-hawk hurrying by. It perched upon a projecting stake near by. From this coign of vantage it sailed over the spot where the larks were, but no sooner was it directly above them than they moved en masse a few yards, and, settling down, they scattered again. I could scarcely follow their movements, but it was evident that they were determined not to give the hawk an opportunity to single out any one of their number. In order to accomplish this, they in one instance burrowed into the snow until quite concealed. The hawk, darting like lightning toward them, struck the low snow-bank, and being disappointed, he rose with a shrill cry of anger and disgust. As he was flying in one direction, the larks rose up as one body, and moved by me in the opposite direction at a rate of speed never attained by any sparrow-hawk. I was fairly thrilled with the suddenness and sagacity of the movement, which was all over before I fairly realized what had happened. I saw no more of the larks that day, but enjoyed the chagrin of the hawk, which vainly endeavored to determine their whereabouts. The baffled bird seemed to hold me responsible for their escape, and scolded me in no measured terms."—C. C. Abbott in Rambles About Home.

Theatrical Morality.—The Episcopal Recorder of this city, in commenting on the immoral conduct of an actress, remarks, that "the theatre is, and always has been, noted for its immorality and offences against decency; in fact, a school of vice and profligacy." After mentioning several facts to support this statement, it adds that it is better to "attack the vice of the institution itself, rather than the profligacy of any single performer; for this vehement censure of one professional tends to create a false and dangerous impression of blamelessness and purity in the profession itself.

"It is a very inadequate method which simply strikes at one of the fruits which fill the boughs of a poisonous tree, instead of laying the axe at its root."

War Prevented for Six Hundred Years by Permanent Arbitration.—Iceland was peopled by a Norwegian colony in the latter part of the Ninth Century. These colonists were some of the most independent and intelligent inhabitants of Norway, who, rather than submit to the tyrannical exactions of Harold, the reigning monarch, chose to leave their native land. Shortly after their settlement in the new country, an admirable form of republican government was established, and continued undisturbed for several centuries. At length some of the most ambitious members of the national assembly attempted to encroach on what others considered to be rights of the people. Harsh debate and contention ensued. A hostile spirit, thus awakened, led to the arming of the followers of the two parties; and then about the middle of the Thirteenth Century, for the first time since the introduction of Christianity, which occurred in the year 1000, the annals of Iceland are disgraced by the record of sedition and bloodshed. Such an exhibition alarmed the peaceful inhabitants, and ultimately produced in the assembly a resolution to vest a certain amount of power in the king of Norway, by which, in case of any such contention in future, he was constituted legal arbitrator. Certain stipulations were entered into on both sides; one of which was, that on no occasion should the king of Norway attempt to introduce an armed force into Iceland. This condition has never been violated, neither by the Norwegian

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 20, 1886.

The Overland Monthly, published at San Francisco, contains a well-written article describing the operations of the vigilance committee of that city, during the few months it assumed control of the city government, some 30 or more years ago. It gives a sad picture of the political corruption, the unblushing violation of the purity of the elections, and the consequent demoralization of the courts and officials of the city, which so stirred the feelings of the citizens as to render possible such a revolutionary proceeding as the assumption of supreme power by a body of men not recognized by the laws of the land. The moral support which the Committee received from a large portion of the people, was the result of a hopelessness on their part of effecting a reform in the administration of law and justice by the ordinary methods.

We do not by any means justify such violent measures; which, while they may relieve a present evil, yet disseminate far and wide, the seeds of future trouble, by destroying that respect for law, and that self-restraint, without which there can be no permanent and peaceful republican government. But we think the history of the San Francisco Vigilance Committee, as well as many things which have taken place in our country since that time, plainly point out the importance of such reforms in the law and its administration, and such a spread of the principles of Christianity in the minds and the hearts of the people, as may remove the causes, which lead persons "to take the law into their own hands," and to punish offenders, and redress real or imagined grievances by open violence, and without judicial investigation or authority.

It cannot be denied that it has become very difficult to convict and punish persons guilty of criminal offences, where the criminal has political influence, or ample funds at his command; that mere technicalities and quibbling objections, which do not touch the real merits of the case, are often permitted to defeat the efforts of those who are seeking that justice be administered; and that even where the judges and officers of the law act fairly and impartially, a single corrupt or prejudiced person among the jurors who try the case does sometimes render nugatory all that has been done at so much labor and expense to bring the guilty to punishment.

These evils tend to bring the law into contempt, and thus to undermine the foundations on which civil society rests. They are so many premiums and inducements to impulsive people, who do not look far beyond the present moment, to execute what they regard as justice in their own way, and on their own authority; and thus to take a retrograde step towards an uncivilized and barbarous condition.

The more we reflect on the varied problems of life, the more thoroughly we are convinced that the restraining, regulating power of the Grace of God is the only panacea for all evils—teaching men to live soberly, righteously and Godly—and that a community which is living in good measure under its Divine influence will be a happy and prosperous community.

A letter was received some weeks ago from a Friend who is often brought under exercise on account of the condition of the professing church, and of our own branch of it in particular; and who longs to see an increase in it of that vital or Danish monarchs; so that, during the six centuries which have elapsed, we are told that no military band has been raised in, or set foot in the island.—Peace Advocate.

—Lectures on Prophecy.—M. Baxter, an English writer on prophecy, has come to this country, intending to make a tour of the United States and Canada, to lecture in the principal cities on coming great Earthquakes, Wars, Revolutions, future rise and career of the great Democratic Anti-Christ, Second Advent of Christ, Resurrection and Translation of Christians, and subsequent Millennium of 1000 years. These lectures have been lately given to large audiences in Belfast, Dublin, Cork, Edinburgh, Aberdeen, London, etc. M. Baxter makes no charge for his lectures and defrays his own travelling expenses. He holds with Matthew Henry, the commentator, that the end of this age and beginning of the Millennium will probably be about the end of this century, according to Daniel's and St. John's dates.

The subjects which he proposes to discuss may suggest to thoughtful minds profitable lessons; but we regard speculations on "hidden things" as of little practical value.

—Mennonite Testimonies.—At the Annual Conference of the Missouri Mennonites, held Ninth Month, 24th, the brethren re-affirmed the "ordinance" of feet washing, as being "a visible token of the unity and humility of the members of the body of Christ, showing that there is no caste or standing one above another, in the church of Christ."

Their people were cautioned against attending places of amusement, such as the theatre, circus, etc; where the tastes of the sinful and ungodly are gratified and pleased.

The gambling indulged in and supported by agricultural fairs, the abuse of dumb brutes in racing, and the general immoral influence excited in various ways, make it obligatory, they say, "upon us to abstain from spending our time and money at the fair."

Picnics are objected to; one reason for which is the great display of worldliness and vanity in fashionable clothing, with which the children and young people are decked for such occasions.

"We feel it necessary to warn our people to stand firmly in harmony with the usages and teachings of the church, and the spirit of the gospel in opposing all secret organizations." "We should 'swear not at all,' according to the teachings of Christ."

"Our members should be cautioned against the excessive adornment of their houses, and luxuriousness of their tables; it is sad to see these excesses among many who wear modest apparel. The above is an expression of the views of this conference, and we feel resolved by the help of God, to contend for plainness of apparel and non-conformity to the world, and to oppose the following of its ever-changing fashions."

—Presbyterians on Temperance.—The Dayton (Ohio) Presbytery adopted a resolution as follows: "That it is the sense of this Presbytery that the General Assembly of Ohio, at its next session, ought to submit to the people an amendment to the constitution prohibiting the manufacture and sale of all intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage, and that the question should be submitted pure and simple (by itself), without being complicated with any other question."

After Eight Days.—It need scarcely be said that this, in Oriental parlance, was an exact week. The form of expression is commonly laid to the charge of a loose way of reckoning, and it is so partly. But in reading the Oriental calendars and astronomical rules, one sees also another reason. The first day of the week is "one day" or "day [number] one." Now, one week from this time would be "eight days" or "day [number] eight." It was custom that made the phrase stand for an exact week, or a real interval of seven days.

If any man love the world the love of the Father is not in him.

religion which is shown by a faithful bearing of the yoke of Christ, and walking in daily communion with the Father of Spirits. In it he refers to the mournful language of Jeremiah, in his 14th chapter, concerning the death in the land of Israel, when there was no rain and "the plowmen were ashamed, they covered their heads."

In a spiritual sense, when the Lord withhold His rain,—the enlivening influence of His grace, the effectual visitations of His Holy Spirit—the labors of the ministers of the gospel, who may be regarded as "plowmen" in the spiritual field, are of little avail. Labor as earnestly as they may, at such seasons, they are often ready to cover their heads with shame and sorrow, because they see little or no fruit from their labors.

There is a peculiar temptation at such times to search for expedients and remedies, and attempt to bring about a better state of things by artificial processes; not duly considering that except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain who build it. The prophet knew where alone effectual relief for their distress was to be found, when he queried, "Are there any among the vanities of the Gentiles that can cause rain? Art not thou he, O Lord our God? therefore we will wait upon thee."

Those who truly love the Lord, and their fellowmen, must mourn at times over the evils that exist in the world, and over the multitude that seem to have but little anxiety or thought about their eternal welfare. As they abide under this concern, they will be made willing to do whatever the Lord calls for, in helping others. Yet their dependence will be, not in what they themselves can do, but in the abundant mercy and goodness of our Father in Heaven; who commissioned his prophet Jeremiah to declare to the backsliding kings of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem, that if they would hearken unto Him, then Jerusalem should remain forever, "and they shall come from the cities of Judah and from the places about Jerusalem, and from the land of Benjamin, and from the plain and from the mountains, and from the South, bringing burnt-offerings, and sacrifices, and meat-offerings, and incense, and bringing sacrifices of praise unto the house of the Lord."

We have received the first number of a new periodical, published at Glasgow, Scotland, by R. Barclay Murdoch, 461 Eglinton Street. Price, one penny per number.

Its object is set forth in the introductory article, which says: "For some little time now we have felt there was room for a vehicle to collect and circulate testimonies to the spirituality of the Christian Religion." "To prevent any misapprehension as to the doctrine we feel called upon to uphold, it seems well to state that our desire is to turn every one from all that is of Man's will and working to the Inward Manifestation of the Spirit of Christ, by obedience to the requirements of which, deliverance from sin and its punishment is to be obtained, knowing that Redemption and Forgiveness has been purchased for us by the Life of Obedience, and willing sacrifice upon the Cross, of our Blessed Lord and Master Jesus Christ."

The contents of the present number are principally extracted from Wm. Law's "Spirit of Prayer," George Keith's "Way to the City of God;" a sermon by Eckhart; and advice by Francis Howgill, "To all who would come out of sin." They are generally valuable and instructive.

The title of the periodical is "A Witness for Truth, and Advocate of Spiritual Christianity."

We hope it will continue to be what its name indicates; and thus be an instrument of good in the world.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 11th instant, the Postmaster General ordered the discontinuance of ninety-two fourth-class post-offices, "mainly for the reason that there were no candidates for the postmasterships." A large number of cases the business of the office did not justify their continuance. Nearly every State and Territory is represented in the list. During the present month, up to the 11th, 139 post-offices have been discontinued and 24 established.

The Eleventh Month crop report of the Department of Agriculture shows a general average of cotton two or three points lower than indicated a month ago. The yield of corn is 22 bushels per acre, making a total product of 1,068,000,000 bushels. The potato crop is the same as last year, averaging 73 bushels per acre, or a total of 163,000,000 bushels. Buckwheat promises 11,000,000 bushels. The apparent product of hay is 45,000,000 tons.

The elevated roads of New York have a capacity for handling 700,000 passengers a day, but their greatest business for any single day was on Sixth Mo. 6th last, when 557,114 passengers were carried. Since they were opened in Tenth Month, 1872, the roads have carried an aggregate of 693,000,000 passengers, only one of whom was killed, and the total receipts to Tenth Mo. 1st, 1886, were over $48,500,000.

The Prohibition vote of the State of Ohio is officially stated at 28,657.

Prohibitionists carried some thirty counties in Arkansas at the late election. In 1884 they cast less than 20,000 votes in that State, this year about 65,000.

John Dougherty, who invented portable iron section boats, and is credited with having devised the inclined planes on the Alleghany Mountains in the old Portage Railroad time, died in Pittsburg on the 10th instant, aged 83 years.

At Plaquemine, Louisiana, on the 14th inst., about two hundred feet of the river bank, including Levee street, caved into the river. Several buildings were destroyed. This is the first cave-in which has taken place in the river front this season.

Her Governor calls attention to the fact that Alabama devotes more than one-third of all the revenue she receives into the State Treasury to the public schools. He also refers to an increase in the assessed value of property in the State in the last few years of $35,000,000, and says that the whole amount of the tax for the fiscal year has been collected with the exception of $50—a record perhaps unparalleled in the financial transactions of any State in the Union. Every obligation of the State, including the interest on the bonded debt, has been promptly met, and the rate of tax reduced. "The people are satisfied with the State, emigration has ceased and immigration begun."

On the 8th instant, a great strike began at "Packing-town," Chicago, nearly 12,000 men being "out." The next day 3000 men reported for work at the stockyards, and were protected by militia. On the 10th the number employed was increased to 5000, about two-thirds of them new hands. On the 13th the strike was practically ended, the General Master Workman of the Knights of Labor having so directed. On the 15th, about 10,000 strikers made formal application for work, but not more than one-tenth of that number were successful. Much suffering is likely to result to the families of the men who have lost their situations at the beginning of winter, by this most unadvised strike.

According to the Minneapolis Evening Journal, Col. Platt Walker, a prominent lumberman, says that a syndicate of Canadian lumbermen, with partners in this State, have acquired the title to about 500,000,000 feet of pine timber in northwestern Minnesota, and belt on the northern slope, an area including about are arranging to secure the rest of the vast timber one-half of the entire State. "He charges that the clause in the Sundry Civil bill providing for a commission to treat with the Indians now occupying these lands for their removal to White Earth Agency, was secured directly in the interest of this Canadian syndicate." Walker adds that "if these treaties should be made and confirmed, ten million dollars' worth of Indian pine will certainly go into the hands of a foreign syndicate, and $15,000,000 worth of lumber that Minnesota and Dakota will shortly need will be owned by the same pool."

The deaths in this city last week numbered 360, which was 37 less than during the previous week, and 45 more than during the corresponding period last year.

Of these, 188 were males and 172 females; 51 died of consumption; 25 of pneumonia; 24 of cramp; 22 of diseases of the heart; 20 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 18 of old age; 16 of convulsions, and 9 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s registered, 110½; coupon, 111½; 4's, 128½; 3's, 100½; currency 6's, 126 a 136.

Cotton was quiet but firm at 9½ cts. for middling uplands.

Feed was in light supply and quiet at former rates, viz: Bran, western winter, spot, per ton, $14.50 a $15; do, spring, spot, $13.50 a $14; red middlings, $14 a $15.50; white middlings, 7½ a $18.

Petroleum was firm at 7 cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Flour and Meal.—The demand for flour from the local trade was very moderate at unchanged prices. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania family, at $3.62½; 125 barrels Ohio clear, at $4; 250 barrels do, straight, at $4.25; 500 barrels winter patent, at $4.50 a $4.70; 125 barrels Minnesota, straight, at $4.25, and 500 barrels do, patent, at $4.65 a $4.80. Rye flour sold in a small way, at $3.25 per barrel for choice.

Grain.—Wheat was a shade easier. No. 2 red closed at 82½ cts. bid and 83 cts. asked. Corn.—The market was firm under a fair export demand. No. 2 mixed closed at 44½ cts. bid, and 45 cts. asked. Oats were quiet but steady. No. 2 white closed at 34½ cts. bid and 35½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were in fair demand at a decline of ¼c., at 2½ a 5½ cts.

Sheep were active at 2½ a 5 cts. Lambs were active at 4 a 6½ cts.

Hogs were ¼c. lower. Western, 5½ a 6 cts.

FOREIGN.—The London Local Government Board has made public its reply to the letter recently addressed to it by the Social Democratic Federation, calling attention to the alleged enormous increase in the number of the poor and unemployed in London. The Board's reply asserts that in the Tenth month, 1886, the percentage of paupers in London was 22 to every 1000 of the population, while in the same month of the year 1868, the percentage was 42 to the 1000, and argues that these figures prove that, if pauperism does increase in London, the Government will be quite able to manage it and its attendant evils. The Board promises to assist the local authorities in the work of relieving the poor.

John MacPherson, who is known as the "Glendale martyr," and Daniel MacCallum, a clergyman, have been arrested in the Isle of Skye on the charge of inciting violence. MacCallum, as Chairman, advised a meeting of crofters to resist the removal of cattle. MacPherson also spoke at the meeting, giving the crofters similar advice.

Advices have been received at Plymouth, England, that the Chinese steamship Takataman burst her boilers while running under high pressure in a gale off Niigata, and that 96 persons who were on board perished, including the officers, who were Englishmen.

On the 11th instant, news was received in Paris of the death of Paul Bert, French Minister resident in Annam, who was reported the previous day to be critically ill with fever. He had achieved a high reputation in the scientific world by his interesting physiological researches, and especially by his bold experiments for ascertaining the conditions of human existence at different altitudes. He had also published many works of a scientific character, and was the author of numerous articles on political subjects.

Paris, Eleventh Mo. 12th.—The city of Nice has been visited by enormous waves from the Mediterranean. The water swept away the quays and the promenade on the Anglais plantation. Upward of a hundred people were carried off their feet, and the quays and promenade covered with sand. The devastation wrought by the waves extends two miles along Nice's water front.

At Cannes, which is twenty-two miles from Nice, a fierce storm has been raging, and two vessels are known to have been wrecked. Men standing on the quays were carried out to sea on immense waves. The Croisette promenade was destroyed.

A rain amounting almost to a deluge has been falling for four days at Gap, capital of the Department of Hautes-Alpes. A number of houses have been utterly destroyed by the floods resulting from the waterfall.

The city of Aix is so badly flooded that travel in the streets is impossible except in boats.

The rivers Po and Adige have overflowed and submerged the country along their courses. At Albenga the high waters of the Po dislodged the railway bridge while a train was crossing, precipitating the cars and passengers into the river. Five persons were drowned.

Paris, Eleventh Mo. 10th.—The statement made by the Marquis of Salisbury at the Lord Mayor's banquet in London last night, that England meant to remain in Egypt until her work in that country was completed, has made a profound impression in French political and financial circles. The National the Franco and other newspapers say they consider that the speech settles the question of evacuation, and shows that England's determination is to make the occupation of Egypt indefinite and protracted.

On the 13th inst., Count Kalnoky, Minister of Foreign Affairs for the whole Austro-Hungarian Empire, made before the delegations a declaration of the imperial foreign policy. The tenor of his entire address was pacific. Austria's interests in Bulgaria will be the maintenance of treaty rights. It is immaterial how internal affairs in Bulgaria proceed if the essentials of the Berlin treaty are not infringed. The importance of General Kaubars' mission has been greatly over-estimated. He has succeeded in making Russian influence felt in a most disagreeable manner, but he has also evoked the sympathy of Europe for the Bulgarian people. If Austria is forced to interfere in order to vindicate the Berlin treaty, the sympathy and co-operation are assured of all the Powers resolved to protect European treaties.

On the 10th inst., the Bulgarian Sobranje decided to elect Prince Waldemar, the third son of the King of Denmark, as successor to Prince Alexander on the Bulgarian throne. On the 12th, a telegram was received at Tirnova, from the King of Denmark, expressing thanks for the honor conferred upon his son, but declining upon any condition to allow him to accept the throne. Upon receiving the telegram, the Bulgarian Regents resigned. The Sobranje voted confidence in the Regents, but they declined to withdraw their resignations. The Sobranje has adjourned, all the members going to Sofia. A deputation will visit the European Courts to solicit the Powers to nominate a candidate for the throne.

Dispatches from Havana to the New Orleans Times-Democrat, states that the sugar crop of Cuba is estimated to be 800,000 tons, and exceeds the largest crop hitherto raised on the island.

This dear Friend was a firm believer in the doctrines and testimonies of ancient Quakerism as professed by Barclay, Fox and Penn. Although a victim of paralysis for six years previous to her death, her long confinement was marked with unshaken faith in her Redeemer, and she was at times so filled with the presence of her Saviour, that in much tenderness of spirit she would praise his holy name for his wonderful love to her soul. She was frequently engaged in supplication for her family, and seemed to have a work from time to time by way of counsel or encouragement, to those with whom she met. As her bodily strength decreased, she petitioned for patience to hold out to the end, and expressed her full readiness to go, saying that her Master's time was hers. Thus she quietly passed from works to reward.

Fourth Mo. 1st, 1841. Condemned for engaging last evening in too much conversation. Were I only more careful in my stepping along, how much more true peace should I enjoy!

4th. In our morning meeting dear S. Emlen was engaged in testimony from, "Can any of the vanities of the Gentiles cause rain, or can their heavens give showers?" Dear children, not one drop of celestial rain can any of these vanities give when the poor heart is dry, parched, thirsting for water. She believed there were those present who had experienced this; the language of whose hearts was, "As the hart panteth after the water-brooks so panteth my soul after thee, O God." To this class did she sweetly minister, saying: "Although there might be seasons of deep proving, and the enemy be very busy trying to persuade them to turn back; but the query "to whom shall we go?" would often be answered by, "Thou hast the words of eternal life." Her concern also for those who were seeking comfort in those vanities which could afford no real enjoyment, was great. Desiring that they might be prevailed upon to turn their backs upon them, and seek that, each for themselves, which would stand by them, be a strength and support to them in their wilderness journey through time, and, whereupon, they would often find a table spread for them, &c.

9th. This day closes our Examination. I seem to have been helped through.

25th. Returned last evening from the city. Yearly Meeting closed on Sixth-day evening. Though deeply tried, as are many, yet a little renewed evidence was afforded that truth yet lives amongst us; and that there are those established in it who are willing to suffer; and who do know or shall know a reigning with their suffering Lord.

Fifth Mo. 8th. Unusually depressed. Cannot feel that gratitude and thankfulness I ought to feel for multiplied mercies daily bestowed. Am I growing lukewarm and indifferent, hard and callous to every right feeling, or why is it thus with me? O, thou who knowest my heart, and who alone art able to soften it, be pleased to bring it into tenderness and brokenness before Thee. I have been made renewedly to feel this morning that it is thy presence alone that giveth life.

18th. Attended Concord Quarterly Meeting. A word of encouragement went forth to the timid fearful ones, who were about ready to conclude their way was hid from the Lord, and their judgment passed over from their God. It was believed that if faithfulness was abode in, the strength of these would be increased. "The Lord giveth power to the faint, and to them that have no might He increaseth strength," &c. Though these may feel as though they were of no use to the church, &c., they were desired to remember that in the structure of a building there was a very needful part of it under ground and out of sight, &c. Thus encouragement flowed very tenderly toward such as these. They were to remember that "help is laid on One that is mighty," and He remains willing to help all that come unto Him in sincerity and truth. A call was extended to those in the younger walks of life, to come out of the world, its fashions and maxims; believing there never was a time in which faithfulness in little things was more loudly called for. Supplication for different states followed, by dear S. Emlen.

23d. In our meeting this morning, dear Sarah Emlen was lively in testimony. Encouraging us all, and particularly the children, to faithfulness. Telling them that delays are dangerous. She had remembered how it was with Felix, when reasoned with of righteousness, temperance and judgment to come; his answer was: "Go thy way for this time, at a more convenient season I will call for thee." We do not read that he ever after had another opportunity. Here we were shown the danger of putting off. Remember, dear children, she continued, that "the Lord's Spirit will not always strive with man." Her travail and exercise were, that none of us might be left to ourselves. Afternoon meeting was a season of great brokenness.

26th. I was comforted last evening in the dear children who had given me trouble, coming forward and showing they were sorry. Any thing like hardness between teachers and scholars is unpleasant to me.

Sixth Mo. 17th. On gathering into silence in our meeting this morning, there seemed that around us which would gather if we would only be gathered by it. O how strong was felt the merciful loving-kindness of our Heavenly Father towards us. "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth those that fear Him: He knoweth our frame," &c. Near the close of the meeting, dear Sarah Emlen arose, and sweetly did she minister to a tried, cast down, and discouraged state present. The Lord's ear has not grown heavy that it cannot hear, nor his arm shortened that it cannot save; but "For the crying of the poor and sighing of the needy, will I arise," &c. Thus most comfortingly did she pour in the oil and the wine. No matter, she said, how hidden our exercises were, or though our situations were comparable to poor Hagar's, the Lord sees us; and for the help of these He will in his own good time arise. She craved that these might hold fast their confidence through the night season, and every wintry season; for be assured, He will come whom ye seek. She appeared to feel much what she said. I never before saw her so affected whilst speaking; as also were many of us. Truly "great and marvellous are thy works!"

20th. The exercise and travail of my soul this day, during our silent sitting in meeting, was for a removal of all that hinders and retards my spiritual progress. Tears flowed even to being poured out as water.

23rd. This day, particularly this evening, a season to be remembered. All that exalteth itself was laid low, under a fresh and lively sense of the mercy and forbearance of my Heavenly Father toward me, when so often I am found, Peter like, denying Him.

25th. I believe the Lord is secretly at work in the hearts of many of the dear children: for whose preservation prayers have arisen; and that they may be willing to receive the dear Master in the way of his coming, and "not be offended."

Seventh Mo. 1st. Arose this morning feeling very poor. The weight of condemnation seemed almost insupportable. Felt that I could adopt the language of the poor prodigal, "I have sinned and am no more worthy to be called thy son," &c. Upon sitting down in meeting my feelings became more and more alive to my situation. The uncertainty of life and the certainty of death, pressed upon me the necessity of being prepared. The secret cry was raised for mercy and forgiveness. While thus pleading for mercy, dear S. B. arose; who, if he had known my heart and the troubles of it, he could not have opened it more clearly. He first spoke of his own unfitness to minister in heavenly things, stating that the secret prayer had been, that the food which was most convenient might be administered; and believed that this had been the secret prayer of states present, and that the food had been handed which was most suitable. He said the Lord will have mercy; a way will be made for thy escape, &c., &c. Such were encouraged to seek out solitary places, to pour out their hearts before their Heavenly Father, who will hear and answer, &c.

2nd. Attended Concord Monthly Meeting, with a prayerful heart for a good meeting. Not only on my way there, but during our silent sitting together, a deep travail and exercise prevailed for a removal of all that hinders and retards my good journey heavenward; and that the hand of my Heavenly Father may be laid heavier and heavier upon me, till all that is not in conformity to his will be consumed.

3rd. Too much conversation indulged in.

4th. "O that I had in the wilderness a lodging place! where no eye might see, or ear hear, the state of a heart, the depth of whose distress Omnipotence only can fathom." Under feelings of this kind took my seat in meeting this morning. I had not sat many minutes before I was bathed in tears; my heart being poured out as water before the Lord for a removal of all that hinders my progress. Solemn covenants were entered into like to "If thou wilt be with me," &c. Whilst thus exercised, dear Sarah Emlen kneeled and interceded for the deliverance of the Lord's little depending ones, &c. Then, on behalf of the precious children, that their eyes might be opened to see and to feel the value of an immortal soul: knowing that to Thee there is to be an account rendered of every thought, word and action, &c. That it might please our Heavenly Father to raise up from among the children Israelites indeed, in whom there would be no guile. How did I travail along in exercise with our dear friend! and it did seem to me there was an ear opened to hear the prayer poured forth.

8th. Meeting morning. Nothing short of divine help can enable any of us to perform acceptable worship.

31st. Yesterday was our Monthly Meeting; and, through mercy, it was a season of favor. The interceding language of my heart was, "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." At our meeting had our friends Ebenezer Roberts and Henry Warrington; who are visiting the meetings in Concord Quarter. Dear E., after sitting more than half the meeting through in silence, arose with saying, that early after taking his seat amongst us, the command of the Lord to Moses formerly had been brought to his remembrance, where he was commanded to lead the people forward: "Ye have encompassed this mountain long enough." He believed it was time for some in the present little company to be journeying on; for they had compassed this mount long enough, &c. He had also remembered the circumstance of the poor cripple, who lay at the beautiful gate of the temple, asking alms; and who, seeing Peter and John pass by, asked an alms. "And Peter fastening his eyes upon him, with John, said, Look on us," &c. "Then Peter said, Silver and gold have I none; but such as I have give I thee: in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth rise up and walk." "And immediately his feet and ankle-bones received strength. And he leaping up, stood, and walked, and entered with them into the temple, walking, and leaping, and praising God." Here, he stated, was encouragement for us to apply to our great Helper; and he did believe there were those present who, if they would but apply in sincerity, their ankle-bones would receive strength; they would not only be enabled to stand, but leap, walk, and praise God. The condition of the fruitless fig tree was also set before us, with the awful denunciation that went forth against it. He wanted to arouse some who were passing along unconcernedly, unto whom the Lord hath long been calling and knocking, till "his head was filled with dew, and his locks wet with the drops of the night," &c. It was a favored opportunity; and greatly have I desired the word may not return void.

Blue Blood.—The term blue blood, from the Spanish phrase angre azul, has been much used, says a writer in the Boston Transcript, without a very clear idea of its signification. Its real meaning is—not that the blood itself is blue (excepting that all venous blood has a bluish tinge) but that the persons or class to whom the term is applied have skins so white and transparent that the veins show blue through them, and this is taken as a certain indication that the class or persons thus designated are pure blooded—that is, without an admixture of races. Any one who has travelled in Spanish-American countries, or in Spain, where the term originated, would see at once its applicability. The descendants of the Gothic conquerors of Spain retain to this day the characteristics of their ancestors—the white, transparent skin, blue eyes, and auburn or tawny hair, and their veins show blue through their cuticle; but in case of an admixture of African or Moorish blood, the blue blood (veins) gradually disappear, until, in a case of great preponderance of the latter races, the veins show merely as ridges upon the general surface.

Niagara Falls.

For "The Friend."

While summer excursions are often a necessity, and very pleasant and helpful to the relaxed system, there is something especially invigorating and delightful in an autumn trip. Places of interest are not then crowded, and one has a choice of rooms, and a rest and quiet in them, unknown in the more fashionable season. There is also a better opportunity to view the beauties of a place, as comparatively few are desiring the same scene with you, and you can see all points more fully; and then the bright and ever-varying tints of the trees of deciduous leaf, contrasted with that of pine, or cedar, or hemlock, give a coloring to the landscape, ever restful and inspiring to the lover of nature.

Such were the feelings of a small party, who, having had no summer trip, started for Niagara early in the Tenth Month—some to renew their acquaintance with that "monarch of the world of floods," and the balance of the party to gaze upon its "majesty and might" for the first time, and with more youthful eyes.

Taking a sleeping car at the Ninth and Green streets depot, we were soon able to compose ourselves for the night, thus shortening a long ride to be re-traversed by day on our return. Morning dawned soon after leaving Elmira, and a beautiful country was travelled over, our conductor informing us that we were in the upper portion of the Wyoming Valley; and greatly did we enjoy its variegated hill and mountain sides, some cultivated far up to their very tops. In crossing the Genessee River about ten o'clock, over a railroad bridge 230 feet above the bed of the river, we looked down upon a beautiful sight—the water being precipitated in a perpendicular line to a point 300 feet below the level on which we were travelling.

It was quite cloudy when we arrived at Niagara at one o'clock, and we were told that for two weeks there had been rain daily, but the clouds soon parted, and we were favored during our stay with bright skies, and an ever-varying condition of the atmosphere, giving a particularly good opportunity to see the Falls in their varied phases. The Cataract House is situated so near the Rapids, that the rush and roar of the waters is constantly heard, and the rattling of the windows from the jar was striking, sometimes reminding us of dashing rain.

The first evening of our stay was an anxious one to many, a man who had attempted to cross the river in a row boat above the Rapids, having been caught in them, and was carried down on the American side. He left his boat as it was about to strike a rock, which cut it in two almost instantly. He was swept on and on, until just above the Goat Island Bridge, when he caught on an iron bar, a remnant of the old paper mill which once stood there, and was able to continue his hold until a rope was thrown him and slipped over his body, when he resigned himself again to the waters, and was safely pulled on shore, after a suspense of several hours. His name was Robinson, one of the family so long connected with the Falls; but, we add with regret a man of unsteady habits, which no doubt caused the inability to guide his boat.

Taking a carriage the next morning, we crossed the bridges to Goat Island, which was formerly called "Iris Island," from the many rainbows seen near it. It was a burying ground of the Indians in ancient times, and wild and romantic was the spot thus chosen for the last resting place of these aborigines of our country. Luna Island was reached by a stairway and bridge—and here we get our first view of the American Falls, dashing down a perpendicular height of about 160 feet. They are divided by this island—the centre Fall being that under which visitors may, if they desire, enter the famous cave of the Winds. Descending the Bidle staircase, and donning an oilcloth suit, they pass to the "Shadow of the Rock," and over "Hurricane Bridge," obtaining at times fine views of rock and spray before entering the Thundering Cave, said to be filled with perpetual storms. It has been formed, we were told, by the action of the water on the strata of rock, the harder limestone overhead arching 30 feet beyond the base. We lingered long on Luna Island, watching the mighty rush of the foaming torrents, and admiring the beautiful green tints of the water, now dark and deep, and now of the "clearest, purest hue;" and the full force of Buckingham's familiar lines were realized.

"First dazzles, then enraptures, then o'erawes the aching sight;
The pomp of kings and emperors from every clime and zone
Grows dim beneath the splendor of thy glorious watery throne.
Thy diadem an emerald green," etc.

From thence we proceeded round Goat Island to a point where the Canada Falls were in full view. These Falls were formerly called the Horseshoe Falls from their shape, which has been so greatly changed of late years that the name is scarcely appropriate, many large rocks having fallen into the river. While the height of these Falls is about the same as that of the American, the volume of water is much greater, and the width nearly double that of the American and Centre Falls combined. We clambered out on the rocks here, and could almost imagine they shook with the torrents that dashed passed us, on and on, and on—

"No fleet can stop thy progress, no army bid thee stay,
But onward, onward, onward, thy march still holds its way."

The three Sister Islands were next visited. They are connected by bridges, under which the rapids sweep with irresistible force; and from them we get a grand view of the river, lashed into foam and spray, and hurrying on to the fatal leap. Its appearance was that of a hillside, over which, or beyond which, we attempted in vain to look. As we drove farther on round the island, the quieter waters of the river could scarcely be realized in contrast with its roar and rush round the "Sisters."

From Prospect Park, both Falls are in full view, and also the three bridges down the river, of which further mention will be made. Here the rainbow may be seen laying "its gorgeous gems" at the feet of the American Falls, often completing a perfect half-circle. During bright moonlight, a lunar bow is frequently formed, and occasionally a double one may be seen by the close observer. An inclined railway and staircase lead to the river below, and as we stand at the foot of the Falls, and look up at them, wrapped in spray and gemed with color,—the dark rocks jutting out below—the effect is wonderfully grand. These rocks are covered with rich mosses, and are very slippery to walk upon, though persons often venture on them to get a nearer view.

The little "Maid of the Mist," successor to the former one of the same name, has her landing here; and with others, we allowed ourselves to be covered with oilcloth coats and hats, and proceeded to the deck of the steamer. As we passed close to the American Falls, we were enveloped in spray, but had a fine view of them, and of the rocks that lay in huge masses at their feet, and in which we seemed to be running. But our pilot, with a sudden turn of the wheel, swept us far beyond them, and brought us in front of the Canadian Falls, the width and grandeur of which were thoroughly displayed by this closer acquaintance. After pausing on the Canadian shore, we returned to our starting place in our little vessel which had been rocked as a cork on the troubled waters, feeling we had had a most novel, interesting, and awe-inspiring half-hour's ride, not without misgivings on the part of some, but we trust also those of much thankfulness for a safe return.

(To be concluded.)

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 107.

PERSONAL INFLUENCE.

It is related that the captain of a vessel sailing down the Mississippi, had his vessel so injured that there was great danger of losing both vessel and cargo. He was a pious man, and though placed in this perilous position, manifested a composure which evidenced that his mind was stayed upon God, while at the same time he omitted nothing that could be done to save the property entrusted to his care. While things were in this situation, there came to his aid one of the pilots on that station, who, by his own account, neither feared God nor regarded man. After offering his services, he began to storm and swear. After a little time, however, he began to contrast his own conduct with that of the captain, and said to himself, "How is it, that while I have nothing at risk I am swearing as though it were mine? And the captain, who has property and reputation at stake, seems perfectly calm? It must be his religion, and as I have a Bible on board my boat, I will commence reading it, and see if I can find what his religion is."

The conviction of his own sinfulness, forced upon him by the contrast with the consistent course of the captain, was the commencement of a change for the better, and through the power of Divine Grace, he was enabled to forsake the evil of his ways and to live a more Godly life. He afterwards called upon the captain and informed him of what the Lord had done for his soul.

It is a common remark that the blood of martyrs is the seed of the church; for nothing so convinces beholders of the value of the religious principles professed as to see men patiently enduring suffering and death rather than desert them. It is indeed a strong proof of the value of that crown of righteousness laid up in store for those who endure to the end. One Adrianus, in ancient times, seeing the martyrs suffer such grievous things in the cause of Christ, asked, "What is that which enables them to bear such suffering?" One of them replied, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him." So powerful was the effect of these words, and such the conviction sealed by the Holy Spirit on the mind of Adrianus, that he became a convert to Christianity, and himself suffered martyrdom.

In a conversation at a tea-table on religious subjects, one of the company stated that when he was a young man of about eighteen, he was a clerk in Boston, and his room-mates at the boarding-house were clerks of the same age. When First-day morning came, during the hours between breakfast and meeting-time, he said: "I felt a secret desire to get a Bible, which my mother had given me, out of my trunk, and read in it, but I was afraid to do so before my messmates, who were reading miscellaneous books. At last my conscience got the mastery, and I rose up and went to my trunk. I had half raised it when the thought occurred to me that it might look like over-sanctity or pharisaical, so I shut my trunk and returned to the window.—For twenty minutes I was miserably at ease. I felt I was doing wrong. I started a second time for my trunk, and had my hand on my Bible, when the fear of being laughed at conquered the better emotion, and I again dropped the top of my trunk. As I turned away from it, one of my room-mates, who observed my irresolute movements, said laughingly:

"I say, what's the matter? You seem as restless as a weathercock!"

"I replied by laughing in my turn; and then conceiving the truth to be the best, frankly told him what was the matter. To my surprise and delight, they both spoke up and averred that they had Bibles in their trunks, and had been secretly wishing to read in them, but were afraid to take them out lest I should laugh at them." The result was that all three took out their Bibles.

The next First-day morning, two of their fellow boarders came into the room, and finding how they were engaged, requested that a chapter be read aloud. That evening the three room-mates agreed to have a chapter read every night in their room. A few evenings after, four or five of the other boarders happened to be in the room talking when the nine o'clock bell rang. One of the room-mates opened the Bible, and another explained to their visitors their custom. "We'll all stay and listen," they said.

The practice spread, till finally every one of the sixteen clerks boarding in the house spent his First-day mornings in reading the Bible, and the moral effect on the family was of the highest character.

F. N. Zabriskie, in an article on the unconscious influence which we exert over each other, mentions the case of a woman who had occasion to stop for a moment in the street to speak to a mechanic, and walked on, the interview quickly passing from her mind. A year after, he came and told her that he had not touched a drop of liquor since that day. She wondered why he should tell her of it, until informed that on that occasion she had stepped a little aside while talking with him,—as he supposed, because his breath was offensive to her from the fumes of liquor. He had instantly said to himself, with a sudden consciousness of degradation: "Have I reached the point where this lady shrinks from me as from one unclean? It is time for me to stop short!" She surprised him by saying that her movement had no such motive. But the effect had been the same, and her unconscious influence had done more to sober him than a good many temperance lectures would probably have done.

In the same article he describes the experience of another woman, whom he knew, who had been left a widow at an early age, and had removed to a large college town for the education of her only son. "Here," he says, "though of a peculiarly sensitive and shrinking nature, she was led by her love of Christ and sympathy with poor humanity, to engage more and more in ministries to the needy and degraded about her. In that city was a county jail, whose occupants were exceptionally numerous for that class of prisons. The religious oversight of this institution had never been other than perfunctory, or else of an intermittent and unreliable kind. And now it seemed as if even this had failed.

"I need not relate how, step by step, she found herself led to the very door of what had always seemed to her the next thing to the bottomless pit. But she had learned to absolutely commit her way to the Lord, and to wait upon the indications of his will as a maiden upon the hand of her mistress. Everything up to this point had made this door, so shut to those inside, an 'open door' to her from the outside. But could it be that she, a weak, diffident, lone woman, who had been reared amid the most pure and refined influences, should venture into that cage of unclean and ravening birds, become the companion and friend of murderers and thieves and prostitutes and drunkards?"

"Is it any wonder that she was fearfully exercised in mind and conscience, nervous, afraid of the men whom she might meet, apprehensive lest she might be mistaking her duty and God's call, and going outside of her appropriate sphere? And this feeling culminated up to the very morning on which she was to make her first visit to the jail. Her prayer for light, wisdom, direction, was intense, and in her perplexity she even ventured to ask for some decided sign from heaven, as she was utterly unable to decide for herself. Naturally enough, no such sign appeared.

"It was plain that she must go to the jail, for she had promised. She went. The doors were closed behind her, and she was left alone with the prisoners in their cells; but, to her glad surprise, she felt no fear. Some other memorable experiences on this occasion were very assuring. After she reached home, the few minutes before dinner had to be spent in inhaling (for her lungs were weak); and, as was her wont, she took up a paper to read the while. The first article upon which her eye lighted was one entitled 'An Angel in Jail.' It began by telling how an angel delivered Peter out of prison, and how Paul rescued the Philippian jailer from a still darker doom, and then narrated a most striking story of the saving of a little thief to become a good and useful man by a Christian visit to the prison in which he was confined. The question was then asked, whether the person who thus saved 'Johnny' was not as really an angel from God as was Peter's deliverer, or as was Paul."

The author of the article never knew the comfort and strength of which he was thus the unconscious instrument.

When we reflect on the wide-reaching extent of the influence we exert over one another, and the unexpected way in which it often operates, we can appreciate the force of the following caution:—"One can no more escape from the obligation of guarding his personal influence at all times and in all places than he can escape from the necessity of breathing. There is no moment in conscious life where a man should not be on guard for the right use of his personality, any more than there is any moment when the heart should cease, for a time, to beat, and for nerve and brain to become paralyzed."

One great sign of humility is for a man to acknowledge his faults when reproved. The proud, on the other hand, excuse and defend themselves, saying in their pride, "No, I have not done this, or if I have I have done well; if evil, not so very evil—not so evil as they say."—Thomas à Kempis.

Curiosities of Losing and Finding.

Not long ago I was in a certain company, of which one member amused the rest by telling stories of seekers finding; and some of these may well interest a larger circle than that there gathered.

"Two of my brothers," said the story-teller, "were walking in Switzerland, and on arriving one evening at their halting place, the elder, who was also the purse-bearer, found that his pocket-book, containing some sixty pounds, was missing. The money was in circular notes, not easy of negotiation; and a companion in travel, a German, whose acquaintance they had made on the way, at once offered to lend them any sum they might require, so that the inconvenience promised to be only temporary.

"But for all that, they did not like the idea of losing the pocket-book, to say nothing of its contents, and they determined to seek for it. It was now dark, and a slight rain was falling; but, nothing daunted, they set out with a guide and good lantern, along the mountain road. Some five miles they plodded, scanning the ground the whole way, until they came to where they remembered having taken off their coats to lay them on the mule's back with the rest of their baggage. Just there they found an envelope addressed to one of themselves, which quickened their search; and in another minute the rays of the lantern revealed the pocket-book, lost no longer, nor to be lost again. It was sodden a little with the rain, but the notes were safe; and their return to the inn brought them greater triumph than their departure on such a wild-goose chase—as their search expedition was deemed—had given them shame."

Quite in keeping with this was the conduct of another member of the same family, who, having lost a pocket-compass, a tiny trinket, in the Peak Cavern, went in search of it the next day, and found it several hundred yards from the entrance. Party after party had explored the cavern between the losing and the seeking; the cavern path is wet, and muddy and narrow.

Even more remarkable, as it seems to me, was the story told by the same talker (a parson, by the way) of a lady of his acquaintance, who, being with her family at Hayling Island, lost a very valuable cameo brooch. She and her children searched high and low for it, but found it not; and vexed, if not saddened, at the loss of that which was a present from a dear friend, the first possessor of the brooch returned home. When, the next year, the summer question was mooted in family council, "Where shall we go this year?" the answer was again given in favor of Hayling Island. The first morning after their arrival, when mother and children reached the beach, almost the first discovery was that of the so-called "lost" brooch. Among the pebbles, above high water mark, the jewel had rested, unharmed by winter storm or summer sun. If losing was seeking, finding has been keeping; for to this hour that cameo can be seen in possession of her to whom it was first given, fresh from the skillful hands of the Roman workman. Articles of jewelry, of course, are generally small, and therefore the more easily lost.

"A friend of mine," the talker told us, "sleeping for one night in a hotel, stuck his diamond breast-pin into the bed-curtain, rose hurriedly to catch an early train, and left it there. He hardly liked to trust the honesty of the chambermaid, and left his loss untold. He spent a twelvemonth or more at Malta with his regiment; and, returning on furlough, went to the same hotel, asked for the same room, and found his breast-pin where he had left it." That does not say much for the cleanliness of the hotel, I hear some one saying. Perhaps it does not, but it says something for the sharpness of the pin-wearer. There was wit . . . in his method . . .

A lady, a spectacle-wearer, went shopping in the West End. On putting her hand in her pocket for her "eyes," preparatory to choosing a dress, she missed them. Her husband, who professed to know her ways, was sure that she had never brought them. She was as sure that she had. He was rightly punished for his injustice by having to bear, unaided and alone, the responsibility of the choice of color and material. The choice made, he went on his way to the city; the wife on hers to her home. Of frugal mind, she chose an omnibus as her mode of conveyance, and sitting meditative, as the vehicle bore her homewards, she fancied she recognized it as the same which had carried her townwards. She searched the straw at her feet, and found her spectacles, unbroken.

"A friend of mine went into a hosier's in Bristol to buy a pair of driving gloves. Selecting a pair which he thought would suit him, he asked, and was granted, permission to try them on. He tried them on, bought and paid for them, and then asked the tradesman whether he had ever had complaint made to him of the loss of a ring in his shop—the fact being that the little finger of the buyer's left hand had now upon it such a ring, which it had unwittingly withdrawn from the recesses of the glove, and which, doubtless, had been left there by some former would-be purchaser. The shopman, however, answered that no such complaint had been made; and the purchaser of the gloves left the shop with the ring in his possession, leaving behind him his name and address, in case the loser of the ring should ever turn up."

Somewhat like this was the loss sustained by an officer in St. Helena. He missed his ring, and searched for it high and low, but found it not. Suspicion fell upon his batsman, or soldier-servant; but there was nothing to justify it, and in the end the man was cleared; for on being ordered home the officer turned out his drawers, and, throwing many things away, was surprised to hear an old kid glove strike sharply on the floor. He picked it up, and there in its little finger was the missing ring.

The suspicion which often falls on innocent people when valuables are lost is one, possibly the worst, part of a loss. Some fifty years ago a lady sat in her room with her child on her lap. Clutching as children do at anything, the child gave a sharp jerk to the long gold chain which the lady wore, and broke it. The chain fell to the floor, but was picked up and taken to the jeweler's to be mended. When brought back it was considerably shorter than before, and its owner went at once to the jeweler to complain. He, worthy tradesman, was indignant at the bare thought of dishonesty being imputed even to his workmen, and permitted himself the use of some very forcible language in his repudiation of the charge. The owner of the chain could not maintain the charge, but she felt, all the same, that she was being robbed. Years had passed away, and the family had emigrated to America, when the servant one day brought to her mistress a piece of the gold chain which she had shaken from a long-haired mat. The chain had been snapped in two places, not only in one, as had been supposed, and the wearer had picked up only the longer portion. The shorter piece had got entwined in the mat, and remained there for a dozen years.

No great harm was done in this case, but in another of which I am cognizant, the mischief was irreparable. At a sale which took place on the death of the rector of a parish near Chester, a piano was knocked down to a tradesman of the city. On being tuned and repaired, two costly rings were found beneath the keyboard. The finder communicated with the rector's widow, when the following sad story came to light. Eleven years before, a lady staying at the Rectory had lost these very rings. She had evidently taken them off while playing, and laid them on the piano, and they had then somehow slipped in under the keys. Suspicion, however, had fallen upon a maid then in the service of the family, and she was sent home. Her father, a small farmer, was terribly upset at the disgrace which had fallen upon his name and family, and refused to receive her. The poor girl went away from the neighborhood; in fact, she disappeared. On the finding of the rings, every endeavor was made to find her, but in vain. Advertisements were even inserted in the public newspapers, promising her a considerable annuity, but with no result. Unjustly suspected, she had hidden herself from all her former belongings, and was never heard of again. And who can wonder if she sank beneath the weight of a lost character? Who can blame her if her thoughts of her employers and of their class were hard and bitter?

Who can hear such a story without a resolve never lightly to harbor suspicion? It is surely more likely that I should be mistaken than that my neighbor, however poor, should steal. My neighbor's character is, at the least, more precious than the costliest trinket ever made.—Cassell's Family Magazine.

For "The Friend."

Selfishness in Religion.

My heart has often been pained in reflecting on the selfish and foolish course which many pursue with reference to religion. From time to time they turn aside from the entreaties of the Holy Spirit, pleading that there is "time enough; I am young, I have many years before me in which to repent." If they are admitted into the holy presence at the last, they appear to be content; they wish to obtain the crown without bearing the cross; and hope the Lord will give them the reward of the righteous, although they have not obeyed His will! The Lord is merciful to the true penitent; but how unsafe it is to put off such an important matter till the eleventh hour! Only one of the two who were crucified with our Saviour was admitted with Him into Paradise. It has been remarked that "one was brought to repentance there, to show that none should despair in a dying hour; and but one, that none should be presumptuous and delay repentance to that awful moment."

A person holding the position of minister (not of the Society of Friends) said he had witnessed scores of so-called death-bed repentances; and in only one instance could he stand up before the people and say, he felt satisfied that the deceased had gone happy. He fully agreed that it was a purely selfish motive which induced such to cry for help that they might escape the torments which they believed awaited them, not regretting having grieved the Holy Spirit of God throughout a life which had been in mercy lengthened out, year after year, in the hope that fruit would yet be borne, that his cause might be upheld by them even for a short time. If every one thus put off till the last, who would there be for the Lord to use as instruments?

Oh! how sad it is to know that there are those who are especially intended to be "preachers of righteousness," who, from time to time put off yielding to the visitations of Grace; waiting for a more "convenient season," and desiring to follow their own ways a little longer. Then, when their best days for doing something to promote the cause of truth are past, and sickness and death stare them in the face, they call for forgiveness.

It is sad to see such cases, even though forgiveness may be granted as at the eleventh hour; and they, through adorable mercy, allowed to enter the "golden gates;" or, if life be a little prolonged to labor in the Lord's vineyard, and receive the same wages as those who have borne the "burden and heat of the day." Yet it is still more grievous to see the last call passed by unheeded; and they left to drift down the stream of time unconscious, as it were, of their awful situation; for the strivings of the Spirit being now removed, there is nothing to warn them of their condition. The following thrilling incident seems so much to the point, that I will insert it:

"A young man, residing in Manchester, had for many years been notorious for his profane and profligate way of life. Three times had he been laid upon what appeared to human judgment his dying bed.

"Three times had he most solemnly declared his repentance, and vowed that if it would please God to restore him to health, the remainder of his life should be dedicated to his Maker and His cause.

"Three times did a merciful and long-suffering God hear and answer his supplication; but alas! no sooner were his fears allayed and present danger past, than he again returned to his sin. 'The last state of that man was worse than the first.'

"Once more he was laid upon a bed of dangerous and protracted illness; the most dreadful anguish took possession of his mind; no prayers, no conversation, appeared to impart one moment's hope or comfort. One day, when in an agony of despair, he asked a minister who was sitting by his bedside, to request every member of the family to retire into different rooms to pray for him, which was immediately done; and while they were all engaged in prayer, and as it afterwards appeared at the same moment, the awful words were presented to the minds of each: 'Because I have called and ye refused; I have stretched out my hand and no man regarded; but ye have set at nought all my counsels, and would none of my reproof: I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh.' Instantly, as they expressed it, almost irresistibly, they arose from their knees, and rushed to the chamber of the unhappy sufferer, when, as the door opened, the same fearful words, 'I also will laugh at your calamity, I will mock when your fear cometh,' were shrieked out, rather than spoken, by the dying man. In an instant all was still; the spirit had fled to its eternal destiny."

In this, as in so many other cases, it was the fear of the future which troubled him—the remembrance of past sins weighing him down; but he was taken away, and not left (as is often the case) to spend years in shedding evil influences to those around. Surely, in the language of the poem—

"Youth is the time to leave our hearts in Jesus' care." It is very little we can do for Him, who has done so much for us, if we devote our whole lives to His service. And has He not a claim on our lives? Yes, verily.

It seems to me that if many of those who so put off this important matter, would for a moment consider for what purpose, and by what power, they are brought into and kept on this stage of action and responsibility, and how much they owe Him who laid down his precious life for them, they would not so easily be persuaded by the grand enemy of the soul's good, to defer the matter and grieve the Holy Spirit of God.

ST. MARTIN'S SUMMER.*

Though flowers have perished at the touch
Of Frost, the early comer,
I hail the season loved so much,
The good St. Martin's summer.

O gracious morn, with rose-red dawn,
And thin moon curving o'er it!
The old year's darling, latest born,
More loved than all before it!

How flamed the sunrise through the pines!
How stretched the birchen shadows,
Braiding in long, wind-wavered lines
The westward sloping meadows!

The sweet day, opening as a flower
Unfolds its petals tender,
Renews for us at noontide's hour
The summer's tempered splendor.

The birds are hushed; alone the wind,
That through the woodland searches,
The red oak's lingering leaves can find,
And yellow plumes of larches.

But still the balsam-breathing pine
Invites no thought of sorrow,
No hint of loss from air like wine,
The earth's content can borrow.

The summer and the winter here
Midway a truce are holding,
A soft, consenting atmosphere
Their tents of peace enfolding.

The silent woods, the lonely hills,
Rise solemn in their gladness;
The quiet that the valley fills
Is scarcely joy or sadness.

How strange! The autumn yesterday
In winter's grasp seemed dying;
On whirling winds from skies of gray
The early snow was flying.

And now, while over Nature's mood
There steals a soft relenting,
I will not mar the present good,
Forecasting or lamenting.

My autumn time and nature's hold
A dreamy tryst together,
And both grown old, about us fold
The golden-tissued weather.

I lean my heart against the day
To feel its bland caressing;
I will not let it pass away
Before it leaves its blessing.

O stream of life, whose swifter flow
Is of the sun-forewarning,
Methinks thy end following
Seems less of night than morning!

Old cares grow light; aside I lay
The doubts and fears that troubled;
The quiet of the happy day
Within my soul is doubled.

That clouds must veil this fair sunshine,
Not less a joy I find it;
Nor less you warm horizon line,
That winter lurks behind it.

The mystery of the untried days
I close my eyes from reading;
His will he done whose darkest ways
To light and life are leading!

Less drear the winter night shall be,
If memory cheer and hearten
Its heavy hours with thoughts of thee, Sweet summer of St. Martin!

—Whittier.

* This name in some parts of Europe is given to the season we call Indian Summer.

Workmen's Heroism.—Last month, at the Elswick Works of Sir William Armstrong & Co., two men, George Atkinson and James M'Ewen, bricklayers, had been engaged in constructing a new flue in connection with the gas main at the steel works. They had left their tools in the flue, and at five minutes past six o'clock, entered the flue to get them. It was noticed by a man named James Millard that the men did not come out as soon as might have been expected, and he hastened with some alarm to the spot. His alarm was increased when, on approaching the flue, he encountered gas. Undeterred, however, Millard bravely entered the place, and got so far as to come across the body of M'Ewen, who was lying with his face to the ground and "snoring," as he termed it, like a man asleep. Millard was fortunately, able to withstand the effects of the gas at this time, and, grasping M'Ewen round the body, bore him out into the open air. The gallant rescuer was, however, much overcome, and was utterly unable to enter the flue for the purpose of reaching Atkinson. What he was unable to do, other persons attempted, but the gas was too strong for them, and after they had entered for a few days, they were compelled to withdraw. Hector Thompson, a young man having charge of the gas producers, heard of the occurrence, and hastened to the spot. With great intrepidity, Thompson got a rope round his waist, went in, struggled about in the darkness, and at length, finding the body of Atkinson, bore it, almost in an unconscious state himself, to the man-hole. Thompson was much exhausted, and for the remainder of the day was very ill, but recovered sufficiently towards evening to be present at the inquest. Atkinson was unconscious and never rallied, but expired at about seven o'clock. He was a fine young man, aged thirty-three years, and lived at Gateshead. The jury returned a verdict of accidental death, and warmly commended Millard and Thompson for their gallant conduct.—The Herald of Peace.

True Beauty.—A woman, famous as one of the most kindly and most lovable among leaders of the best American society, once said: "If I have been able to accomplish anything in life, it is due to the word spoken to me in the right season, when I was a child, by my old teacher. I was the only homely, awkward girl in a class of exceptionally pretty ones, and being also dull at my books, became the butt of the school. I fell into a morose, despairing state, gave up study, withdrew into myself and grew daily more bitter and vindictive.

"One day, the French teacher, a gray haired old woman, with keen eyes and a kind smile, found me crying.

'Qu' as-tu, ma-fille?' she asked.

'Oh, madame, I am so ugly!' I sobbed out. She soothed me, but did not contradict me.

Presently, she took me to her room, and after amusing me for some time, said, 'I have a present for you,' handing me a scaly, coarse lump, covered with earth. 'It is round and brown as you. 'Ugly,' did you say? very well. We will call it by your name, then. It is you! Now, you shall plant it, and water it, and give it sun for a week or two.'

I planted it and watched it carefully; the green leaves came first, and at last the golden Japanese lily, the first I had ever seen. Madame came to share my delight.

'Ah,' she said significantly, 'who would believe so much beauty and fragrance were shut up in that little, rough, ugly thing? But it took heart, and came into the sun.'

It was the first time that it ever occurred to me that, in spite of my ugly face, I, too, might be able to win friends, and to make myself beloved in the world."—Youths' Companion.

Natural History, Science, &c.

The Sea-Serpent.—The existence in North American waters of a marine animal of serpentine form and of great dimensions, has long been a subject of controversy. Many persons have asserted that they had seen it; but others have supposed that they had been deceived by floating spars, rows of porpoises, or other objects. A recent communication to the Congregationalist, by Granville B. Putnam, of Franklin School, Boston, seems to render the existence of such an animal more probable than anything else we have seen. He says in his article:—"On the afternoon of August 12th, about 1.15, I was engaged in the study of Professor Farlow's work on Alge, when I heard the voice of Calvin W. Poole, town clerk of Rockport, at the door of my cottage at Pigeon Cove, saying: "There is some strange thing in the water: I think it is the sea-serpent." I quickly took my station upon the rail of my piazza, so that my marine glass was about fifty feet above the water, and but thirty-six feet from the shore. The creature was advancing in a northerly direction, and but little more than an eighth of a mile from me. I saw it approaching, passing, and departing, and watched it most attentively for about ten minutes. Judging by the apparent length of yachts, whose dimensions I know as they appear at that distance, I estimated the length to have been not less than eighty feet. The head seemed short, and about the size of a nail-cask, while the middle of the body was larger than that of a large man. The color was a dark brown, and it appeared to be somewhat mottled with a lighter shade. As the head was no time raised above the water, I could not determine the color of the throat. The surface of the head and back was very smooth, and no one of the forty or more persons who saw it detected anything that looked like a fin or flipper.

Its movement was not that of a land-serpent, but a vertical one, resembling that of the leech or the blood-suckers of my boyhood. I could distinctly see perhaps fifteen feet of the forward portion of the body, while back of that, the convulsions being greater, the depressions were below the surface, so as to present a series of ridges, some ten or fifteen in number at a time. The extremity of the tail was not visible. During nearly the whole passage of a mile and a quarter, either the muzzle or cranium cut the water so as to lead several to exclaim, "His head is white!" This fact would remove the possibility of its being anything floating with the tide. The cutting of the water was by something at least a foot wide, and caused wakes on either side. From my elevated position I could plainly see the movements of the body between them, while the rear portion caused another wake behind. Its course was a direct one, and its speed uniform, and not more than five miles an hour. When it reached a point about a half mile north of us, the undulatory movement seemed to cease, and the body was for a moment extended along the surface. There was an apparent gathering of the caudal extremity into ridges nearer together than those previously seen, after which he disappeared. I judged that this latter movement was to aid in diving, but of course this is only conjecture."

A Rare Plant.—It is well known that some plants are extremely rare, dying out, as some botanists believe, and others not particularly rare, are in danger of extinction from some popular demand for them.

In our country a very rare plant is known as Shortia galacifolia. A fragment of a flower was noted by Prof. Asa Gray in the herbarium of Michaux, in Paris. It had never been found since Michaux's time until, a few years ago, a collector of medicinal roots in the mountains of North Carolina met with a patch, a specimen from which Dr. Gray named for him. The exact locality has been kept secret, not as a matter of scientific pride, but as a matter of profit, the collector getting from five to ten dollars per specimen for it. It is now believed the locality is nearly denuded of its treasure. Fortunately, Professor Sargent has recently discovered it in the exact spot where Michaux found it. He may keep its knowledge from pecuniary hunters for a while, but it would be a grand thing for botanical science if some plan could be discovered to save the prize for all time.—The Independent.

Animal Traits.—In the American Naturalist, I. Lancaster, records some interesting observations of the traits of animals, made by him, in the swamp lands of southern Florida.

"One morning as I was digging a post hole in the sand, a large snake made its appearance near by in the bushes. It remained through the day in sight, and seemed to be greatly interested in what was going on. The next day it was on hand, and remained as before. It became more and more familiar; would approach to within a few feet of my person, examine each hole as it was dug, and interview the spade stuck upright in the sand, by putting its head through the hand-hole and coiling and uncoiling about the handle. It was non-venomous evidently, but a native said it was a 'coach-whip.' It finally became a tenant-at-will, had the freedom of the house and grounds, and was an object of never ceasing interest. Its curiosity was simply unbounded, and any hour of the day or night it was on hand to assist in whatever enterprise was in progress. To my surprise neither the snake nor the cat took the least notice of each other. The cat was, however, mistress of the situation, for when coach-whip came too near, it was boxed away, gently at first, with more and more claw in each succeeding tap until it obeyed. If the snake was hurt, it simulated anger; gathering itself up as if to dart on its foe; quivering its head, and oscillating to and fro in a forbidding manner. It was really of respectable dimensions, being 10 feet long, and over 2 inches in diameter in the thickest part, and when in these tantrums seemed formidable: but puss paid no attention to the fuss, shutting her eyes and sleeping in the midst of it all.

Two things the snake could never comprehend—a hot stove and a student lamp. After a persistent investigation of these articles for nearly a year, the mystery of neither seemed at all removed; and it was a trifle unanny to look up from my book in the stillness of midnight and see the coluber's bright eyes a foot above the table, peering at the luminous shade.

At times fish and wild game was provided in superabundance, and as the refuse went out of the window near the dining table, a depot of supplies for the animals of the immediate neighborhood was established. The scolding of opossums and raccoons was noticed, and at intervals the sharp bark of a fox was heard in the night hours. My approach, however guarded, occasioned the retreat of the animals. Remembering the dazzling effect of light at night on deer, I lowered the burner of the lamp to the base, and holding it by the ring above, advanced to the window with entire success. Putting the lamp on the outside and leaning against the sill, a full view of the animals was had not more than six feet away. They seemed to think all was not right at first, but soon resumed their feeding and quarreling. A brood of opossums, a couple of raccoons, and a fox were on hand. So long as all movement was behind the light, everything was serene; but if a hand or a stick were advanced in front, panic at once seized the crowd.

This kind of observation went on through the rainy season, till the waters began to subside. One night the feeding company consisted of a huge opossum, several raccoons and a fox; when a wild cat dropped into the centre of the feeding ground. The fox sprang from the earth, barking with every jump, as it tore through the bushes in its frantic efforts to escape. The raccoons could be heard butting against the sleepers of the house in their lumbering flight; while poor puss went like a meteor through the opposite window, and did not appear at the house for several days. Opossum did not run; hearing backwards to an upright position, with wide open mouth it held its ground, with a snarling protest of intense anger. The cat walked round raising its paw, but seeing no good place to strike. The beast in maneuvering for an attack, got his tail within reach. A firm hold was obtained, and an instantaneous panic ensued.

Coach-whip was an interested spectator of the whole affair, and when it was over, I thought the snake had gone insane. It tore round the room like lightning, tied itself into innumerable knots, wove in and out of the chair rounds, and ended by rushing out of the door and taking to the bushes."

—Baltimore Yearly Meeting.—This body met at Baltimore on the 5th of Eleventh Month.

The proposition from Indiana, to hold a conference of Yearly Meetings in the general interests of the Society of Friends, was agreed to, and a delegation appointed to represent Baltimore Yearly Meeting in it.

The Committee appointed a year ago, on a proposition from Iowa to form an American Board of Friends on Foreign Missions, reported that way did not open to unite in the plan.

Two new meetings had been established during the year.

It was concluded that Women Friends should be appointed equally with men as members of the Representative Meeting.

—Unitarian Conference at Saratoga Springs.—This body met in the Methodist House, which had been rented for the occasion, for $300. The Methodist preacher at Saratoga, attended the sittings of the Conference, and has written to the Christian Advocate of New York, expressing the pain which was caused him by some of the doctrinal statements made in the sermons, especially those denying the divinity of Christ, and the Atonement; and his conviction, that an ecclesiastical organization, which rejects some of the distinctive doctrines of Christianity, ought not to be permitted to hold its conventions in a Methodist Episcopal edifice.

The Christian Advocate says, that as the Unitarians hired the building without restriction, they were justified in proceeding as they would have done in one of their own edifices. But to rent the building, so as to permit the preaching of doctrines which tend to "destroy the faith of our young people in what they have been taught to hold most dear, is evil and only evil."

—Indian School at Tunesassa.—The new school buildings, to replace those which were burnt last winter, have been finished at Tunesassa; and at a recent meeting of the Indian Committee, it was reported that the school was to be re-opened on the 22d of the present month. The number of applicants for admission is already much larger than can be accommodated. A committee was appointed to visit the school; who were also intrusted with an address to the Seneca Indians, on the subject of leasing their lands, and the use of strong drink. It is expected that they will hold councils with the Indians, and present the address to them, on various parts of the reservations.

—Concord Quarterly Meeting.—The meeting convened at Media, Delaware Co., Pa., on the 8th of the month. It was a season of spiritual refreshment and instruction to many. The nature of true faith, as a divine gift; and the indispensable necessity of the work of that Divine Power, or Grace of God, which bringeth salvation; and the spiritual character of that partaking of the flesh and blood of Christ, which He declared to be essential to the existence of spiritual life; were proclaimed to the people assembled; and the work of the Blessed Redeemer of mankind, both as to his outward and his inward manifestations, was held up to view. The quiet solemnity that prevailed was comforting.

In the business meeting report was made that the special meeting for worship, appointed three months before for the younger members especially, to convene at West Chester in the Tenth Month, had been largely attended, and had been owned by the presence of the Head of the Church.

—Atheism.—One of the signs of the times, and among evidences of the evil influence exerted by some of the foreign immigrants to this country, was the discussion at a late meeting of the new Labor party in New York. In the proposed constitution of the society was a clause acknowledging the fatherhood of God. This was objected to on the ground that many persons prominent in the movement, particularly among the Germans, did not believe in God at all. It was said the German element would never be satisfied with any such clause. No decision was arrived at.

—Indian Lands in Severalty.—Isaac T. Gibson in the Christian Worker, in commenting on the proposal to divide the reservation lands among the Indians, and make them citizens, quotes from a recent speech of a Delaware Chief, named "Johnny Cake," who said:—

"We have been broken up and moved six times, and every time we have been despoiled of our property. We thought, when we were moved across the Missouri River, and had paid for a home in the wilderness of Kansas, we were safe. But in a few years the white man wanted that country. We had good farms, built comfortable houses and big barns. We had schools for our children, and churches, where we listened to the same gospel the white man listened to. We had a great many cattle and horses. After a while the government took our land all away, except a small piece for each one of us, and made us citizens of Kansas. A few years more most of my people had no land, no stock, nothing. Then we moved to the Indian Territory and bought homes with the Cherokees. We have made farms, and built houses and barns and school houses again. But we don't know how long we can stay there. There is talk about opening that country to the whites. If that is done we Indians will be robbed of our homes again."

He also quotes from a Wyandotte Indian as follows:—

"Within the short space of ten years, after we became citizens, ninety per cent. of the land of the Wyandottes were transferred to white owners; the weaker and most ignorant were the first despoiled; many died, and the survivors gradually drifted to the Indian Territory, where they were kindly permitted to remain by the Senecas, on whose land we stopped. It would fill many volumes to narrate the sufferings, sickness and deaths that ensued. A majority came here destitute, and for years it was a hand to hand struggle for a bare existence, but the survivors have, most of them, again succeeded in acquiring comfortable and pleasant homes, only to be asked once more to encounter the same dangers that we have been nearly a quarter of a century in overcoming. Is it natural to suppose that we will listen to the song of the syren again? We are united in opposition to any scheme looking to the division of our lands to individual owners. Like a burned child, we dread the fire."

His own conviction on this question is thus given:—

"Experience has abundantly shown that no tribe of real Indians, on this continent, in the past or is at the present time, at all prepared for the duties and privileges of citizenship, and it is a crime to impose these duties upon such; and to urge it, or favor it, certainly no one can do, in the fear of God, with the knowledge of a title of the sorrow and suffering that has been wrought by it, to the Indian."

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 27, 1886.

A friend recently handed to us a letter from a Friend in Illinois, questioning the accuracy of the statement, that "George Fox felt bound to cry against all kinds of music;" and mentioning that he had "been informed that in I. T. Hopper's edition of George Fox, the record was different."

On examining the edition of George Fox's works referred to, published in 1831, in eight octavo volumes, and having I. T. Hopper's name on the title page, we find that our Illinois Friend has been misinformed; for the passage in reference to music is there; as also it is in the original edition, edited by Thomas Ellwood, and published in 1694, which also we examined.

In the page of his Journal which precedes that containing the testimony against music, George Fox says: "I was to bring people off from all the world's fellowships, prayings and singings, which stood in forms without power; that their fellowship might be in the Holy Ghost, the eternal Spirit of God; that they might pray in the Holy Ghost, sing in the Spirit, and with the grace that comes by Jesus; making melody in their hearts to the Lord."

Under the Jewish dispensation many outward rites and ceremonies were commanded to be observed, and were practised by the people. Both vocal singing and instrumental music, as of the harp and cymbal, formed part of the public worship of the Almighty; and are often referred to in the Old Testament. But our Saviour introduced a more spiritual dispensation, under which worship must be performed "in spirit and in truth." He, and his immediate disciples, although subject to all the ordinances of the Mosaic Law, turned the attention of the people from outward observances to the spiritual substance typified by them. Christ's baptism was not to be with water, but with the Holy Ghost; Paul desired that the faith of his hearers should rest on "the power of God;" and it was in unison with this, that George Fox desired that the singing of the believers at this day should be "in the spirit, and with the grace that comes by Jesus, making melody in their hearts to the Lord."

Outward melody, whether of the voice or of instruments, unaccompanied by "the grace that comes by Jesus," cannot convince of sin or produce any profitable spiritual impressions. It may quiet the nerves, soothe the feelings and produce on some minds a pleasing excitement. But this is altogether different from, and has nothing to do with the work of grace on the heart, which the true Friend longs to feel in the silent assemblies of the Lord's people. Many have been conscious at such times of that secret power, which Robert Barclay says, "touched my heart, and as I gave way unto it, I found the evil weakening in me, and the good raised up."

The attractive nature of outward melody has caused it to be largely introduced into the religious services of some denominations, as a means of drawing people to their places of worship, and of relieving the strain upon their minds of continued attention to the preaching, praying, &c., which succeed one another with few or no intervals of silence. But this motive should not operate in the meetings of Friends, where we gather professedly to wait upon God and feel after the sense of his presence in our hearts. This exercise of spirit must be hindered by everything of a vocal nature which does not proceed from the movings of the Spirit.

The contrast between the emotions produced by sweet sounds, and the influence of true religion is strikingly set forth by a distinguished Scotch clergyman, the late Thomas Chalmers, as follows:—

"You easily understand how a taste for music is one thing, and a real submission to the influence of religion is another; how the ear may be regaled by the melody of sound, and the heart may utterly refuse the proper impression of the sense that is conveyed by it; how the sons and daughters of the world may, with their every affection devoted to its perishable vanities, inhale all the delights of enthusiasm, as they sit in crowded assemblies, around the deep and solemn oratorio." "It is a very possible thing, that the moral and the rational and the active man, may have given no entrance into his bosom for any of the sentiments, and yet so overpowered may he be by the charm of vocal conveyance through which they are addressed to him that he may be made to feel with such an emotion, and to weep with such a tenderness, and to kindle with such a transport, and to glow with such an elevation, as may one and all carry upon them the semblance of sacredness."

A letter received at this office, from Morrow Co., Ohio, says; "At Alum Creek Quarterly Meeting [of the Binns' Body,] held at Greenwich, Huron County, the last of Tenth Month, about 20 of our members (several of them ministers) partook of Water Baptism. It has caused some stir in this section."

We have also received a copy of the Greenwich Enterprise, a paper published at Greenwich, of Eleventh Month 3d., which, in its account of the Quarterly Meeting, says:—"The special feature of interest was, that in two of its meetings, 20 persons (Quakers,) were baptized with water by Rev. Wm. Nicholson, a Quaker minister. Among the baptized were five Quaker ministers, viz: Eli Cogwilt and wife, Lida G. Romick, Laurette Pimm and Armit Williams. Another was the use of instrumental music, that of the organ, added much to the interest of the meetings."

Although this information is somewhat startling, yet it is the natural fruit of the action of the Yearly Meeting to which these people belong, in refusing to condemn such a departure from our ancient doctrines and testimonies, and thus leaving its members at liberty to drift with any current which may affect unsettled minds.

Several of those who have advocated or submitted to Water Baptism have been somewhat conspicuous as public preachers, and their labors have been held up to view in Journals professedly published in the interests of the Society of Friends. But what confidence can be placed in the teachings which come from such sources, or how can we believe that their ministry flows from a Divine gift, and that they are led by the unerring Spirit of Truth, when they depart so widely from those spiritual views into which we unhesitatingly believe this Spirit has led our religious Society?

Surely these events ought everywhere to confirm those who are really Friends, in the safety and wisdom of adhering to the principles and practices of our Society; and of bearing an open and decided testimony against those who depart therefrom. It would be a cause of rejoicing, if some who have given the support of their sympathy to labors not fully in accord with our principles, should be led by these developments to examine more carefully the source from which they spring; and should feel increased faith in the goodness of the Head of the Church, whose right it is to control and direct the movements of his servants in such a way as will best promote his own wise purposes. We make this remark, from the belief, that there has been no cause which has so powerfully operated to destroy the unity and health of our Society, as a ministry and other forms of religious labor, exercised in the will and wisdom of man, and without a true dependence on the Lord to give the command and to furnish the ability.

We have received from Milton Stanley, of Plainfield, Indiana, the following copy of the terms of settlement agreed upon by the parties to the lawsuit respecting the Meeting-house property at Sugar Grove, in that State.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Chester Alan Arthur, ex-President of the United States, died on the morning of the 18th instant, in New York, in the 57th year of his age. The immediate cause of his death was cerebral apoplexy, superinduced by disease of the kidneys and the heart.

The funeral took place on the 22d, the remains being taken from New York City to Albany, where they were interred in the Rural Cemetery.

Charles Francis Adams died on the 21st instant, in Boston, in the 80th year of his age. He was the third son of John Quincy Adams, and was born in Boston in 1807. He served five years in the Massachusetts Legislature, and in 1848 was the "Free Soil" candidate for Vice President of the United States, Martin Van Buren being the candidate for President. In 1858 C. F. Adams was elected to Congress, and in 1861 he was appointed by President Lincoln Minister to Great Britain. He retained that post until 1868, when he was recalled at his own request. In 1871-72, he was arbitrator for the United States in the High Joint Commission to settle the respective claims of the United States and Great Britain growing out of our civil war.

The Secretary of the Interior has advised suit to vacate 151 entries made in Humboldt County, California, under the Timber Land act. The Department, after an investigation, holds that the entries were fraudulently made in the interest of a Scotch corporation, organized for the purpose of obtaining control of all the valuable redwood timber lands in that county, and that the foreign corporation was aided in its work by a firm in California, and men employed by that firm. The Secretary, in a letter to the Attorney General, characterizes the scheme by which the patents were obtained as "an extensive conspiracy, culminating in a monstrous fraud."

General Atkins, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, has returned to Washington after a month spent in inspecting Indian agencies in the Southwest. He reports that the policy of the Indian Office, that the Indians should abandon their tribal relations and accept their lands in severalty, is daily growing in favor among the tribes in that section, especially so where the pernicious influence of designing whites is least felt.

A deposit of pure asphaltum, from 15 to 20 feet thick, has been discovered near Thistle Station, in Utah. It is said to be worth $40 a ton, and the expense of mining is only 40 cents.

The saloon injunction cases at the present term of the Court in Sioux City, Iowa, are nearly finished. One hundred and two permanent injunctions against saloon keepers have been granted, but a majority of them have gone out of business, and some have left the city since the temporary injunctions were granted. It is believed that open saloons in Sioux City will soon have become "a thing of the past."

A limited express train bound east, on the Pan Handle Railroad, was wrecked by a landslide at Jones Ferry, on the outskirts of Pittsburg, at half-past six o'clock on the morning of the 18th instant. A mass of rocks fell upon the sleeping cars, three in number, partially wrecking them. Sixteen persons were injured, eight severely, and two of the latter may not recover.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 353, which was 7 less than during the previous week, and 61 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number 201 were males and 152 females; 43 died of consumption; 22 of diseases of the heart; 22 of pneumonia; 19 of cancer; 18 of old age; 14 of convulsions; 11 of marasmus; 11 of Bright's disease; 10 of casualties, and 10 of diphtheria.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s registered, 110½; coupon, 111½; 4's, 128; 3's, 100½; currency 6's, 125½; 136.

Cotton was in limited demand by the spinners, at 9½ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum was quiet, but steady, at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Feed was quiet but firm for scarcity. Sales of 3 cars fair winter bran at $15 per ton.

Flour and Meal.—Flour was steady, but jobbers were cautious, only operating to meet present requirements. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania family, at $3.60; 375 barrels Ohio and Indiana straight, at $4.25; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.80; 125 barrels Minnesota straight, at $4.25; and 500 barrels Minnesota patent, at $4.65; a $4.80. Rye flour was steady at $3.25 per barrel for choice.

Grain.—Wheat advanced ¼ a ½ c. per bushel, No. 2 red closing at 84½ cts. bid and 84½ cts. asked. Rye was dull at 58½ cts. per bushel for No. 2 Pennsylvania. Corn was quiet but firm; No. 2 mixed closed at 45½ cts. bid, and 46 cts. asked. Oats.—No. 2 white closed at 35 cts. bid and 35½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were a fraction higher at 2¼ a 5½ cts. Sheep were active at 2¼ a 5 cts. Lambs were active at 3 a 6½ cts.

Floors were in fair demand at 5½ a 6 cts.
FOREIGN.—W. E. Gladstone has intimated to Sir William Vernon Harcourt, John Morley and others his assent to the active agitation of the question of the disestablishment of the Welsh Church. He intends early in the coming session to move that the time is ripe for a discussion of the subject.

According to M. E. Laveleye, the consumption of ardent spirits in Belgium has nearly doubled in fourteen years, and is now surpassed only by that of Denmark and Russia. Everything is done to encourage it, as if drinking alcohol was a good thing, and one needed to be fostered by the State. There is a place for the sale of drink to every forty-four inhabitants, or one to every ten families.

General Kaulbars has left Bulgaria and returned to Russia. The Nord, the Russian organ published in Brussels, says: "The departure of General Kaulbars from Bulgaria does not signify Russian retreat from the country, but simply a rupture of Russian relations with Bulgaria. Russia does not relinquish her interest or her special international rights in Bulgaria."

It is stated in Pesth that Austria, England and Germany have proposed that before a successor to Prince Alexander on the Bulgarian throne be elected, the union between Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia shall be adjusted on a permanent basis. It is said that Russia has objected to the proposal.

The village of Frimstein, in the Canton of Berne, Switzerland, has been destroyed by fire. A number of the inhabitants perished in the flames.

Indian Tea has now come to be as well known in Europe as that of China. In 1864 the average monthly consumption of tea in England amounted to nearly 8,000,000 pounds, but India furnished in that year only half a million pounds. In 1885 a wonderful change had been effected. The monthly average consumption of tea in England had increased to close upon 15,000,000 pounds, but India's share had run up to 6,000,000 pounds, while Ceylon demonstrated its new departure from coffee to tea, by exporting to England nearly half a million pounds a month.

The cholera in Japan is reported to be abating with the approach of cold weather. Since it first appeared at Tokio there has been 11,800 cases. The total number of cholera cases in Japan up to the 14th of Ninth Month, was 107,682, with a total mortality of 62,512 or 62.70 per cent.

Advices have been received in London to the effect that a vessel crowded with native laborers returning from Queensland plantations, foundered in the Pacific Ocean, and that 140 lives were lost.

Despatches from Adelaide state that fresh discoveries of gold continue to be made in South Australia, and that the rush to the new gold fields is unabated.

A new island is said to have been discovered in the Pacific by a British steamer, while bound from Sydney to Shanghai. It was named Allison Island, after the commander of the steamer. The island lies between Durour and the Echequier group, in latitude 19° 25' south, longitude 143° 26" east. It is between two and three miles long, rises from 100 to 150 feet from the sea, and is well wooded.

During the first six months of the present year, 2,456,256 pounds of silver ore were exported through Callao, Peru, being five times more than was shipped during the same period in 1885.

British Guiana is making large shipments of gold to England, and the prospects are that the shipments will rival in value the great exports of sugar, molasses and rum.

The Mexican Government has sent the Federal Inspector of Colonies and Fisheries to Lower California to report regarding the condition of the colonies established there. Much interest is shown in England concerning the settlement of the upper part of the peninsula. The Inspector will also visit all of the islands off the coast of Mexico, naval vessels having been placed at his disposal.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Eighth Mo. 9th, 1841. At our meeting to-day, had our friends Samuel Bettle and William Evans. Both were acceptably engaged in testimony, and Samuel in supplication. The dear children were tenderly spoken to by William, that such as through much weakness and fear were endeavoring to follow their dear Lord, might cleave unto Him, for such He would carry in his arms and shelter in his bosom; and "no weapon formed against them should prosper." Their hands He would teach to war and their fingers to fight; and deliverance would be worked for them, even as for the children of Israel formerly; so that all their enemies would He put to flight, and "the sea would cover them," &c., &c. The disobedient and backsliding ones were also loudly warned to return, repent, and live! Their iniquities had separated them from their God, and their sins had hid his face from them: and if there was a going on in disobedience, slighting heavenly visitations, turning their back upon them, and making light of serious things, he believed his chastening rod of displeasure would be lifted up over them: "for the loftiness of man shall be laid low," &c. He also set before them the many precious privileges they enjoyed, not only temporal but spiritual; for which an account would have to be rendered. He greatly desired that while pursuing their outward studies they might be making advances in that which is of far more importance,—their spiritual progress.

17th. Attended our Quarterly Meeting. Our dear friend Elizabeth Evans was with us. Her exercise seemed to be principally for the children and young people, encouraging them to bear the daily cross, and showing us the way it was to be borne; which was not only in our outward appearance, but in our lives and conversation. Our strong will and inclinations must be laid low, if ever a new birth unto righteousness is experienced. She believed there were those who would be raised up as from the very bottom of Jordan. Representing that such as these are the people that are wanting amongst us; not those who have been only ankle deep, but such as have experienced the waters to arise not only to the ankle, knees and loins, but which had become a broad river to swim in. "It is by many tribulations the righteous enter the kingdom," was declared by the dear Master himself. He did not flatter his followers with its being a very smooth, even and broad way; but that it was a tribulated way, yet the alone way to the kingdom. And all who wish to arrive there must travel it. She seemed to think there were those amongst us who were very desirous to get there, but were seeking for themselves an easier way, shunning the cross, &c. Dear young people, she continued, the precious standard of Truth is established, and it cannot be changed; nay, it is immutable as the rocks. Enlarging further in a very instructive manner. May her labors be blest.

22nd. Even tempted this morning in our meeting with a drowsy spirit. Near the close a little strength was mercifully vouchsafed, and I believe never more thankfully received. May the favor granted during the after part of this day, never be forgotten by me.

26th. O, what a good meeting have I been favored with! the dear Master did seem indeed in the midst. Press forward, O my soul! "Greater is he that is in you, than he that is in the world."

29th. Dear Edith Jefferis appeared in testimony in the early part of the meeting. The import of which was to encourage the needy and drooping minds of some who had been passing through great discouragement. Reminding that the needy shall not always be forgotten, &c. We were desired to remember how it was with our dear Saviour! who after fasting forty days and forty nights, was tempted of the devil. But how He was strengthened to resist the temptation! and angels were sent to minister unto Him.

Ninth Mo. 2nd. Our meeting held in silence. I thought it a good meeting. Spent the evening with Edith Jefferis at our dear friend James Emlen's. From a very little child have I enjoyed the company and conversation of good Friends.

5th. Felt condemned on retiring to bed, for indulging in too much conversation.

6th. Enabled in our meeting this morning, to put up a cry for preservation. At our afternoon meeting had our friend E. Evans with us. She is visiting meetings in our Quarterly Meeting. The meeting was passed in silence, till near the close; when our friend arose, who told us it had been a season of refreshing to her. She had taken her seat amongst us in great weariness, both of body and mind; so much so that on approaching this habitation, thought she would much rather not be seen by any mortal. But since sitting with us, she had been strengthened; and was never more fully convinced of the superintending care and protection of the Lord over this part of his vineyard; quoting: "I the Lord do keep it, I will water it every moment; lest any hurt it, I will keep it night and day."

12th. Attended, in company with our Superintendent, Nathan Sharpless, an appointed meeting at Concord for our friend Elizabeth Evans; and a favored good meeting it was. Gospel truths were declared, accompanied with an evidence of Best Help. She first spoke of the nature and effect of true silent prayer. Stating that He who declared, although "Heaven was his throne and earth his footstool, yet unto that man would He look who was of an humble and contrite spirit, and that trembleth at his word." He continues mindful of the secret, silent petitions of his children. Their prayers would be found availing as they continued to plead. She was exercised for some whom she feared were losing ground in best things. Some who in days past the Lord had greatly blessed, not only in spiritual but temporal blessings; but there was now a forgetting of that hand that had thus cared and provided for them. The world, and the things of it, had gotten uppermost; therefore there was not a fulfilling the command to love the Lord our God above all. Her exercise was great, particularly for the heads of families, that they might seek first the kingdom of God; and set before them the good effect thereof, even upon their precious children; for whom she felt a deep and earnest solicitude. Said she believed the Lord was laying his hand upon many of the children in the present day. Some whom He had already called forth, and others whom He was secretly preparing. He would have his army filled up. The halting ones, if not more faithful and willing to come forward, would be left out. It was throughout a season of favor, and one that will long be remembered by me.

12th. In our afternoon meeting I poured out my tears. Dear S. Emlen had something very good for the dear children. Spoke of her solicitude for this class, up and down, of the present day; and particularly for those of this family. Encouraging the little, timid, fearful ones—those who were desiring above all to serve their dear Lord. Had, also, a watchword for the disobedient, wayward ones: saying, remember, dear children, the eyes of the Lord are going to and fro in the earth continually. He sees us just as we are. There is nothing hid from his penetrating, all-seeing eye. Enlarging further very instructively.

16th. An exercise and travail pervaded my mind in our meeting this morning, that the right thing might live amongst us; and that we might be made to feel our responsibilities as teachers and caretakers of the dear children.

26th. Went to our meeting condemned, and humbled in the remembrance, that "for every idle word men shall speak they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment." "Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth, keep the door of my lips."

Eleventh Mo. 4th. One month has elapsed since the last note. Three weeks of which were spent with my friends at home—being our vacation. It is now over and I am returned again to duty. A large family! I feel the weight that is resting upon us. O for wisdom and understanding to go in and out rightly!

6th. At the close of our evening collection, dear Sarah Emlen, who met with us, was constrained to supplicate for us. O how fervently did she plead, first for the dear children; and then for some further advanced; some in an especial manner who were trembling before the Lord; being often ready to fear, that their lamps would go out ere their sun was set. She craved that the tears and intercessions of these might be had in remembrance before the Lord, and a little seal be given that He is not only able, but can and will replenish with the oil of his kingdom, sufficient to carry them through, if there is a keeping close unto Him. Extending further this petition in a solemn and impressive manner. For this unlooked for favor my heart overflows with gratitude.

10th. The secret breathing of my heart this morning is, for a continuance of the superintending care and protection of my Heavenly Father.

22nd. Thomas Kite has been with us, and never more acceptably; being afresh qualified and anointed to preach the glad tidings of the gospel to the rejoicing of the bowed down sorrowful souls. May I not say, my soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit doth rejoice in God our Saviour. For He hath regarded our low estates, and the hungry hath He filled with good things. He arose in our meeting, and after expressing the travail and concern he had felt for us, with desires that the Lord might open our hearts as He did Lydia's, he went on speaking of the creation of man; the innocency he was created in, and how he lost this state through disobedience; the curse that followed: "Thorns and thistles should the ground bring forth." The saying of the father of Noah concerning his son had been lively before him: "This same shall comfort us concerning our work and the toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed." The life and character of Noah; his wickedness with which he was surrounded; his preservation through all, being a "just man and perfect;" the ark he was instructed to build for the saving of his family alive, when the great flood was permitted to sweep over the earth, to destroy the wickedness that was therein; was all set before us; showing the outward type of a more glorious and spiritual day which has dawned. The ark of safety, the spiritual Noah, which the Lord's afflicted people can flee to and find safety, was sweetly opened and treated upon, to the comforting of minds which had been almost ready to fear that the billows and the waves would overwhelm. Through the intercessions that went forth near the close of our afternoon meeting, in which my spirit had travailed deeply, my heart was filled to overflowing, as well as groaning to be delivered from sin and iniquity, no matter how deep the suffering might be. If dear Thomas had known the conflicts and struggles through which I was passing, he could not have lain open my state with more clearness. Proving that there is a power above that of man, which "opens and none can shut, and shuts and none can open." How did he intercede that the strength and faith of some of us might be a little renewed this day! Saying, thou knowest, O dearest Father, who these, thy bowed down children are! Wilt thou grant a little evidence that thou art very near even in their lowest seasons, when the weeds have been wrapped about their heads, and the earth with her bars have encompassed them around! carry such through, we pray Thee. And shouldst thou see meet to make them even a spectacle to angels and to men, be with them, we pray Thee! strengthening for whatever Thou mayst call for at their hands. Our friend extended further this petition in a most solemn and fervent manner, accompanied with an heart-consoling evidence, that the Lord's ear was opened to hear the pleadings on behalf of some of us who are not able to plead for ourselves but with sighs and tears. May all praise be ascribed unto Him who alone remains worthy, not only now but henceforth and forevermore.

Niagara Falls.

The ride of a quarter of a mile over the Suspension Bridge, which was built in 1872, and stands 190 feet above the water, takes us to the Canada side, from which the best views of the Falls are to be obtained. But first we must go down the river, and visit the Whirlpool Rapids and the Whirlpool. The drive is an interesting one, along a high cliff, with very pretty falls from the opposite bank, caused by the waste water from extensive flour and other mills, and the busy waters of the river below us sound continually upon the ear, the channel for them becoming more and more narrow.

The Whirlpool scarcely equals one's expectation, and yet, occasionally the water assumes a funnel-like form, and sucks in all floating objects near it, sometimes retaining them in rapid motion for many weeks. It is caused by the direct course of the river being changed, a great stratum of rock forming the obstruction; and after the water has been whirled in this great circular basin, the river flows on at a right angle to the old channel.

The Whirlpool Rapids are beyond description, and were visited twice with unabated interest.

The immense volume of water is here confined in a narrow defile, and it dashes and surges past until the brain almost whirls with it, while the eye is fascinated by the play of the ceaseless waves. Its depth is estimated to be from two to three hundred feet, and it leaps at times quite twenty feet high, white with foam, and broken into spray; and we wondered not that "the Indian of the wood," and many who have stood there "since his day," have felt the infinite power of a Creator so impressed upon their minds, as to bend "before the God of all, to worship and adore." Thus we felt as we sat in the little park beside these restless floods, scarcely able to tear ourselves away.

Looking up the river, we had a view of the three bridges which now span it. Nearest to us was the old railway suspension bridge, with trains crossing above, while the carriage-way and foot-path were underneath. Beyond it and quite near, is the cantilever bridge, built a few years ago by the Michigan Central Railway Co., and formed of iron trestle-work, 859 feet from bluff to bluff. It is said to be so firm that the heaviest freight trains can cross without causing it to vibrate. While nearly two miles above is the suspension bridge which we had crossed on our way to the Queen's dominions.

Leaving the Whirlpool Rapids, we drove through Suspension Bridge Village, in the province of Ontario, and approached the Falls near the point where Table Rock once stood. Here we have the best view of the Canada Falls; and a rainbow with a perfect arch, brilliant in color from end to end, was spanning the waters, one foot resting in the bend of the Falls, the other reaching the Canadian shore. The American Falls and Goat Island are also in full view, the whole circuit being comprehended in a glance of the eye, but increasing in interest continually. The spray was dense and hid from our view the waters as they dashed on the rocks below, but the deep green tint as they approached and were hurled down the yawning chasm, was very striking, the color remaining so as to appear below the brow of the precipice. It rushes over with such force as to be thrown almost fifty feet from the foot of the cliff. Behind this sheet of water persons often pass, dressed in oil-cloth suits; but it is said "The spray is so blinding, the din so deafening, and the current of air so strong, that it requires a tolerably calm nerve and firm foot," and one, at least, of our party declined the trip. Scarcely a vestige remains of Table Rock, the larger portion of it having fallen in 1863—and the wearing away goes on continually though gradually.

The Clark Hill Islands have been thrown open to the public but a short time, perhaps a year. We drove over the unique and substantial bridges, connecting them with the mainland on each other, passing beside and enjoying a fine view of the rapids above the Falls, the river here having a width of from two to three miles. The islands are wooded, and rapid currents run among and around them, and under the bridges over which we passed. There is a Burning Spring near the edge of the river, the waters of which were said to be highly charged with sulphuretted hydrogen gas, and to take fire when a light was applied, burning with a pale bluish flame. This is not open to visitors, but a glass of water equaling those from Saratoga springs for its sulphurous taste, was handed one of our party.

Our accommodating driver suggested a ride back over the hills, and we had the beautiful sunset light thrown upon the river, the rapids and the falls, from a high situation, a short distance above where the trains of the Michigan Central and Great Western Railways pause a few minutes to allow their passengers a sight of this great natural wonder. The wooded islands over which we had passed lay below us, and as the deepening shadows grew around us, we recrossed the Suspension Bridge, having thoroughly appreciated the majesty and beauty of Niagara and its surroundings.

Another ride of interest was to a height above Lewiston, where we hoped for a sight of Lake Ontario. On our way thither, which was pretty much through the outskirts of the town of Niagara, we stopped at a place called the Devil's Hole. The reason for the use of such a name we cannot imagine, only that high and precipitous walls of rock are risen in some places, opening dark and deep recesses. The river was in view, placidly flowing at our feet, probably a half mile below the Whirlpool. There was much that a geologist would enjoy in the rock formations here, but we leave a description to more experienced minds.

The haze was so great that the waters of Lake Ontario could not be seen, but through seven miles away, the break in the hills where the Niagara enters it was visible, and the masts of vessels were clearly discerned pursuing an onward course, their motion proving their identity.

Lewiston was way below us, and probably a half mile distant. It is at the head of steam-boat navigation on the Niagara River, and is connected with Queenstown on the Canada side by a suspension bridge. We saw a steam-boat leave her wharf and pursue her way towards Lake Ontario, her black smoke tracing her course the more readily; and learned that daily or oftener during the summer months trips are made to and from points on the Lake, and to Montreal on the St. Lawrence, the latter occupying about twenty-seven hours. Brock's Monument was in sight from our position, but we did not visit it, recalling however, the incidents connected with its erection.

Many points of interest have necessarily been passed over in this little sketch, unexpectedly prolonged, and it may be concluded with the hope that all visitors to Niagara may enjoy the days spent there, as did the writer.

MINISTRY.

Many of the readers of these articles are familiar with the name of James Simpson, an eminent minister of a past generation, who resided a few miles north of Philadelphia. The nervousness and eccentricity of his temperament, are kept in remembrance by many amusing anecdotes, which are still narrated in social gatherings; but notwithstanding these weaknesses, he was often greatly favored with Divine help in his labors, to the comfort and refreshment of his friends. Joseph Kite says of him, in the Arm Chair—

"Filled by his Master, wondrously he shone:
The emptied vessel scarce could stand alone."

A few months before his decease, he delivered a sermon at Frankford, which was somewhat peculiar in its style, and yet contained much instruction. The following account of it has been preserved:

"What I am now going to relate is but a simple story, and it is probable some of you may have heard me tell it before, but it has taken such possession of my mind, that I thought I would just drop it for your consideration. When I was a young man, there lived in our neighborhood a Presbyterian, who was universally reported to be a very liberal man, and uncommonly upright in his dealings. When he had any of the produce of his farm to dispose of, he made it an invariable rule to give good measure, overgood, rather more than could be required of him. One of his friends, observing his frequently doing so, questioned him why he did it, told him he gave too much, and said it could not be to his own advantage. Now, my friends, mark the answer of this Presbyterian—'God Almighty has permitted me but one journey through the world; and when gone, I cannot return to rectify mistakes.' Think of this, friends! 'But one journey through the world;' the hours that are past are gone forever, and the actions of those hours can never be recalled. I do not throw it out as a charge, or mean to imply that any of you are dishonest; but the words of this good Presbyterian have often impressed my mind, and I think in an instructive manner. 'But one journey;' we are allowed but one journey through the world; therefore let none of us say, 'My tongue is my own, I'll talk what I please. My time is my own, I'll go where I please; I can go to meetings, or if the world calls me, I'll stay at home, its all my own.' Now, this won't do, Friends, it is as impossible for us to live as we list, and then come here to worship, as it is for a lamp to burn without oil. It is utterly impossible. And I was thinking what a droll composition man is. He is a compound of bank-notes, dollars, cents and newspapers; and, bringing as it were the world on his back, he comes here to perform worship, or at least would have it appear so. Now, friends, I just drop it before we part for your consideration. Let each one try himself, and see how it is with his own soul."

Like other ministers of the Gospel, he felt his own weakness, when the Master's power was withdrawn; but he was less able than some others to hide the sackcloth underneath, and conceal his poverty of spirit. He came to Philadelphia on one occasion, with a minute from his friends at home liberating him to visit the families of Friends. Sarah Harrison, who was under a like concern, united with him in the labor, and Friends of the city appointed David Bacon, an experienced elder, to accompany them. They had gone through all except one day's visit, in which was the family of Governor Dickinson, whose wife and daughters were members. This family they were to commence with the next day. During the night, James became depressed in spirit, as was not unusual with him, and thought that he could not go to the Governor's house. So he determined to go home in the morning, and leave the other friends to perform that visit alone. Thinking, however, it would be dishonorable not to let David Bacon know his purpose, he went to his house, with his horse saddled, and the baggage on. After fastening his horse, he went in and told David he had come to bid him farewell. "Farewell!" said David, "why, where is thee going?" "Home." "Thee must not go, why where is thy horse?" "It is at the door," said James. David then told the man to take the horse back to the stable, and have it taken care of. He then took James with him to Sarah Harrison; and she being ready, the whole party immediately proceeded to Governor Dickinson's house. Just before reaching it, James clasped his hands together, earnestly exclaiming, "If I live through this day, I shall live forever." When they entered the house, the Governor was not present, and James sitting down, threw his hat under his chair, and placed his head between his knees. After some time, the Governor quietly entered, and pretty soon James began slowly to raise his head, and then commenced a discourse which, for religious weight and instruction, Sarah Harrison thought she had never heard excelled.

While speaking of James Simpson, the following circumstance may be introduced, which was related by James after his return from a religious visit in New England. It occurred whilst he was travelling in Rhode Island.

"I was with a young doctor, whom I took to be a deist. I asked him if he was not a deist, and he frankly acknowledged that he was. I then told him, that I supposed it was of no use to talk with him about the Scriptures, for he did not believe in them. His answer was, 'No sir, I do not.' 'Well,' replied I, 'as it is reason thou buildest upon, render me a reason for thy disbelief.' That he could readily do; 'for,' said he, 'there are so many foolish, nonsensical passages in them, that it is beneath a man of good understanding to believe them.' I then requested him to single out one of those foolish passages; and the one he fixed on, was the woman being cured of a grievous disease by touching the hem of our Saviour's garment, which he considered foolish nonsense. I then told him, that I supposed he was well acquainted with the power of electricity. 'Yes,' he said, he was. 'Well,' said I, 'supposing thou had never seen or heard tell of it, and a stranger as I am should come from another country, and tell thee that he could fill thee so full of fire, that another touching thy garment, the fire would fly out of thee into him; wouldst thou not think it a foolish tale, that was not worth thy notice?' After some pause, he said he thought he should. I then replied, 'If a man can be filled so full of fire, that another touching his garment, the fire will go into him, as this we know to be the case, why not admit the Saviour of the world to be so filled with virtue, that another touching his garment, virtue should go out of Him into them?'—at which he sat a considerable time silent. Finding he was in a better state to hear me, I asked him if he had never been sitting in his room, thinking little or nothing, not nothing, because thoughts are never quite still; and all at once something alarms thee, perhaps it is a gun shot off out yonder, and so soon as that sound strikes thy ear, thy eye is turned to see, and when thy eye discovers it, thy nerves and members are at command to start up and go! now, as thou art a physician and pretends to understand the human frame, render me a reason (as it is reason thou buildest upon) of this intelligence from the ear to the eye, and so on to thy other faculties. His answer was, 'O, sir, that is out of my reach;' and finding him in a better state to hear than to talk, I went on from one thing to another, till I beat him as effectually out of his deism, I believe, as ever a man was beaten out of anything; and I thought he loved me as well as ever he loved any man, for he followed me several hundred miles, assisting me in appointing meetings where there were no Friends." Library of Friends of Philadelphia.

In his Will, dated the 19th of Second Month, 1741, Thomas Chalkley made a bequest of his books to Friends of Philadelphia, as appears by the following extract:—

"Having spent most of my days and strength in the work and service of the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, and having been joined as a member of the Monthly Meeting of Philadelphia for above these forty years, to them, as a token of my love, I give my small library of books."

It appears there were a few doctrinal tracts and other religious treatises, already in the possession of the meeting; and that Thomas Chalkley desired "to render the collection more extensively useful by letting out the books to Friends and other sober persons, gratis."

A transcript from the Will was presented to the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, held the 30th of Second Month, 1742, and Robert Jordan, a member and eminent minister of that meeting, offering his services as Librarian, the books, being 111 in number, were delivered into his possession, with a catalogue of their titles. Soon after this, Robert Jordan deceased, and Anthony Benezet being requested by the Monthly Meeting to take charge of the Library, it was accordingly removed to his house; where it continued to be kept until the erection of the meeting-house, at the corner of Fourth and Chestnut Streets.

The small collection left by Thomas Chalkley, was gradually increased by purchases and the donations of benevolent individuals, among whom were Dr. John Fothergill, Peter Collinson, David Barclay, of London, grandson of the Apologist, and James Bright of this city. Little attention, however, was given to it, and the books having been loaned without a regular record of the persons who borrowed them, many volumes were irrecoverably lost.

In the year 1765, the attention of the Monthly Meeting seems to have been awakened to the importance of preserving a collection of the writings of early Friends, and other suitable books, for the use of its members; and a committee was appointed to devise some method of rendering the Library more useful; to collect the books which had been lent out; to purchase others, and report the names of suitable Friends to have the charge of them. This committee recovered some of the missing volumes, repaired those which were injured, and made a new catalogue of the whole. John Todd, then a teacher under "the Overseers of the Public School founded by Charter in the Town and County of Philadelphia," was engaged as the Librarian. He entered upon his duties in the fall of 1765, and the following minute of the Monthly Meeting, made the 30th of Tenth Month, 1766, shows the moderate views of Friends at that time, as well as the value of money: "John Todd produced his account for his attendance on the Library for one year, and sundry expenses paid on that service, amounting to £2 8s. 6d., ($6.47) and credits for 10 shillings, ($1.33) received from such borrowers as did not return the books borrowed in the time limited by the rules. The Treasurer is desired to pay the balance, £1 18s. 6d., ($5.14) and John Todd is continued to the care and oversight of the Library, and to deliver out books at such times as may be convenient to the borrowers and himself."

The first attempt at anything like a system for conducting the Library, appears to have been made at this time. It may be of interest to refer to the rules then adopted respecting the loan of books. They are as follows:—

"1st. The Librarian to give attendance on Seventh-day of every week, in the afternoon, from 4 to 6 o'clock, in order to lend out and receive the books; and shall keep a book, columnwise, in which shall be noted the title of the book, the name of the borrower, the time for which the book is lent, the sum for which the note was given, the day when the book shall be returned, and the forfeitures arising from all defaults.

"2d. Each borrower shall give a promissory note to the Librarian, for the sum set in the written catalogue against the book he borrows; conditioned for returning the same book within the time mentioned in the said catalogue; at the expiration of which time, if the borrower inclines to keep the book longer, he must renew his note.

"3d. Every borrower who keeps a book beyond the time limited in his note, may return it on any of the four next succeeding attendance days, paying sixpence for every week's neglect; which not being done, the note to be deemed forfeited.

"4th. If a borrower, who has forfeited his note, shall afterwards return the book undefaced, the sum mentioned in his note shall be remitted; he paying the weekly fine.

"5th. Books returned are to be delivered into the hands of the Librarian, to be examined whether damaged or not.

"6th. No borrower, from whom any penalty or forfeiture is due, or who hath damaged any book, shall be permitted to borrow another book until satisfaction is made.

"7th. The Librarian is authorized and required to apply for, and collect the forfeitures, as often as they may happen.

"8th. That the money arising from the forfeitures shall be applied to purchasing such books, to be added to the Library, as the Monthly Meeting may direct."

The improvement which took place in the Library at the time alluded to, although considerable, still left it in a very imperfect state. The number of books was small, and those principally relating to the history and doctrines of the Society of Friends. While such as were of a general character, were very few. A printed catalogue is in the Library, without date, which was probably issued at this time. It gives the titles of 366 books.

John Pemberton, who appears to have taken a warm interest in the improvement of the Library, and was actively engaged in its promotion, bequeathed a large number of books to some of them of great value—as appears by the following extract from his Will, dated 1st of Fourth Month, 1794: "I give and bequeath unto my aforesaid friends, John Field and William Wilson, and the survivor of them, after the decease of my wife, one half of my library of books, in trust, for the use and benefit, and perusal of Friends of the three Monthly Meetings in this city; and to be placed in the Library for that purpose; wishing the beloved youth were more willing to read and to become acquainted with the trials, sufferings, and religious experience of our worthy ancestors."

James Pemberton, a brother of John Pemberton, who died in the year 1809, made a bequest in money, which was expended in suitable works for the Library.

The meeting-house at the corner of Fourth and Arch streets (Arch Street Meeting-house) was erected in the year 1804. In 1809, the books were removed from Fourth and Chestnut, to a room in the new building, appropriated for the purpose. In 1813 the second catalogue that I have been able to trace, was printed. At this date the number of books, "including a considerable number of scarce pamphlets bound up together," is stated to have been about one thousand volumes. In 1817, the books were placed under care of a committee consisting of one Friend from each Monthly Meeting in the city.

For "The Friend."

ON THE DEATH OF MARTHA A. WILSON.

The years roll on; and still the spring
And summer's brighter span,
And autumn's fuller glory comes—
And death to man!

So now—while nature's ripened store
Full many a garner fills,
And mellow golden sunlight floods
The tinted hills—

One, who through life's bright spring time passed,
Then donned its summer bloom,
And lived through years of richer grace,
Lies in the tomb.

Not to the clay, that slumbers there
In the fair and fragile mould,
Point we the living, who again
Would her behold;

But, to the tender, guiding ray
Sent from the fount above,
That will perfect life's richest gifts
Of hope and love:

Of hope, that to the Christian life
An anchor sure doth prove;
And which, through faith, doth save the soul
To live above:

Of love, that like the widow's mite,
Gift of a perfect heart,
Is better far than greater sums—
Of wealth a part.

If thou but yield thine all to Him
Who can those fountains open,
Fuller will grow the tide of love;
Brighter thy hope.

And thou, like her whom many loved,
And whom full many mourn,
May yet receive a crown; by such
In meekness worn.

And, like her own, thy life may grow
As spotless and as fair;
If thy heart open to that ray,
And live in prayer.

Prayer sent upon the tide of love
Will ope the gates of heaven;
And blessings bring upon the head
Of the forgiven.

'Tis written, Ask and ye shall have,
Knock, and doors open wide;
And the obedient shall drink
The living tide.

Tho' clouds hang darkly while our hearts
To earthly treasures cling,
Prayer yet may bring to praise, and faith
Its full fruition bring.

WITCH-HAZEL.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

The summer warmth has left the sky,
The summer songs have died away;
And, withered in the footpaths, lie
The fallen leaves but yesterday
With ruby and with topaz gay.

The grass is brown on the hills;
No pale, belated flowers recall
The astral fringes of the rills,
And drearily the dead vines fall,
Frost-blacked, from the roadside wall.

Yet, through the gray and sombre wood,
Against the dusk of fir and pine,
Last of their floral sisterhood,
The hazel's yellow blossoms shine,
The tawny gold of Afric's mine!

Small beauty hath my unsung flower,
For spring to own or summer hail;
But, in the season's saddest hour,
To skies that weep and winds that wail
Its glad surprisals never fail.

What Makes the Friend?

In a former paper the foundation principle of the Friend was set forth, and there would I gladly have the subject, if I could feel by so doing I had said all I ought to say as to what makes the Friend. The foundation being laid on solid ground, the building reared thereon will be also of goodly proportions.

The mind that is awakened to a sense of God and his indwelling power, is led on by obedience from knowledge to knowledge, and from strength to strength.

There are conditions attached to every Divine law, which conditions must be obeyed if we are to come into possession in fulness of the blessings held in store in the Divine Hand for those who are willing to follow as the Master leads in the path of regeneration and renewed life.

Let me here, in the first place, bear my testimony to the truth, as to the coming of our Saviour in the flesh, his death and resurrection; these are the procuring cause of man's redemption. Through the rent veil of his flesh, it has pleased the Father to open the door of hope for our restoration to an estate lost through the fall. He ascended up on high, He led captivity captive, He received gifts for men, that the Lord God might dwell among them, even the rebellious. But it is the receiving of this, the gift of God for man's redemption into the heart, and experiencing its purifying power, that doth make meet for the Lord God to dwell with those who, by nature and wicked works, were the rebellious ones. And they who are so positioned as to be deprived of the precious knowledge contained in the Scriptures of truth of our Saviour's coming and work upon earth; but who, nevertheless, being visited by that light which doth enlighten all that come into the world, and bowing in obedience and subjection thereunto, do thereby acknowledge the saving power of Christ, these are thereby made partakers of the benefits of Christ's redemption, being partakers of his redeeming power. It is no mere assent of the understanding that doth save, but the receiving and obeying the quickening power of the Lord. Is it not thus, that many shall come from the east and from the west and sit down in the kingdom with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; while those who by privilege, opportunity and blessing have been accounted, and might have been, children, yet through disobedience and neglect of their plainest duty,—reverence and obedience to God their Saviour,—are cast out?

God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation they who fear Him and work righteousness are accepted by Him; for it is such that are found walking in the ways of righteousness through his own righteous principle or seed of life implanted in their souls. They who are thus quickened are drawn, in retirement of mind, to wait upon God to know an increase in them of that which is not at their command; but it is his alone to give, whose right it is to rule and reign in every heart.

Thus it is that a growth is known, and a quickened sense given, even by attention to the inspeaking voice in the soul; so that, in the stillness and in the quietness of the fleshly mind, is known more and more of that life which is hid with Christ in God.

We are called into this, we profess to walk in it; but O, how little, it is to be feared, do many know of the good things of the kingdom.

We are called to the table of the Lord, to be fed by his hand day by day, by no symbol or beggarly element, into which some even now would seek to draw us, but to be partakers of the spiritual body and blood of Christ; which is no figure, but a new nature, the old being crucified with Christ.

We are called to the baptism of Christ, that which alone saves; no elementary water, but the one Spirit which alone can wash away the evil nature in thought, in word, and in deed.

We are called to the gentleness of Christ, to be partakers of his lamb-like nature, not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing. What can enable us to do this but the one baptism into the one Spirit of Father, Son and Holy Ghost.

We are called to be truthful and upright in all our ways and dealings. Who can make us such, but Him who hath all power in Heaven and upon earth.

We are called to a blameless, self-denying walk before men. Ah! who is sufficient for these things, if we be not clothed by Him who can cleanse all our ways, and can make of us temples unto God and his Spirit. And what more need I say? Is there aught that is holy, and pure, chaste and good, that in the Lord's goodness we have not been invited unto? If thus it is, what doth hinder the whole-hearted surrender to be even in his hand what he would have us to be? I fear there is but one thing that doth un-make the Friend, a worldly spirit; even as there is but one thing that doth make the Friend, an unworldly spirit; or in other words, the Spirit of Christ.

We are called to the experience of a pure and holy ministry by the Spirit of the Lord; that which no study can procure, and no money buy, the unction Divine. But how little comparatively is this known, there is but one thing can lead into it, and but one can keep therein—a close walk with God. O, how much have we as a people in this respect to answer for the unfed and the untaught, because we have been found about our own, instead of our Master's business. Our hands may be busily engaged in our lawful concerns, and still we may converse with God and He with us. And in the rough business of life, our spirit may be polished by the Master for his service in a way no other training could do. But we must abide with Him and not be drawn off at every turn by every trifle.

We are called to be a praying, waiting, watching people for the Master's service; but if we be so filled with our own business that we cannot see, and so deaf to all but our own concerns that we cannot hear, need we wonder that barrenness and unproductiveness is our own lot and portion. And what will we do in the end, when these shall all recede from our grasp?

Are our concerns such as that we can present them one and all before the Lord, and say, "take them, Lord, I hold all in trust for thee, and I am thine, and thou Lord art my all in all." If we cannot do this there is something wrong, something that unmakes us as Friends, robs us of our true dignity as servants and hand-maidens of Jehovah.

O, there is a great responsibility resting upon those who bear the name of Friend. Friends of Jesus is a title of honorable distinction, but if we possess but the name without the nature, what doth it avail us?

Brethren and sisters, let us see to it; for time is short, but eternity is long; and if we trifle with our privileges, the Lord may remove our candlestick out of its place; and then who shall replace it?

There is but one thing can make the name of Friend honorable in the earth, and that is walking by the Apostle's rule—in the Spirit—then shall we not fulfil the lusts of the flesh. Hugh Turford, in his "Grounds of a Holy Life," says, "It was this rule of old that made saints of sinners, with very little preaching." The same rule will do so now, may we therefore walk by it.

CHARLES W. THOMSON.

West Philadelphia, Eleventh Mo. 18th, 1886.

The Faith of Little Hans.—The following touching story, told by a writer in Harper's Young People, is about a letter found by one of the clerks, a young German girl, in the Dead-Letter Office at Washington:

The young clerk had worked her way down through a large heap, and was beginning to think of lunch, when she came upon a peculiar little envelope addressed in German to "Jesus in Heaven;" she tore it open hastily, and found a soiled sheet written all over in a child's cramped hand. Some of the words seemed blurred with tears, and she could scarcely make them out.

Here is the translation:

Dear Jesus:—I have prayed so hard to You, but I guess You can't hear me so far off, so I am going to write You a letter. We came over a big ocean when it was summer time. My mamma has been sick all the time. Can't You send her something to make her well? And, dear Jesus, please send my papa some work to do, so he can buy us some warm clothes and something to eat, and please do it quick, for we are cold and hungry.

Nobody knows I am writing to You. I thought You might send us something for a surprise.

HANS BRAHM.

P. S.—My hands are so cold I can't write very well.

Katrina's eyes were filled with tears as she came to the end. She sat for some time with the letter in her hand; as she folded it, she resolved to do something to make the little boy happy. She said, "Whatever his parents may be, this beautiful child-faith must not be destroyed." That evening, after dinner, she told several of her friends about the matter, and they were eager to help her make up a box.

It was ready in a few days. There were some flannels for the mother and little Hans, and comfortable clothes for the father. At the very top lay a crisp ten-dollar bill. As soon as the box left the house, Katrina wrote a letter to Hans. She told him that Jesus had sent one of his servants on earth to help him, and that a nice box was on its way out West.

Not long after there came a letter of warm thanks from the father. He explained how they had been in the country but a few months, and had not yet found work.

As the weeks went by, another and another letter came, telling of fairer prospects and brighter days. One thing they assured Katrina—"that they could never forget her kind letter and generous help in their time of saddest need."

For "The Friend."

Now that the winter evenings are at hand, would it not be well for Friends to see how far they stand responsible in training their children in that profitable reading, which in after years, if not now, would come home to them with strong convictions.

I have sometimes felt, that if heads of families would more read the approved writings of Friends in their families collectively, more good would result to the rising generation. There is a great responsibility resting upon us in this respect, in keeping alive our various doctrines and testimonies.

There is a danger of settling down into a lukewarmness, a form of easiness, which the adversary is ever willing to encourage, and little by little let go that good which, if some encouragement had been given, might have produced an hundred fold. Above all I would encourage a more frequent reading of the Holy Scriptures, which are able to make wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus. They are profitable for reproof, correction and instruction, that the man of God may be thoroughly furnished unto every good word and work. I do believe, if more concern was felt and practised in this respect, we as a Society would grow stronger and stronger, and there would be valiant ones raised up to bear testimony to the ever blessed truth as it is in Jesus; and there would be Councillors as at the first and Judges as at the beginning, and more of us would be brought into the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God unto a perfect man; unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. As we are faithful in this concern, best help will be afforded, and we shall reap the reward by seeing our dear ones grow up in the blessed truth, and walk in the footsteps of the flock of Christ.

Upper Springfield, Ohio.

What Two Blind Men Could'n See.—There was a friend of mine preaching on Glasgow-Green a few years ago, when some one from the crowd called out, "May I speak?" After getting permission he pushed his way through the crowd, until he was standing on the platform beside my friend.

"Friends," he exclaimed, "I do not believe what this man has been talking about. I do not believe in a hell, I do not believe in a judgment, I do not believe in a God, for I never saw any of them."

He continued talking in this way for a while, when another voice was heard from the crowd, "May I speak?" The infidel sat down, and the next man began:

"Friends, you say there is a river running not far from this place, the river Clyde. There is no such thing; it is not true. You tell me that there are grass and trees growing around me where I now stand; there is no such thing; that also is untrue. You tell me that there are a great many people standing here. Again I say, that is not true; there is no person standing here save myself. I suppose you wonder what I am talking about; but, friends, I was born blind. I never have seen one of you, and while I talk, it only shows that I am blind, or I would not say such things. And you," he said, turning to the infidel, "the more you talk, the more it exposes your own ignorance, because you are spiritually blind, and cannot see."—R. B. Stewart.

For "The Friend."

Let your Lights Shine.

Our meetings for worship are, perhaps, generally composed of a mixed multitude. Some desiring to serve and worship God, and others not. Some having a portion of the true light, others not. But I have noticed that some of our speakers, when addressing such a congregation, use language that our Saviour meant should apply merely to his disciples, who, He said, were the salt of the earth, the light of the world, and compared them to a city set on a hill, that could not be hid. So He said to them, "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." But some seem to measure the worth of their devotions, and the amount of life and light in a meeting, by the amount of noise and activity; and the more they outstrip others in that, the more they are put forward, and the more they are urged to let their lights shine, that others may see their good works. And all this, without seeming to raise a doubt whether their own works are good; or whether they are evil, by deceiving the people, in making them think it is a Divine light that they are speaking from, when it is merely human.

We must have oil in our own vessels, and our lamps trimmed and burning, before we can do much good in lighting others to the marriage supper of the Lamb. What good will oil in our vessels do, if our lamps are not trimmed and burning? The parable of the ten virgins is full of instruction. They all had lamps, but the foolish had let their lights go out; so they could not shine on others. For we are told that, "the light of the wicked shall be put out, and the spark of his fire shall not shine." The virgins all went forth to meet the bridegroom; but the foolish showed their folly by neglecting to add to their supply and take it with them; for they all had oil when they started, or how could their lamps have gone out unless they had been burning? But they showed their folly still more by depending on their fellow-travellers to give it to them instead of going to the living fountain and buying for themselves; not seeming to remember, that everything valuable costs something.

And if we should have to give, in exchange for the heavenly oil or light, many things which we hold to be more dear than natural life, would it not be far better to make the sacrifice, rather than to remain in darkness and have the door of heaven shut against us?

But we are told that they all slumbered and slept, the wise as well as the foolish; showing us that there is a rest for the people of God, even this side the grave. The wise virgins, no doubt, had fought the good fight, and kept the faith, and were waiting for the crown, or for the coming of the bridegroom, with their lights shining, so resting in peaceful confidence. But there is no true rest for the wicked. Yet I with sorrow fear, that multiplied thousands are sleeping on the downy beds of indolence and unconcern; vainly hoping, like the foolish virgins, that the door of heaven will be opened to them.

Some of them seem to think that they have been casting out devils in Christ's name, and doing many wonderful works. But Christ says, "Without me, ye can do nothing." Now what does "without me" signify, if it does not mean without his shining light to guide us? Although the light shines in the dark hearts of all, yet the darkness will never comprehend it, unless we believe enough in it to open our eyes and see it; for it is in his light that we see light; but if the darkness that is in us is so great that we cannot see the light which we have, neither comprehend it, how can we become instrumental in letting our lights shine upon others, when it is hid from our own eyes? Or how can we let others see our good works, if our works are not good, but merely an imitation of the good works of others? Oh, consistency! thou art a jewel, which is spoken of by many, but thou understood and practised by a few. So while we have the light, we must believe in the light and follow it, or we shall never become the children of light, and consequently, can never let our lights so shine that others may see our good works; because they are not there, and because what little light we have may be hid under a bushel, or under a measure of worldly things, or under a bed of ease, on which I fear many are sleeping, and dreaming that they are in the light, while they are yet in the darkness of night.

If Christ is the light and life of men, then the things which belong to his kingdom and to our peace are only seen and understood by his light and life in his children, while they are hid from the wise and prudent of this world. The light of reason will do for earthly things, but it takes the light of inspiration to enable us to see heavenly things.

And we are told that "There is a spirit in man [including all mankind], and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding." And without an inspiration of light, and life, and knowledge from the Almighty, what are we above the beasts that perish? They, in one sense, have a spirit, but no immortal part, and hence no need of an understanding of heavenly or immortal things. But there is also in man a spirit or soul which is of far more value than the mere animal spirit, because it is immortal. And unless this spirit can get an understanding from the Almighty in relation to eternal things, where is he to get it? For "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." But the natural man may know the things of man that belong to this world, by the spirit of man that is in him; but the things of God which belong to the invisible world, he can only know as they are revealed to him by the invisible Spirit or Word of God. And the Spirit searcheth all things, yea the deep things of God.

There are other lights besides the great and universal light, which are designed to rule only in the things of this world, but which should never be substituted, especially in our meetings for worship, for the true light, nor made objects of adoration; for while we are depending on, and preferring the "lesser lights," which are only designed to rule in the darkness of this world, we shall never have the true or "greater light," and so cannot let it shine on others; though we may be exhorted to do so by the uninspired activity of man. We cannot show others the way to the heavenly kingdom only as we have experimentally known it and followed it ourselves. We must receive by living faith the light of Christ as it shines in our hearts, before we can witness our sins to be forgiven and washed away in his blood, for He does not save us by standing at the door and knocking for an entrance; but it is as we hear his voice, and open the door of the heart and let Him in as a purifier and a Redeemer. Then it is that He breaks down the middle wall of partition that separates us from God; and then it is that our lights will so shine before men that others may see our good works and glorify our Father which is in heaven. Natural History, Science, &c.

Effects of Drought on Health.—Life is best sustained amid alternations of dryness and moisture. It is common to look on damp or rainy days as those of greatest exposure as to health. But the dry, arid, dusty atmosphere is in many respects more trying. On our pleasant days we are less on guard against the unseen and insidious forces of disease. We therefore believe that the attention of most persons, and especially of invalids, needs to be drawn to the perils of very dry weather both as they relate to the person, the ground, the water supply and the effect of the dry air on conditions of health.

Dust, is much more a factor in disease than is generally supposed. It is true that Nature has made special provision for the protection of the lungs from dust. The nose, with its tortuous tubes, and the wind-pipe, with its cilia, does much to sieve out the dust for those who will keep their mouths shut. But, when the air is laden with dust, there are various particles of an animal, vegetable or mineral nature, that mingle with it and so often irritate the lungs. We have an illustration of this in the fact that those who continuously labor in dusty occupations generally show in their lungs the unmistakable evidences of deposit, and often during life bronchial or other lung disturbance results.

It has long been observed that lowness of wells and springs has seemed to have some relation to the prevalence of disease. When water is thus low, the well, which is a horizontal drain, receives its supply from deeper or more distant side sources. The result is that it may draw to it water which rests on beds of decaying organic material which before were beyond the reach of the well. Or it may thus uncover deposits which were kept from too high a temperature by being covered with a depth of water. The relation of all wells not over thirty feet in depth to their surroundings is greatly modified by seasons of drought. Indeed wells generally classified as deep wells, if the soils are porous, or if there are peculiar drifts or strata, are not infrequently affected. Pettkofer in Munich, and Baker and others in our country, have especially drawn attention to the relation of the height of ground-water to the prevalence of typhoid-fever. We are to remember that a wonderful part of the chemistry of nature is constantly being carried on in the ground. While this is in the main conservative of health, if we lead the surface with organic matter, and seek to draw from it our water supply, we may run risks, and when periods of drought come, the area of demand is so widened that the same well which before yielded only good water may now yield that which is unfit to drink. The source of supply and sometimes the quality has been altered.—From The Independent.

Compressed Air.—A company in Paris has introduced a system of distributing compressed air throughout that city. Among the many uses which may be made of compressed air may be mentioned the running of light machinery, producing ventilation, and reducing the temperature. By introducing the air into burning gas a remarkably brilliant light is obtained.

Suffocation from an Explosion of Gunpowder.—On the 25th of Ninth Month, a remarkable accident, involving the loss of eight lives, occurred at a quarry on Lake Fyne, near Glasgow, Scotland. It has been the custom, at these quarries, to have one great blast in the year. This year 14,000 pounds of gunpowder were fired in a single blast by electricity, displacing between 60,000 and 70,000 tons of rock. A steamer had brought an excursion-party to the scene to witness the event, and lay about a mile off shore, with the party on, and by agreement gave the signal for the blast with her steam-whistle. After the explosion took place, the steamer ran in and landed passengers to visit the quarry and inspect the result. The visitors went up into the quarry and were in the midst of animated conversation, when some members began to fall fainting to the ground, and the managers suddenly realized that they were immersed in an atmosphere contaminated with carbonic acid gas, or choke-damp. They called out to the people to run, and in the midst of the general consternation, more and more succumbed, until 80 to 100 persons were prostrated. For some minutes people kept falling senseless, in most cases without uttering a sound. Besides eight men who were killed, a number of the visitors were injured. All this was of course caused by the carbonic acid gas from the burning of the gunpowder, which had settled into the lower parts of the quarry, and asphyxiated all who breathed it largely. The strange part of the accident is that the commotion of the explosion did not, as is generally the case, completely disperse the gas. Usually it is considered entirely safe to enter a quarry immediately after an explosion, and such accidents as the foregoing are almost unknown.

Use of Coffee in England.—The use of coffee appears to be rapidly declining in England. The reduction of the duty to three half pence a pound has had no effect on consumption, and the Commissioners of Customs report that in the year ending Third Mo. 31st, 1886, some 314,000 pounds were consumed less than in the previous year. They attribute the decline to the comparative difficulty which the poor find in making coffee; but it is quite as likely that the true causes are the declining use of alcohol and the cheapness of tea and sugar. The bulk of the people prefer tea to coffee whenever they are not deterred from the former by the price, the female vote, which counts in this instance for half, being all one way.

Sulphur-Mines.—A great amount of sulphur has been found on the Island of Saba, one of the Antilles belonging to Holland. Lunge states that the mines are difficult to work on account of the heavy rains and the hurricanes. Some of the rock is 93 per cent. sulphur, but the average run is 45 per cent.

The University of Chattanooga and Colored Students.—This institution is under the control of the Methodists, and considerable criticism has been raised by the recent action of those who control it, in refusing admission to two students of African descent, for fear that their presence might injure the popularity of the University. J. W. Hamilton, the pastor of a M. E. church, sends an indignant protest against this act, to The Independent. He regards it as a violation of the spirit of Methodism, and of the action of the last General Conference, which adopted a report which states, that "Equal rights to the best facilities for intellectual and spiritual culture, equal rights in the eligibility to every position of honor and trust, and equal rights in the exercise of a free and unconstrained choice in all social relations, is a principle at once American, Methodist, and Scriptural." Still more clearly to the point was the utterance of the same Conference, which says "that no student shall be excluded from instruction in any and every school under the supervision of the Church, because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

Methodist Missionary Committee.—The General Missionary Committee of the Methodist Conference has appropriated $1,092,000 for the support of Home and Foreign Missions for the coming year. The grants named cover nearly all parts of the United States, and indeed much of the known world.

Congregational Response to the Episcopal Proposals.—The Congregational Conference for the State of Connecticut return "a grateful and cordial response" to the proposals respecting church unity issued by the late Episcopal Conference at Chicago. As to the general declaration contained in the Episcopalian message, it says "we earnestly reciprocate its courteous, kindly and fraternal spirit." In reference to the principles laid down in that message as essential to the restoration of unity, it says of the historic Episcopate, "We are unable to agree in it with our our brethren of the Episcopal Church, and are far from a conviction of its scriptural derivation; yes, and are accustomed to regard it as a note of division rather than of unity in the church." It further welcomes the suggestion of "brotherly confidences" with other Christian bodies seeking the restoration of unity.

Marriage of a Nun.—One of the nuns in charge of a Catholic institution near Ottawa, Ontario, recently left it, and was married to a young man at Ottawa. Two of her sisters who had taken the veil have also left the convent and returned to the world. After her return to Ottawa, but before her marriage, the Archbishop hearing of her arrival, sent to her and summoned her to his palace. She replied that if he wished to see her, he would find her with her friends. The Independent makes the following comments on the occurrence:

"So far as we can see, from our Protestant and we think Christian standpoint, one has no right to make anything more than a resolve, for religious reasons, not to marry. When the reasons change the resolution may change. If it be called a vow, it is binding only so long as we believe God wishes it binding. If we find we have mistaken God's will, we must withdraw from it. It is not a contract with any superior human ecclesiastical authority for which a return in value is made, and which puts one under obligation to keep it. The only obligation is toward God, and of that one's own conscience is the only judge. As we have said, such a vow is nothing more than a resolve, and as such can be changed."

Railroad Engineers.—In speaking of the Brotherhood of Railroad Engineers, Chauncey Depew, of New York, said that "he had been connected with railroads about as long as the brotherhood had been in existence, twenty-three years, and that twenty-three years ago 'blasphemy was the railroad engineer's current conversation, and whiskey was his nerve tonic, but that this had all been changed. Now the engineers of our railroads are as a class temperate, moral and clean of speech.'"

Conference on "Correspondence" of London Yearly Meeting.—The large attendance at this Conference showed the interest felt in the subject by Friends of London Yearly Meeting. Strong desires were expressed for a reopening of correspondence with Ohio Yearly Meeting; but this could not easily be done without admitting that a mistake had been made in recognizing the Binn's Body. Among the propositions brought forward, one was to send a general epistle to all the bodies of American Friends who would receive it; another was to discontinue all correspondence for a time, and then resume it in such form as way might open for. There was manifested, by some, a desire to disconnect the correspondence from any such recognition of the meetings addressed as would involve London Yearly Meeting in any responsibility for their standing. But there did not appear to be sufficient unity with any of these proposals to adopt them: and the recommendations to the Yearly Meeting embraced little more than some change in the manner of preparing the epistle, and the appointment of a sub-committee of the Meeting for Sufferings to be called "The American Committee," who will probably be expected to obtain information as to what transpires in this country.

Look Over It.—It is said that John Wesley was once walking along a road with a brother, who related to him his troubles, saying he did not know what he should do. They were at the moment passing a stone fence to a meadow, over which a cow was looking. "Do you know, asked Wesley, "why that cow looks over that wall?" "No" replied the one in trouble. "I will tell you," said Wesley," because she cannot look through it; and that is the way you must do with your troubles, look over and above them."

Depend upon it, in the midst of all the science about the world and its ways, and all the ignorance of God and his greatness; the man or woman who can say, "Thy will be done," with the true heart of giving up, is nearer the secret of things than the geologist or theologian.—Geo. McDonald.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 4, 1886.

Perhaps there is no part of Barclay's Apology more thoroughly satisfactory than that in which he treats of the universality of Divine Grace, proving that Christ died for all men; that all men, in whatever recesses of the earth they may be located, or however ignorant they may be in outward knowledge, are visited by the inshining of his Light; and that this Light will assuredly bring salvation to all who are obedient to what it shows to be the duty of each individual.

The rejection of this fundamental principle of Christian truth has led professors into many difficulties; and into human schemes for avoiding the consequences which logically follow from an opposite doctrine. An interesting illustration of this has been shown in the recent discussions in the American Missionary Board, over the doctrine of future probation. Many professors of religion have imbibed the notion, that none of the Pagan nations of the earth, who are ignorant of the coming and sufferings of our Saviour, can be saved. As the mind naturally revolts from the thought of persons being punished for that for which they are in no way responsible, some of these persons have added a supplementary notion in order to reconcile this false theory with their conceptions of the justice of the Almighty; and have imagined that there must be a state of probation after death for those who in this life had no opportunity of knowing and believing the historical narrative of Christ in his appearance in the flesh. This scheme of "future probation" has no satisfactory scriptural foundation; and its advocacy was regarded by the Missionary Board as a sufficient reason for not sending forth as missionaries those who held the doctrine.

The discussion of this doctrine has called forth an article in The Independent by the editor of a Catholic paper published in Ohio; which adds another illustration of the difficulty in which an erroneous theory involves those who hold it. This writer states as the doctrine of the Church of Rome, that no person who dies without being baptized (with water) will ever get to Heaven. But to avoid the horrible conclusion that unbaptized infants, and innocent heathen, must suffer eternal punishment, he quotes from several writers whose works are recognized as authoritative among Roman Catholics, to show that such persons are in an intermediate state—that is, that although they will be deprived of supernatural blessedness, yet they will enjoy a state of natural happiness!

From all such idle speculations those are happily delivered, who accept in its fulness the Scripture declaration, that "The Grace of God which bringeth salvation hath appeared unto all men, teaching them that, denying ungodliness and the world's lusts, they should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world." How increasingly precious becomes that fundamental truth, insisted upon more than any other by the early teachers among Friends, that the same Divine Life and Power which took flesh and dwelt among men, visits all men everywhere, and will work the salvation of all who open their hearts to receive Him, even of those also who never heard of his outward appearance. He and He alone is the author of eternal salvation to all who obey Him; and his work is substantially the same in the minds of those blessed with the light and culture of civilized life; and of those who are destitute of these advantages.

On the same day the first suit under the Child Labor law of New Jersey was tried in the Second District Court at Newark. A member of the Society of Friends desires a position as managing housekeeper. Apply at the Office of "The Friend," 116 North Fourth St., up stairs.

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting-house at West Grove, Pa., on the 25th of Eleventh Month, 1886, WILLIAM B. HARVEY, son of Thomas M., and Cassandra Harvey (both deceased), and FRANCES E. FORSYTHE, daughter of Louis and Mary Ann Forsythe, all of London Grove Township, Chester Co., Pa.

DIED, on the 8th of Tenth Mo. 1886, SARAH L. STANLEY, wife of the late James Stanley of Salem, Columbiana County, Ohio, in the seventy-sixth year of her age, a member of Salem Monthly Meeting of Friends. She peacefully passed from the confines of earth to the glorious realities of a future life. Her ministrations of love to others were a continued source of enjoyment to her; though her feeble powers were often severely taxed that they might enjoy the gifts which her hands executed. With sisterly affection she drew the young into companionship with her, and oftentimes dropped a needed word of timely counsel.

A short time before her death, she selected the following beautiful lines of Whitier's as expressive of her feelings:

AT LAST.

When on my day of life the night is falling;
And, in the winds from unsummed spaces blown,
I hear far voices out of darkness calling
My feet to paths unknown;
Thou, who hast made my home of life so pleasant,
Leave not its tenant when its walls decay.
Oh, Love divine, Oh, Helper ever present,
Be Thou my strength and stay!

Be near me when all else is from me drifting,
Earth, sky, home's pictures, days of shade and shine,
And kindly faces to mine own uplifting
The love which answers mine.

I have but Thee, Oh, Father! Let Thy spirit
Be with me then to comfort and uphold;
No gate of pearl, no branch of palm, I merit,
Nor street of shining gold.

Suffice it if—my good and ill unreckoned,
And both forgiven through Thy abounding grace—
I find myself by hands familiar beckoned
Unto my fitting place:

Some humble door among Thy many mansions,
Some sheltering shade where sin and striving cease
And flows forever through Heaven's green expansions
The river of Thy peace.

There, from the music round about me stealing
I fain would learn the new and holy song,
And find, at last, beneath Thy tree of healing,
The life for which I long.

THE FRIEND.

Twelfth Mo. 5th, 1841. Under a renewed sense of the loving-kindness and continued mercies of our Heavenly Father towards one of the most unworthy of his creatures, am I again constrained to make this little note; feeling as though it would be some alleviation to a heart which seems ready to burst. O the path of secret sadness I have been travelling in, may I not say for years; and increasingly so of latter times under the weight of manifold sins and transgressions! What sacrifice would I not make for an assurance of forgiveness and acceptance! What have I reserved unto myself, O Heavenly Father, that thou hast called for? Has there not been a full surrender? Thou knowest all things. Regard, I pray thee, the petitions poured forth this day on behalf of some of us, who feel as though we could plead no longer for ourselves. Cancel our sins and iniquities; strengthen us to perform our vows, even should it be acknowledging Thee in the assemblies of thy people. I have felt this day as though I were becoming a spectacle to angels and to men. But even this would be but a small sacrifice, for the life of the poor soul.

7th. Have been made to feel that it is a fearful thing to live, and an awful thing to die.

8th. Leanness; produced by indulging in too much conversation.

9th. Painfully grieved, I have been several meeting days of late, to see lightness apparent amongst the dear children, both on coming into meeting and even after taking their seats; and with some, continuing all meeting through. How relieving was it to hear this morning, dear Sarah Emlen lift up her voice, a warning voice: setting before them the exceeding sinfulness of thus presenting themselves before that all-seeing eye, who sees and knows the most secret recesses of the heart. O the tender entreaties which went forth, that they might prize their privileges and number their blessings, before they were taken from them, &c., &c. Felt a little ability, notwithstanding all my weaknesses, to crave the preservation of the children; and I could not feel clear after meeting without going to the collecting room, and expressing a little what my feelings were and had been. It was done in a very broken manner, my heart seeming too full to give utterance. Tears flowed.

First Mo. 2nd, 1842. Dear Sarah Emlen lifted up her voice, "Who is this that cometh from Edom," &c. Spoke of what a favor it was to be made partakers of the death and sufferings of our dear Saviour; and while borne down under a sense of our manifold sins and transgressions, to know that He still remains "mighty to save;" and that He will speak in righteousness to such as these, if there is only a cleaving unto Him; being not ashamed to own that they are followers of the Lord Jesus. She believed there were those present who, like poor Peter, often sought secret places, "weeping bitterly," under a sense of their great weakness. Such were desired to remember, that help is laid on One that is mighty and able to deliver all that come unto Him and that love Him and his appearing. She believed, if these remained faithful, they would yet see of the travail of their souls and be satisfied."

6th. A little strength afresh afforded to plead for mercy and forgiveness.

9th. A renewed evidence has this day been given, that the Lord is not unmindful of us, undeserving as we are. Felt almost as soon as taking my seat in meeting, that the Saviour was very near; and O! the breathings that arose, that He might be sought after by every one present; and although some of us might be but as broken vessels pleading our helplessness with tears, that such would not be disregarded by Him who sees and knows the secrets of every heart. Near the close of the meeting dear Sarah Emlen was engaged to put up vocal petitions, craving for the life of some of us in a very affecting manner.

13th. The feelings that have attended throughout this day have been comforting. A little strength afforded during our silent sitting together this morning, to beg for a removal of all that stands in the way, no matter what it costs. No sacrifices seem too great for the life of the soul.

30th. This has been a day of favor. Several of the Committee with us. S. B. acceptably engaged in testimony in our meeting. He was concerned to set before us the nature and effect of true silent worship. He dwelt much upon, and the necessity there was for each one of us to seek the Lord for ourselves, if happily we might find Him; for He is near to every one of us, and will, if rightly sought after, manifest himself to be a teacher; having declared "He would teach his people himself." He is in the midst of us, even the two or three. Yea, down to the present company, his own words stand good, addressed to his tribulated followers formerly when He was about to be taken from them: "Lo I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." In the afternoon meeting, there was extended an invitation to some, whose feet had declined and whose steps had slidden; such as were bemoaning their condition, and saying in their hearts, "O that it were with me as in months past, in the days when God preserved me! when his candle shone upon my head, and when, by his light, I walked through darkness." Their father's house, where there is bread enough and to spare, was shown them, and such were encouraged to return with this acknowledgment, "Father, I have sinned," &c. He believed the arms of Divine mercy were opened to receive them, &c.

Second Mo. 15th. Since last note, I have paid a little visit to my friends at home. It was very pleasant for mother and children to be all together once more. What changes time brings with it! Our ever forming, for any length of time, a family circle again now looks very doubtful. The thought produces sadness; accompanied with fears that a few more rolling years will produce still greater changes. O! that we may all so live, that at the end of time here, we may make a united family in Heaven.

18th. Throughout this day, the feeling of quietness and peace have been such, as I have not witnessed for many days. Even my rest was undisturbed; and on awakening this morning, thanksgiving and praise did ascend.

22nd. Attended Concord Quarterly Meeting. In the last meeting, excellent remarks were made on the state of Society as brought to view by the queries and answers. Dear Hannah Gibbons spoke on the attendance of our meetings: desiring that we might not grow weary even should we be permitted oftentimes to feel very poor and stripped. As there was a holding on, He whom our souls loved would arise, and even "come suddenly to his temple," &c. Near the close of the meeting she revived the prayer of David: "Cast me not off in the time of old age; forsake me not when my strength faileth." She set forth, also, his confidence and trust, when he said: "My heart and my flesh faileth, but God is the strength of my heart and my portion forever."

26th. Entered this day upon my thirtieth year. How have I been preserved "all my life long!"

Third Mo. 13th. My attention was particularly arrested in reading to-day in "The Friend,"* an Epistle of Lydia Lancaster, written many years ago, to the Quarterly Meeting of young Friends in London.

27th. Strength given once more to approach the mercy seat. Felt the preciousness of silent waiting upon the Lord. A little glimpse given of the good things in store for those who really love the Lord.

Fourth Mo. 1st. Attended Concord Monthly Meeting: feeling, I believe, never more sensible of my unfitness to assemble thus with my friends. But on gathering into silence, the solemnity permitted seemed to prepare the way for the good that followed. So that out of the very depth of weakness the heart was enabled to lift up itself in secret aspirations for a little living bread; that which would nourish and satisfy. Had with us two Friends from Indiana, viz., James Hadley and Robert Hodson; who are attending the Monthly Meetings in Concord Quarter. After a time of precious silence, dear James arose and ministered with life and power. O how pure did the word that ran through him seem! "The secrets of the Lord are with them that fear Him, and He will show them his covenant." It was to those alone who did truly fear and love Him, that these secrets would be disclosed, and as they were able to bear them. That his covenant with these would be sure, for He remains to be a covenant-keeping God. As these kept the covenant they had entered into they would more and more experience, "that all his paths are mercy and truth;" for He remains to be a covenant-keeping God. "Why sayest thou, O Jacob, and speakest O Israel, my way is hid from the Lord," &c., repeating the remainder of the chapter. He believed the strength of these would be renewed, as there was a patient waiting. He will show them his covenants, and He will enable to keep them. Their weapons of war will not be carnal, but mighty through God, &c. It was throughout a very instructive communication.

5th. This evening closes the second-day of our "examination." Retired to my own room and enjoyed a little quietness, which was truly grateful. How it refreshes the poor mind, when it has been, as it were, on a continual stretch for hours together! Was it not for seasons of this kind would there not be a fainting by the way? May the seasons of quiet afforded me here at Westtown, be rightly improved. And now I am about to mingle with my friends at home for a few weeks, may there still be a seeking after inward retirement of mind, that so the good Spirit of my dear Lord may go with me and preserve.

Fifth Mo. 8th. With David, I feel I can say, "Save me, O God; for the waters are come in unto my soul. I sink in deep mire, where there is no standing, I am come unto deep waters, where the floods overflow me." "But my prayer is unto thee, O Lord! In the multitude of thy mercies hear me, in the truth of thy salvation." "Deliver me out of the mire, and let me not sink! Let not the water-floods overflow me, neither let the deep swallow me up, and let not the pit shut her mouth upon me."

25th. In reviewing the three past days, nothing condemns; but poverty of spirit greatly aboundeth. A little comforted and encouraged in reading over some of the exercises and deep baptisms of that devoted servant and handmaiden of the Lord, Sarah Stephenson. Her trials in younger life I could read and understand. These she speaks of as "from within and without, even deep conflicts; so that it might be said, my bread was eaten with mourning, and my drink mingled with tears; but then, O what precious meetings I had at times! my spirit was so broken that I could scarcely contain myself."

Botanical Notes.

Among the plants which grow on the borders or in the ponds of the pine lands of New Jersey, are a few species of the Pipewort family (Eriocaulon), of interest to the botanist, but not showing enough to attract much notice from others. This family is mainly confined to tropical countries, but few species venturing into the temperate zones. They are aquatic plants, with long tufts of fibrous roots of marked cellular structure, surmounted by a cluster of grass-like leaves, from which rises a naked flower-stalk, crowned with a small, convex, dense head of white flowers.

A friend brought me two species of these plants from a pond near Tuckerton, N. J., in the latter part of the Seventh Month; and on a visit to the pond at Brown's Mills in the Ninth Month, we found several of them growing on the edge of the water.

Among the plants from Tuckerton was a beautiful White-fringed Orchis (Habenaria blephariglotis), the flowers of which we may well suppose to be very attractive to the insects which visit it for the sweet secretions it contains. The lip of the flower forms a beautiful fringed platform on which they can light, and this is arched over by a snow-white canopy. On each side of the central opening is a mass of pollen enclosed in a sac with a glutinous knob at the end of a projecting point. As the insect inserts its head into the tube, in search for the liquid within it, it touches these knobs, which adhere to it, and thus the pollen masses are drawn from their receptacles, and carried to the next flower which the insect visits, and thus brought into contact with its stigma—a process essentially necessary to enable the plant to perfect its seed.

A similar provision for availing itself of insect aid in fertilizing its germs was noticed in another rather common, but beautiful plant of the Orchis family, the Pogonia ophioglossoides, which has no popular name. The slender stem of 6 or 9 inches in height, bears a single leaf about its centre, and on the top a single flower about an inch long, of a pale rose-color. In this, the pollen mass is placed in a little cup, and attached to the inner side of its lid, which is glutinous on the top, so that it adheres to an insect coming into contact with it, and is torn away, carrying the pollen along.

There are many of the Orchis family which appear to be thus dependent on outside help for the perfecting of their seed. It is a singular family, apparently more incapable of taking care of itself than most others, and many of its forms are dying out as the land becomes more cleared and more thoroughly cultivated. Years ago I knew of several localities in Chester Co., Pa., for the magnificent Habenaria grandiflora; but it is doubtful whether a single plant of it now grows in any of them. I have noticed also, on the part of botanical writers, a hesitation as to giving the place of growth of some of the rarer species, lest they should guide explorers to the spot, and thus cause their extermination.

The seed capsules of some of the Orchids are largely filled with imperfect seeds; and in some species, many years of growth are required before seedling plants will bear flowers—in one species nineteen years elapsed.

In a former article, I spoke of that curious carnivorous family, the Sundews (Drosera), which grow abundantly in our boggy grounds, and entrap small insects with the glutinous hairs of their leaves. I allude to them now, only for the sake of mentioning that when H. O. Forbes was collecting plants in the Island of Timor, he found a lovely little species (Drosera lunata) growing luxuriantly in extensive patches on the bare, hot, clayey face of a mountain. He says, "accustomed to gather its kin at home in boggy heaths, I was surprised to find it flourishing in so dry an exposure; but on digging it up, I found it held a store of moisture against hard times in the tuberous roots with which it was provided."

Among the members of the Mint family (Labiata), which grow in the vicinity of Moorestown, N. J., the most valuable is probably the common Peppermint (Mentha piperita). This, like nearly all of the species of Mentha found in the United States, has been introduced from Europe, but it is now extensively naturalized. The foliage is dotted with small glands which contain an aromatic oil, for the sake of which the plant has long been cultivated in Europe. Its cultivation in this country for commercial purposes has been principally in some of the counties of New York, where it has been carried on for the past 60 years. The oil is obtained from the plants by distillation, and is used in medicine.

Botanists have felt that there must be some unexplained mystery about that most singular family of flowering plants to which belongs the Indian Pipe (Monotropa uniflora). This is found in moist woodland, during the late summer and in the autumn of the year, pushing its way up through the dead leaves in clusters of white stems, totally destitute of green cells, and resembling in their manner of growth the groups of Toad-stools which spring up about the base of trees and in other spots where they find decaying matter on which to feed. In some respects, the Indian Pipe seems more like a Fungus than an ordinary flowering plant. As Fungi feed upon other organic matter, so it was supposed that the Indian Pipe was parasitic on the roots of other plants. But in carefully digging up the plants and washing away the soil, no attachment with such roots could be found; so the theory was advanced, that like the Fungi, they feed upon decaying matter. A recent observer (according to the Journal of the Royal Microscopic Society) in examining an allied plant, another species of Monotropa, (M. Hypopitys) found its roots to be covered with the threads of a Fungus, from which he supposed the Monotropa obtained its nourishment.

The cones of most of our species of pine, hard and solid as they are, open their scales at maturity and allow the winged seeds to drop out, and take their chances of growing and developing new trees. But there are some kinds of pine, in which the cones continue closed for an indefinite number of years: the imprisoned seeds are said to retain their vitality. The Pinus tuberculata, a native of the Sierra Nevada is one of these. When a forest fire occurs, its cones are opened, and from the seed thus liberated, a new growth of Pines springs up to replace those that have been destroyed. It almost seems as if the contingency of fire had been foreseen and provided for in this remarkable property of the hard-coned pines.

During one of my walks (Eighth Mo. 9th) I found on the borders of a thicket a slender vine running over the bushes, with chocolate-colored flowers of the shape of those of the pea. I had not seen it before for perhaps a number of years, for it is not very abundant in this part of New Jersey. It was the Apios tuberosa, a species of wild bean, sometimes called ground-nut, because it bears edible tubers on underground shoots. The flowers are succeeded by long pods containing the seeds, as in other members of the Pulse family.

For "The Friend."

Universal and Saving Light.

[Sometime since, there appeared in one of the religious periodicals of our country, (one not connected with the Society of Friends) an editorial article which arrested the attention of a Friend and brought him under a religious concern for the defence of the Truth; which found expression in a letter addressed to the Editor of the paper referred to. A copy of this letter has come into our hands; and, as the subject it treats upon is one of interest and importance, with the consent of the author, we publish the substance of it in our columns.—Ed.]

It was with deep regret that I read the editorial entitled "The Holy Spirit's Work and Workings," the purpose of which seemed to be to prove that the Holy Spirit in redeeming sinners from the evil of their ways, operated only through human means; that is that "the Spirit is never sent directly to the unbelieving sinner, to strive with him, and show him his sin, and point him to the Saviour, without the employed agency of the Christian believer."

This seems to me to be an erroneous and dangerous doctrine, which strikes at the foundation of true religion.

Understood in the light of truth, it appears to me that the burden of the apostle's preaching was to direct people to the witness for truth in their own hearts, to the "Light of Christ, the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

The Apostle Paul said, "The Grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared unto all men;" and speaking to the Corinthians, he said, "But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal." This, it seems to me, is a fulfilment of the promise to Israel set forth in the prophecy of Jeremiah, "Behold the days come saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and the house of Judah," &c.

"This is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts, and they shall teach no more every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, know the Lord, for all shall know me, from the least of them, unto the greatest of them."

The Apostle Peter said: "We have the word of prophecy made more sure, wherunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a lamp shining in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the Day-Star arise in your hearts." Zacharias declared: "The Day-Spring from on high shall visit us, to shine upon them that sit in darkness and the shadow of death, to guide our feet in the way of peace." In the editorial referred to, I find this language: "It is by and through the agency of believers who are in the power of the Holy Spirit, that any unbeliever is attracted to the truth, or won to the loving service of the Saviour;" and Paul and Cornelius are cited as examples to prove this statement. Was this true of the Apostle Paul? Was he first "attracted to the truth through the agency of a believer in Jesus?" Was he not met on the road to Damascus by the "Light of the Lord?" and was he not arrested in his course by the voice of the Lord, when no human believer was nigh? And was it not made known unto him then and there what he should do? There is no record in all the Scripture of a more striking manifestation of the grace of God than in this visitation to Paul on the road to Damascus. Nor is there any warrant for saying that "he did not receive the Holy Spirit until three days were passed;" for as says Dr. Lightfoot, "this appearance of the Lord unto Paul, was not so much in his person as in his glory, nor was what he saw of him, beside the light that struck him blind, with the eyes of his body, but of his spirit."

When his outward eyes were opened by the laying on of Ananias' hands, we may not doubt that he also received a renewed pouring of the Spirit, for his instruction in, and qualification for the work whereunto he was called, but that manifestation on the way to Damascus differed only in degree from that which is given to every unbelieving sinner, to "lead him from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God."

And how was it with Cornelius? Was he first attracted to the truth through the medium of a "believer in Jesus?" We are told that the angel of the Lord said unto him: "Thy prayers and thine alms have gone up as a memorial before God." Was he not then "under the power of the Spirit?" And was it not this which enabled him to offer up acceptable prayer unto God? For the apostle tells us "we know not what we should pray for as we ought, but the Spirit himself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered."

I quote again from the editorial in question: "Without the Holy Spirit's power no Christian can pray aright, or study aright, or teach aright, or live aright." Cornelius had prayed aright, for his "prayers had gone up as a memorial before God." Surely then he must have been "under the power of the Holy Spirit."

In believing that the Holy Spirit does operate directly upon the heart of the unbeliever, convicting him of evil and directing him in the way of well-doing, without the intervention of a "believer in Jesus," it is not necessary that we undervalue the office or service of the truly anointed believer, him or her who waits for the true pointings of the Spirit in the work of redeeming others; for we are told that "He maketh his angels spirits, and his ministers a flaming fire;" but as the Christian world has many evidences of the blessings that flow from an anointed ministry, so it is true that not only in the apostolic days, but in all succeeding ages down to our own time, there have been those in high stations, and in low stations, who have been turned from the way of sin and transgression, and who have had their hearts directed to the true source of life and salvation, without the knowledge or aid of Christian believers."

He who came not to call the righteous, but sinners, to repentance," has a witness for himself in the hearts of all, and many there are who can testify, that when they were living in sin and iniquity, even some who had sunk deep in wickedness and crime, they were conscious of the presence of this "secret Searcher of all hearts," reproving, warning and inviting them when no human believer was nigh. What means the language: "Behold I stand at the door and knock, if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him, and sup with him, and he with me?" Here is no limitation for he says: "If any man hear my voice," &c. It is a great blessing to have our eyes opened to see the truth on any subject, and there is no truth it seems to me more necessary for us, than that the Spirit of Truth is a living witness in the hearts of sinners, reproving them for evil, and directing them in the way of well doing, and that as they yield obedience to its secret monitions, they will find it to be the "power of God unto their salvation."

Respectfully,

JOSEPH H. BRANSON.

For "The Friend."

In the year 1831, a catalogue was printed giving the titles to about 2300 volumes, which it states was the number in the Library at that date. It also contains a series of "Rules for the government of the Library," which are reduced in number from eight to five. They are not greatly changed in substance from those previously used, but are more condensed and not so specific in details.

In the Third Month, 1842, an association of Friends who had supported a Reading Room and Library, having concluded to disband, presented their Library and the funds belonging thereto, to "the Committee of the Monthly Meetings who have the care of Friends' Library;" with liberty for the committee to dispose of the gift at their discretion. This was an acceptable present, the interest on the funds enabling the committee to increase the Library more rapidly than theretofore; but, as many of the books received were duplicates of some that were already in the Library, the committee made large donations to other collections.

At the suggestion of Samuel Bettle, a minister and member of the Monthly Meeting of Philadelphia, held at Fourth and Arch Streets, in the year 1843, a proposition was made by that meeting, to erect a building on the adjoining lot, one of the purposes of which was to accommodate Friends' Library. This proposition was referred by the four city Monthly Meetings, to a joint committee, who made the following report:

"That the proposition of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, contained in its minute of Seventh Month 27th, last, having claimed deliberate consideration, it was unitedly agreed to propose that liberty be given to erect a house on the east side of the lot on Mulberry Street, near Third Street, adjoining the house belonging to Philadelphia Monthly Meeting, to be used for the general purposes of the Society. Such as the accommodation of the Library belonging to Friends, the deposit of books published or kept for sale or distribution under the direction of the Meeting for Sufferings, &c., and such other uses as may hereafter be deemed proper. Said house to belong to and be under the control of the Monthly Meetings in this City, as the ground on which it is proposed to erect it now is. The cost of building to be provided for without taking the funds of the Society, or calling on the Monthly Meetings for pecuniary aid.

Signed

Samuel Bettle, Thos. Evans,
Jno. G. Hoskins, L. Nicholson."

The Monthly Meetings adopted the report of their committee and a building was erected on the premises, now No. 304 Arch street, in the spring of 1844. It is understood the funds for the purpose were contributed by Samuel Bettle. The second story was offered for the accommodation of the Library.* The committee in charge, on the removal of the books to the new location, concluded to have it kept open on two afternoons in the week, instead of one, as it had been for many years back. As this would involve an additional expense, the four Monthly Meetings, on the application of the committee, concluded to pay annually a small sum each. At the same time the number of the committee having charge of the Library was increased to two from each meeting, making eight in all.

In the year 1853, a catalogue was compiled by the late James S. Lippincott, the then Librarian. At that time the number of books exceeded 5,100. A supplementary catalogue of the books, added between the years 1853 and 1873, was compiled by William E. Allen, and printed the latter year. This is the last of its kind that is likely to be issued for some years to come, as a card catalogue, such as is in use in most large Libraries at the present time, was adopted a few years ago.

At the time of the union of the Monthly Meeting of Philadelphia and the Monthly Meeting of Philadelphia for the Southern District, the latter part of the year 1872, the Library Committee proposed that each of the Monthly Meetings thereafter, should have a representation of three Friends in that committee, making the total number nine, instead of eight. This was agreed to, and there has been no change made in the representation since. The members of the Library Committee have invariably been confined to the men members.

*Some years after, when the capacity of the second story had been nearly reached, a number of the octaves were removed to the third story.

Shortly after the junction of the two Monthly Meetings, the Library was opened on Fifth-day mornings, from half past 9 to 10 o'clock, mainly for the accommodation of those children of Friends' Select Schools who attended Arch Street Meeting.

The following circular, sent out in the Eleventh Month, 1883, will explain its object, viz:

"The Committee in charge of the Library desire to call attention to this valuable collection of books belonging to the Society. It is free to any Friend living in or near this city, who will sign an agreement to replace or pay for volumes that may be lost or injured. Thereafter, any member of his or her family can take them out without charge, subject to the rules of the Library. The books comprise works of history, biography, science and most other subjects usually found in well selected Libraries; works of fiction being excluded. The different editions of biographies and other writings of early Friends, is probably unequalled in any other collection of books in this country. The object in this calling attention to the subject, is to give the books a wider field of usefulness. The number of volumes is about 8500. The name of any suitable book that is not found on our shelves, may be handed to one of our Committee, and, if approved and within our means, will be purchased if not out of print. Further information can be furnished by the Committee.

"Open Fourth-day afternoon, from 4 to 6 o'clock, and Seventh-day afternoon from 3 to 6 o'clock."

For years the insecurity of their charge, had exercised the minds of the Friends on the Committee. Being placed in a four-story building that has but one stair-way, the stock could hardly escape destruction if a serious fire should break out on the first floor. In that event, many works would be destroyed that might never be replaced.

It was concluded to employ an expert in bibliography to separate those of greatest value, and to affix the probable market price to each of them. Charles Hildeburn, Librarian of the Philadelphia Athenaeum, was engaged to do the work. He selected 300 volumes, which were valued at about $6,000, and 50 others of considerable scarcity, but upon which he did not place a valuation. These were all stored away in two closets in the south-eastern corner of the fire-proof, in the Arch Street meeting-house, where, being out of sight, they have nearly all ceased to be asked for by borrowers.

Before the next winter had closed, it was found that moisture had condensed on the wall of the fire-proof, in the corner where the books were placed, and had penetrated those in the lower closet. The books were taken out and dried, but this new danger, and the fact that the contents of the Library were scattered in three different places—the second and third stories of the book-store and the fire-proof—drew the attention of the Committee in charge, to the necessity of providing a safe and convenient place of deposit for the entire collection.

If thou goest about to seek life in the Scriptures, as the Jews did of old, and in the meantime neglects to come unto Christ, who is the Life and the Fountain of it, thou canst not expect to find Life in the Scriptures, or any blessing of God in thy reading or meditating in them. For, as none can enjoy the light and good of the outward sun, that shineth without or abroad, who shut their eyes against it, and let it have no place in them; no more canst thou enjoy the Light and good of Christ Jesus, that Sun of Righteousness if thou shuttest thy inward eyes against his Light that shines in thee.—The Way to the City of God.

HUMILITY.

A quiet little virtue, a blossom of the heart,
It groweth in the valley, the highway far apart,
Though chief among the graces, 'tis lowliest of them all;
Like hidden spring whose touching is power for great and small,
Though forged at earthly anvil, 'tis th' key to Heaven's gate,
Before whose soundless turning the listening angels wait.

Wouldst wear this fadeless blossom, wouldst gain this crowning grace?
Wouldst feel the mystic guiding of this key into its place?
Know, never priceless jewel from far Golconda's mine,
Or pearl from caves of ocean where coral bowers entwine,
Or flower from Alpine summit, was harder to attain,
And with its glad possessor less certain to remain.

Like mirage of the desert, like cloudlet of the morn, Like snowflake in the sunlight, that melts as soon as born,
This lowly virtue beameth with life's diviner ray,
But often in our clasping it vanisheth away.
A breath of Pride will chase it,—the whisper of a thought
Whose source is aught unholy, will shiver it to nought.

Far greater is the hero who makes vain self to yield,
Than he whose lance has quivered on many a storied field.

A fiercer battle wages when Conscience stirs anew,
Than ever clashed at Ivry, or stormed at Waterloo;
And when the victory dawneth of virtue over sin,
This gentle little presence comes softly gliding in.

And would we keep the treasure with never harm or loss,
'Twill only be by clinging all meekly to the cross.
There, as the fervent prayer of needy hearts shall pour,
Humility will hover and add one blessing noor,
And when Hope's glad evangel shall bid the soul arise,
Will it not prove most truly the key to Paradise?

INDIAN SUMMER.

Selected.

All around me, every bush and tree
Says Autumn's here, and Winter soon will be,
Who knows his soft white sleep and silence over all.

The birch, most shy and ladylike of trees,
Her poverty, as best she may, retrieves,
And hints at her foregone gentilities
With some saved relics of her wealth of leaves.
The swamp-oak, with his royal purple on,
Glares red as blood across the sinking sun,
As one who prouder to a falling fortune cleaves.

He looks a sachem, in red blanket wrapt,
Who, 'mid some council of the sad-garbed whites,
Erect and stern, in his own memories lapt,
With distant eye broods over other sights,
Sees the hushed wood the city's fair place replace,
The wounded turf heal o'er the railway trace,
And roams the savage Past of his unwinded rights.

The red-oak, softer grained, yields all for lost,
And, with his crumpled foliage stiff and dry,
After the first betrayal of the frost,
Rebuffs the kiss of the relenting sky.
The chestnuts, lavish of their long-hold gold,
To the faint Summer, begared now and old,
Pour back the sunshine hoarded 'neath her favoring eye.

The ash her purple drops forgivingly
And sadly, breaking not the general hush;
The maple-swamps glow like a sunset sea,
Each leaf a ripple with its separate flush;
All round the world's edge creeps the sinking blaze
Of bushes low, as when, on cloudy days,
Ere the rain falls, the cautious farmer burns his brush.

LINES

For "The Friend."

Sometimes to us the guiding hand
Seems hidden from our eyes;
And dark and drear, before us here
The shadowed pathway lies.

The night surrounds, the morning seems
Alas, so far away,
But, as we pine the light's decline,
Breaks forth the glorious day.

Our Father knows his children's needs
Ere yet the conscious prayer,
And for each grief, He sends relief,
As dawns the morning fair.

MINISTRY.

Many and interesting are the anecdotes related of the manner in which the truly anointed ministers of the Lord have been led to open to individuals or to meetings their real condition.

When Christopher Healy was in England on a religious visit, more than fifty years ago, he attended Kendal Meeting. Soon after taking his seat, he saw in mental vision a fire almost as clearly as if it had been visibly before his eyes; and he saw that the people were going round it and round it, but none of them would venture through it. He stood up with the text, "Ephraim is a cake, not turned." He described what he had seen—that the people were going round the fire of the Lord, which, if submitted to, would burn up their corruptions; and that they were turning, as it were, only one side to it, and letting that get a little scorched; and trying to make that answer instead of fully submitting to the refining operations of the Lord's hand.

This was close doctrine; and probably would apply to the people in many other localities than Kendal, for it is a common weakness to try and find some easier way into the kingdom of heaven than the narrow path of self-denial, and the bearing of the cross, although our Saviour has declared that without these, we cannot be his disciples. But it was probably a comfort to Christopher to be told afterwards by a minister belonging to Kendal Meeting, that some time before Jonathan Taylor, a minister from Mt. Pleasant, Ohio, had been there, and had commenced with the same text, which he applied in much the same way.

A somewhat similar unity of exercise in two ministers, was witnessed by the writer. At Birmingham Monthly Meeting, held, I think, on that occasion, at West Chester, Chester Co., Pa., about the beginning of the year 1845, Samuel Cope was present and spoke, commencing his sermon with the Apostle Paul's exhortation to the Thessalonians, "Quench not the Spirit, despise not prophesying," &c.—quoting several verses. This was on the Fourth-day of the week. Rebecca Kite, who was then a teacher at Westtown Boarding School, and was present at the meeting, mentioned the presence of Samuel Cope, in a letter which she wrote to the family in Philadelphia, but purposely refrained from giving the text on which he spoke, lest it might embarrass her father in his ministerial services, as she knew that he would probably be at West Chester Meeting in a few days. Thomas Kite did attend that meeting on the following First-day. I was there and was interested, perhaps rather startled, when he arose with the same passage which Samuel Cope had used four days before!

"Words fitly spoken" are compared to "apples of gold in pictures of silver." Where the language and delivery of a minister are dignified and graceful, they may be compared to the "sil-

Memories of the Prairies.

Early in the spring of 1853, I first saw a prairie. We had landed at the youthful city of Keokuk, then a mere village, in the very southeastern corner of Iowa; and after employing a man with a team of horses and lumber wagon, to take us to Salem, one or two day's drive to the north-west, we were soon on our way. The country for some distance was pretty well settled. Good farms lined our road on either side. Some of the buildings and other improvements were good, but many were small and cheaply made—temporary fixtures soon to be superseded by better. Rain coming on, soon after noon, we put up at a "wayside inn," and the next morning we started on our journey, with a bright sun and a clear sky overhead, but under our feet mud and water in abundance, for the country in that place was quite level; but after travelling a few miles through lanes almost impassable for the mud, it became more rolling and sparsely settled; and after awhile, there being no fence to our left hand, our driver turned abruptly from the road into what I then thought was a great wheat-field, with its dark brown soil just putting on a green robe of young wheat. Surprised at this, I looked about us with more care, and then saw that instead of being trespassers in a tilled field, we were lightly trudging over the native sward of an open prairie, stretching away for many miles before us.

A little way to our right there was a belt of timber, filling the valley of some stream, bounding the prairie on that side, and stretching away to the north and east. From this woodland, little spurs jutted out into the prairie, following up every little tributary creek and streamlet. One of these small water-courses that crossed our way was so swollen by the recent rain that our driver was compelled to make a long detour in order to "head it."

Nature's own beautiful meadow lay before us and around us in gentle wave-like undulations, dressed in springtime's brightest green; though, to look down at our feet, the grass stood in single blades a few inches high, quite plainly revealing the fire-blackened sod; for the prairie-fire had swept over it the previous autumn, clearing it of all old grass and rubbish. To our left hand, the country rose gradually into a higher ridge; the gentle swells over which we were passing rising and merging into it; while they sloped down and sank into the low and timbered district to our right. Away on beyond this "dividing ridge" a dimly blue line marked the timber boundary of the prairie on that side. Sprightly little ground-squirrels were frisking about; and, when alarmed at our too near approach, would scamper away to the entrance of their burrows; then they would stop and stand up on their hind feet, as straight and still as a surveyor's stake four or five inches high, then after a few moments' look at us, with a shrill, rattling chirrup they would dive into their holes, which entered the sod in true ground-squirrel fashion, without the slightest suspicion of loose earth about their entrance. They are pretty little animals with dark and light-brown longitudinal stripes, and a row of round spots on each side of their bodies. A gray squirrel would occasionally appear. Their habits were similar to the striped ones, but their appearance much like the gray squirrels of the eastern woods.

Away on the ridge to our left, a flock of prairie-chickens (Pinnated Grouse) were busily engaged in their morning parade. We heard their strange monotonous drumming for the first time, and saw them jumping and flitting about—sights and sounds very familiar in after years. A small new house stood on a beautiful billow of the prairie, a little farther on our way; and, as my sister spoke of being thirsty, one of the party offered to go to the house and get water. This called forth the question as to how far it was, and it was variously guessed at from a quarter to a half mile, but the scheme of going there for water was soon abandoned when the driver assured us that the house was full two miles away. Thus we began to learn how very deceptive apparent distances are in these plains.

We rounded the little cape of woodland that bordered the swollen stream, and crossed several broad grassy "sloughs" as every hollow between the billowy ridges of the prairie is called. These gave drainage to many miles of country, and united to form the little stream, before mentioned. They were now covered with water finding its way slowly through the young grass and over the rough lumpy sod; for the grass in wet places grows more or less in bunches forming "tussocks," but much of the year these bottoms are dry and make beautiful meadows, though frequently some are met with that are sloughs indeed. I have crossed them in Linn County and other places when I could shake the boggy earth for ten rods around me. Horses and cattle frequently mire down and are lost in such sloughs.

Everywhere upon the border of the timber-land a fringe of hazel-brush is found; it is the hardy forerunner of the woods. In its persistent hardihood it creeps out and continually encroaches on the prairies, killing the grass and checking and usually stopping the annual fires, and sheltering and protecting the young timber which in turn grows up and kills out the hazel. Thus almost everywhere, in approaching the woods from the prairies, we enter a thicket of hazel some rods in breadth, then find it interspersed with thorn, wild plum, crab-apple and other of the most hardy trees; then we find young cotton-wood, quaking asp, walnuts of both kinds, oaks, elms, hickory of three varieties, ash, and many other of the most beautiful and useful timbers. The earliest settlers of these countries almost always open their farms along the edge of the timber, thus building their homes in its shelter, and tilling the fertile and ready cleared prairies. So now we passed into new settlements near the woodland and finally to our destination.

For "The Friend."

∞ The well written communication in No. 15, present volume, of "The Friend," signed S. C. M., we trust, will be the means of promoting a more general perusal, and careful comparison of the different parts of that best of all books—the Bible.

An intelligent resident of our village who has now passed his 89th summer, a short time since came across a book once belonging to his mother, (and who does not prize any thing which revives the remembrance of a pious mother?) which he kindly loans for my perusal. As stated on title-page, "Published by Joseph Sharpless, at Rosemount, half a mile above Callowhill street, on the Ridge Road, 1809." Our aged friend, once a resident of this city, thinks at that date this must have been in the outskirts of the town. Being much interested in the work, with approbation of the Editor, I would like to offer a short extract for insertion in "The Friend." Though written in reference to England, the following so nearly represents the condition of our own country at the present time, that it is offered with but slight alteration and omission to suit the case.

ver framing in which the "golden" apples of truth are presented; and their beauty is admitted by all. Yet it pleases the Head of the Church to call into his service as ministers of the Gospel, many on whom these qualities have been bestowed only in small measure. If these "preach the preaching" which He bids them, the Divine blessing may make their unpolished sentences as fruitful in good results, as the utterances of those who are more eminently gifted with oratorical powers.

It is related of that eminent minister, Catharine Phillips of Cornwall, England, that she attended a circular Yearly Meeting held at Exeter, in which she had acceptable service. There was present at the same time Mehetabel Jenkins of New England, who had crossed the ocean on a religious visit. She too had something to say, and delivered a short, plain, simple, testimony. This gave some uneasiness to an elder who was present, who probably feared lest her simple and unadorned words should lessen the effect on the audience of the impressive discourse of Catharine Phillips. He seemed concerned for the good order of things, and mentioned the subject to Timothy Bevington of London, an esteemed minister who was there, and suggested that it might be well to admonish Mehetabel not to disturb such large public gatherings; remarking at the same time that her gift appeared to be better adapted to small meetings for members only. Timothy replied, that he thought no harm had been done.

It so occurred that Timothy had invited a very respectable citizen to attend the meeting. The man met him, and thanked him for the treat that had been afforded him. T. Bevington replied, that he was pleased that he had been so well satisfied, and added that his friend, Catharine Phillips, was considered a great minister. "Yes sir," said the man, "we know Mrs. Phillips is a very sensible woman. We therefore are not surprised to hear her preach a good sermon; but what the elderly lady from America said was far more weighty and suited to my situation of mind than anything Mrs. Phillips had to say. I hope to be thankful as long as I live for the great instruction and sensible feeling of Divine goodness I experienced under the sweet, though short sermon, of your friend from America."

Copper speaks of the fashionable world as drawing gross sensuality through the golden tube of refinement; "The neat conveyance hiding all the offence;" but there are some fastidious people who seem scarcely willing to receive the most important spiritual truths, unless they are conveyed to them through a similar tube. Such unwise ones may find instruction in an anecdote of Rowland Hill. In advanced life he made a tour in Yorkshire, in the course of which he paid a visit to an old friend of his, who said to him: "Mr. Hill, it is just 65 years since I first heard you preach, and I remember your text, and part of your sermon." "Tis more than I do," was the reply. "You told us," his friend proceeded, "that some people were very squeamish about the delivery of different ministers, who preached the same Gospel. You said, 'Suppose you were attending to hear a will read, where you expected a legacy to be left to you, would you employ the time when it was reading in criticising the manner in which the lawyer read it? No, you would not; you would be giving all ear to hear if anything was left to you, and how much it was. That is the way I would advise you to hear the Gospel.'" J. W.

The self-denying man is a pilgrim to a brighter and better land.

"An evident revival of the spirit of religion in our churches, and also in those who dissent from them—the decline of bigotry—the cordial union of pious individuals belonging to different religious communities and their friendly co-operation in the same benevolent undertakings—the erection of societies 'for the suppression of vice,' and the increase of schools for the religious instruction of indigent children—the establishment of many other institutions for the more general diffusion of religious knowledge in our land, and for imparting the blessings of Christianity to heathen nations, and, above all, the formation of societies for the more extensive dispensation of the Holy Scriptures in the world, and for promoting their translation into languages through which revelation hath not permanently spoken to man—all these considerations and a variety of others which might be enumerated are not the features of a country forsaken of the Almighty and given to be a prey to its enemies, but are rather encouraging indications of his gracious and paternal favor towards us."

"Still, when we reverse the picture and seriously reflect upon the spirit of infidelity which pervades, and the abominable immoralities which over-spread our country, it is impossible not to feel that we are justly exposed to the wrath and indignation of heaven. The profanation of the name of God, Sabbath-breaking, neglect of religious duties, contempt of genuine piety, swearing, perjuries, drunkenness, adultery, prostitutions, &c., and such an inordinate pursuit of earthly things as absorbs all due regard to those of a future state, are impieties and vices that dreadfully prevail in the different classes of the community; and which, while they exclude from the divine favor the individuals who are justly chargeable with such enormities, are secretly operating as so many principles of dissolution in the great social edifice of our country, tending to diminish the security of our civil and religious privileges.

* * * If these remarks are unfortunately but too applicable to the community at large, it is at least consolatory to reflect, that in all classes of it there are many bright and excellent examples of genuine piety and virtue. Still it may be said, 'what are these among so many?' Yet few as they comparatively are, they constitute the salt of our country; and

'This salt preserves us; more corrupted else,
And therefore more obnoxious, at this hour
Than Sodom in her day had pow'r to be,
For whom God heard his Abra'm plead in vain.'

The small book in question is only of 144 pages, and is entitled "The Destruction of Jerusalem, An Absolute and Irresistible Proof of the Divine Origin of Christianity," &c., and is one we can recommend for the careful perusal and candid consideration of both christian and infidel; being confirmatory to the one, and convincing to the other. It shows beyond controversy how every prediction of our divine Lord and Law-giver, respecting the destruction of Judea and Jerusalem was fulfilled to the letter.

Fire in a Mill.—A fire occurred recently in the Dark Run Woolen Mills at Frankford, Philadelphia, caused by some small particles of flying material being ignited at an electric light, and in this way communicating the flame to the web-like collections on the ceiling. The fire broke out in the card-room, and spread rapidly until the heat increased sufficiently to melt the solder on an automatic sprinkler, which opened and threw its spray about the room, extinguishing the flames.

The Baltic Tunnel.—The projected tunnel to connect Denmark with Sweden, is to start from the Ameger suburb of Copenhagen to the island of Salthorm, a distance of about five miles, where the air shafts will be established, and thence to Lemhamn in Sweden, a distance of about three miles. The depth of water is stated to nowhere exceed fifty feet, so that the tunnel would not be at any great depth. It is expected that the works will be completed in less than three years. The Swedish ports on the Sound are shallow, but with railway communication through the tunnel with Copenhagen, Sweden will be in direct communication with the continent of Europe.

Ghee.—The Ghee of India is prepared from fresh milk, by boiling, curdling and churning, till the butter is separated. This is boiled until all the water and curds have been thrown off. The clear oil is then poured into vessels to cool. If well-made it will keep good for years.

Where an English cook uses butter, suet or lard, the Indian uses ghee. It is believed by the Hindoos to be the purest eatable under the sun.

An Intelligent Dog.—Alice M. Muzzy contributes to the Christian Advocate some interesting anecdotes of a dog named Buck which had belonged to her grand-father, who resided near Waverly, N. Y. He was about the size of a large shepherd-dog, but had been crossed by an Indian breed, and his hair was not curly, but short and straight.

One of the things which he had taught himself was the bringing of articles to his mistress, when he wished to be rewarded with a bone.

"It was his custom to fill her large wood-box for her, and she rarely neglected to reward him accordingly. One day, however, feeling she was too busy to stop to get him any thing, she said, 'Buck, I have nothing for you.' He made little ado over the disappointment in an audible way by either barking or growling; but a short time afterward when his mistress entered her kitchen she found that her ingratitude had been visited upon her kitchen floor. Buck had gone to the wood-pile, and, finding some long charred sticks, had dragged one of them in over her newly scrubbed boards, soiling them sadly. She did not feel that very much time had been saved on that occasion; but, I presume, she did feel like administering a little of the stick which had been brought to her by the faithful reprover of her ingratitude; but he always discreetly absented himself from the family circle for a short interval after any such escapade.

"On one unfortunate day, however, Buck accidentally dropped one of his 'sticks' on an earthen jar that was drying upon the hearth. The value of the article was not great, but it happened to be a favorite, and his mistress reproved him with such a depth of feeling in her tones that Buck, always very sensitive to reproach, was overcome with emotion and howled with grief.

"Nothing was seen of him for several hours, and the family began to say: 'I wonder where Buck has gone?' Presently some one saw him coming slowly up the road, and as he drew near what was their amazement to perceive that he was bearing in his mouth an earthen jar! The explanation of his movements was instantly revealed. To show his sorrow and regain his mistress's lost esteem, Buck had gone to a pottery establishment nearly two miles away, and, unknown to the owner, had selected a jar that looked like the one he had broken, and quietly walked home with it.

"Dear old Buck! His love for his mistress got the better of his regard for the eighth commandment. The family very gladly sent over the price of the jar, you may be sure, and it was always regarded with a peculiar tenderness, especially after the giver was no more.

"At another time his master left his home one morning to go to a clearing, which was across a river to see about some wood. After crossing the river he stopped in a neighbor's house, and Buck stopped with him. Buck wandered off for a time, and while he was gone his master's hat blew away on to the river, and was lost. When Buck returned he kept looking uneasily at his master's head, and the instant his master said, 'Buck, go get me a hat,' he started off with all possible speed. To get home he must cross the river; so he waded in a short distance, when a new thought seemed to strike him, and he came back and started for the neighbor's house, at which he had stopped a short time before. He remembered having seen a hat there in the corner of the room, and in a very short time he appeared at his master's side, delightedly holding the hat in his mouth, wagging his tail, and when his master took the hat from his mouth, barking in excess of joy.

"But, however lightly Buck regarded the eighth commandment as a rule to regulate his own conduct, he was very emphatic in his endeavors to make other people adhere strictly to its teaching, especially in reference to anything belonging to the family. One day he came in his ramblings upon what he recognized as his master's yoke for oxen lying in a neighbor's field. He had not been present when the yoke was lent, probably, so he did not understand why it was there, and in order to see that no harm occurred he stationed himself upon it. The neighbor had left the yoke while he and his animals went to partake of their dinners, but on their return Buck refused to allow his master's property to be touched until the neighbor sent for some of the family to come and tell their faithful retainer that all was right."

—Prohibition in Atlanta.—Mayor Hillyar of Atlanta, under date of Tenth Mo. 26th, telegraphed to the New York Voice as to the effects of prohibition in that city:

"The good effects of prohibition here are apparent. Trade in all branches, except the whisky traffic, is prospering. There is marked improvement in the habits, the morals and the happiness of the people. Increased prosperity is admitted and rejoiced in, both as to private and public affairs. The attitude of the newspapers throughout the Union is greatly to be deprecated. Scores and hundreds of facts prove the efficacy of the law. Atlanta now has peaceful streets and happy homes, with sober husbands, sons and brothers, with plenty to eat and to wear, where before there were broken hearts, fear of domestic outrage and sometimes actual want. The great daily press abroad says nothing of the great good that has resulted, but if a hand-truck load of jugs is seen, which is no great matter to 60,000 people, this must be magnified into a 'jug train,' and the whole press of the United States made to ring with it.

"There is not one-tenth as much intoxicants drunk in Atlanta now as there was a year ago, possibly much less than that. Formerly the advocates of bar-rooms were numerous and powerful; now nobody advocates their restoration. Formerly the temperance issue was high license; now the very most that the opponents to total prohibition would contend for is high license. The bar-room nuisance has gone out from Atlanta forever, and we would like all the world to know it.

"We are determined to give total prohibition a fair trial under the law and are greatly strengthened and encouraged with it so far. Our people are already practically united in the belief that the bar-room will never come back. I only wish that the outside world could see the truth as we have it demonstrated here. They would thus escape the danger of being misled by the many exaggerated and prejudiced rumors that are published in other States on the subject."

"A Good War."—A commercial traveller said to an acquaintance, the other day, at an hotel, "Don't you think a good war would be just the thing to improve trade?" He presently added some bitter complaints as to the difficulty of making profits, in consequence of the heavy taxation, both imperial and local, which Englishmen have to pay.

The person thus addressed replied by asking some other questions. "Do you really think that there can be such a thing as a good war? Have you ever reflected on what war actually means—say to any one family that has a near relative in the army, whether husband, father, son or brother? Did you ever try to realize the horrible mangling and butchery of soldiers in battle, or the misery thus occasioned to themselves and their friends? And, further, is not the very burden of taxation, of which you justly complain, mainly a result of the costly follies of past wars?"

These few direct questions appeared to put the matter to the first speaker in a light which had not previously occurred to him. He had scarcely, if at all, reflected on the horrible nature of war itself, or on the intimate connection between it and ruinous taxation. And herein he is an example of hundreds of thousands of Englishmen who are regarded, amongst their neighbors, and by themselves, as thoughtful, intelligent men.

In consequence of the unnecessary conflicts which have already been waged by England, her agricultural population is so burdened with taxation, or with disadvantages of one kind and another, arising out of it, that it is now almost impossible for the English cultivator to compete successfully with the growers of corn in America, India, and other foreign countries. It is as certain as sunset, that every additional war, however "good," pecuniarily to the farmer, for a few months, will hang a still heavier weight of permanent taxation round his neck. This tends to paralyze both agriculture and general trade; hence for either a farmer or a commercial traveller to advocate "a good war," is a policy not only "penny wise and pound foolish," but even, in a great degree, suicidal.—The Herald of Peace.

—Free Methodists.—At a recent General Conference of Free Methodists, held in Michigan, it was decided by an almost unanimous vote, that every position in the Church should be open to women.

—The Employment of Ministers.—The London Friend of Eleventh Month, in commenting on the action of Iowa Yearly Meeting [Larger Body] in regard to ministry and pastoral work, refers to the proceedings of a recent Congregational Union in England, and of the discussions in it, as to "How best to choose a good Pastor, and how to get rid of one who does not give satisfaction." The report of this discussion he thinks would "prove as a revelation of what passes behind the scenes" to those Friends who are not acquainted with the difficulties of the Congregational system. He quotes the following points from a paper read to the Union, and from the remarks made by different speakers.

"In many cases church and minister are ill-matched; one does not suit the other."

"A great many ministers have been as long in their present spheres as it is well they should be."

"There ought to be a regular upward movement amongst us; a movement by which the inexperienced, beginning (as they should) at the bottom, may, as they gain experience and capacity, rise to more responsible and influential posts."

"Among the evils to be remedied, are 'the adventurers, unhampered by any scruples, that make their way into our pulpits and pastorates;' 'the large number of churches without a pastor;' and 'the larger number of unsettled ministers who are eagerly longing to be at work, but who have to choose between the alternative of remaining in enforced idleness, or resorting to means of securing a position at the expense of their own self-respect.'"

"I know a church that had 37 ministers before it in one year. They chose the last man, and not the best by any means."

"The best and most suitable man has by no means a certain chance of being elected to any vacant church. For too many candidates are invited, and the result is divisions; and the process goes on until a settlement is made. When the contending parties are exhausted, the lucky man who comes in at that crisis is chosen."

The Editor of the London Friend concludes by expressing the desire that Iowa and every other Yearly Meeting of Friends may be preserved from ever drifting into a position fraught with such dangers and difficulties.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 11, 1836.

The London Yearly Meeting Conference, 1836.—The action of this committee has already been referred to in our columns; but at the request of the author, Charles Thompson of Morland, England, a proof has been forwarded of an article on the subject, which he designed to insert in the British Friend for Twelfth Month. Some extracts from this may interest our readers. After stating that the Conference failed to agree upon any material change in the present mode of procedure, and that "the feeling of distrust has been rather accentuated than allayed," the article goes on to point out some of the causes which have led to the dissatisfaction with their present course, which exists in London Yearly Meeting.

"Those who regularly attend the Yearly Meeting know that year by year objections are frequently made distinctly on the ground of disunity with the practices which prevail in several of the Yearly Meetings with whom we correspond, and also of the injustice done to many dear Friends who, in order to maintain the principles professed by us, have felt obliged to break off from the older organizations, which disown or disregard those principles. The change is needed and has been advocated, because in some of these Yearly Meetings our views on what are termed 'the ordinances'—on the true call to and exercise of the ministry,—the mode of conducting our meetings for Divine worship, the freedom of Gospel ministry, (not only as regards objection to pay for preaching, which is now openly advocated), but against the 'one man system,' the introduction of congregational singing, and even instrumental music into meetings designed for the worship of God, are among the causes of uneasiness felt by many Friends, and against which they feel called upon energetically to protest by suggesting the withdrawal of official correspondence."

"The wide expression of sympathy with those with whom we do not correspond was very marked indeed. If the conference could have felt assured that any opening could be found for addressing these without at the same time discontinuing our present correspondence, perhaps it might have ventured on such a step; but the ever-present fear of 'being isolated like Philadelphia,' seems to be the guiding influence with many of our leaders. Now, with regard to Philadelphia, with whom there is great desire to reopen correspondence, it appears to be forgotten, if it was ever known to English Friends of to-day, that her present position is of her own choosing! She ceased to send us the annual official letter by which correspondence is recognized, before London Yearly Meeting took that step towards her, and did so, probably, in the exercise of a sound judgment for reasons which were fully understood at the time."

"Very significant were the confessions of mistakes made by our Yearly Meeting with regard to its decisions in connection with separations in American Yearly Meetings during the last thirty years, and the conflicting principles upon which those decisions were arrived at, especially in the cases of Ohio (1855), Western (1877), and Canada (1881). These came before London Yearly Meeting through epistes addressed to it by two bodies of Friends in each case, whilst the other and smaller divisions in other Yearly Meetings have not hitherto offered us correspondence. It seems clear that the recognition of the smaller body, the seceders, in Ohio (1855) has led to all that has followed, including the suspension of correspondence with Philadelphia."

The statement of Charles Thompson, that the last epistle which passed between Philadelphia and London Yearly Meetings was sent by the latter body, is correct; but the suspension of epistolary correspondence between Philadelphia Yearly Meeting and most of those which then existed on this continent, was the act of these Yearly Meetings—New York, Baltimore, North Carolina and Indiana, having each officially declined further correspondence, because Philadelphia could not recognize as the legitimate Yearly Meeting of Ohio, what is known among us as the Binns' Body.

In an Editorial article in "The Friend" of Eighth Mo. 7th, 1836, reference was made to the withdrawal from membership of some of the members of Ohio and Philadelphia Yearly Meetings, because those meetings "were not prepared to adopt the course of action which seemed right" to these individuals. That Editorial contained the following statement:—"Yet both of these Yearly Meetings had borne open testimony against the doctrinal errors to which these persons were opposed, and have never retracted that testimony, but have continued to labor for the maintenance of the original principles of our Society."

We have received a letter commenting on this statement, in which the writer expresses his opinion that the testimony borne by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in the "Appeal for Ancient Doctrines," issued in 1847, has since been "retracted and set at naught." The reasons for this opinion appear to be, that the doors of our business meetings have not been kept closed against persons who came from meetings which were conducted in an un-Friendly manner; and that persons have been excluded from our meetings for discipline who had been disowned because of their open testimony in favor of the principles and practices of the Society of Friends.

Our correspondent appears to be under the impression that the sympathy and influence of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of latter years has been exerted in favor of those departures it formerly witnessed against; and against those Friends who continue to oppose them. We regret that he or any others should be so mistaken.

Those who are familiar with what transpires in our borders know, that the sympathy of our members is largely extended to those Friends who are endeavoring in their various locations, to support the original principles of the Society; and that when such come among us, as they do from nearly all parts of the world where Friends reside, they are welcomed as brethren of the same faith, and encouraged faithfully to maintain their allegiance to the cause of Truth. If any such have been advised not to attend our meetings for discipline, the cases must have been very few, and the advice has been founded on some other ground than their maintenance of sound principle. On the other hand, many of those who are known to be advocates of doctrines and practices against which we have a testimony to bear, have been labored with on account of their course, and given to understand that there is not an open door for them in our limits.

We are aware that in the present unsettled state of the Society of Friends, and amid the confusion consequent on the rapid changes which are taking place, there has not been so strict an observance as formerly of the practice of keeping meetings for business closed to those whose right of membership might be called in question. Separations have taken place in divers places; and the members of rival organizations come together in our meetings; and will probably continue to do so, until Philadelphia Yearly Meeting sees an opening to enter upon an examination of the respective cases, and decide which have rightful claims to recognition. But the fact that the members of all in the meantime are admitted to our meetings for business does not seem to us, under the circumstances, to be any evidence that we have "retracted and set at naught" a testimony solemnly borne, and frequently reiterated in strong and clear language. Neither do we think any such inference can be justly drawn from the occasional presence of members of bodies whose claims to be regarded as regularly organized branches of the Society of Friends, have been rejected by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting; as was the case with that known among us as the Binns' Body in Ohio—especially when such have been notified that their attendance is contrary to our order.

After reviewing the subject, we believe that we were correct in saying that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has not "retracted" its testimony against doctrinal errors, but has "continued to labor for the maintenance of the original principles of the Society." And we believe also that its repeated appeals to its members and others, which have been issued of latter years, are the outgrowth of an honest concern, and have been sent forth in a sincere spirit.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Both Houses of Congress met in the Capitol on the 6th instant. The President's Message was received and read in each of them. The President hopes that before the close of the present session of Congress, an acceptable conclusion will be reached in the matter of the fisheries difficulties with Canada. Our relations with other foreign governments are mostly appropriately discussed. The expenses of our Government the last fiscal year have been $17,788,757 less than the previous year. A revision of the tariff is recommended with the view of lessening the revenue, and a suspension of the law requiring the coinage of the standard silver dollar. Fortification of our coast is advocated, and legislation on the Labor question advised.

The pension roll increased 21,000 during the last year.

The public debt statement shows a decrease of $3,005,249 for Eleventh Month. Total cash in the Treasury, $439,023,740.

The President has issued a proclamation, dated Eleventh Mo. 3rd, promulgating the extradition treaty with Japan, which was ratified after having been amended by the Senate last Sixth Month.

Cases involving the constitutionality of the Dow liquor tax law, brought from Cleveland, Cincinnati and Troy, were argued on the 3rd instant, in the Supreme Court of Ohio. A decision is expected in about two weeks.

Officers of the Secret Service recently seized a facsimile painting on a wooden block of a five-dollar United States note, as being a violation of the laws against counterfeiting. The painting was so well done that it looked as though the note was lying on the wood and could easily be removed. The artist represented that the painting was a work of art and was worth about $500. The question has been referred to the Solicitor of the Treasury. It is understood that a number of these paintings are in existence.

The abundance of the salt formations in Nevada is illustrated by the asserted fact that in Lincoln County there is a deposit of pure rock salt which is exposed for a length of two miles, a width of half a mile, and is of unknown depth; in places canons are cut through it to a depth of sixty feet, and not only has the deposit been traced on the surface for a distance of nine miles, but it is so solid in places as to require blasting like rock, and so pure and transparent that print can be read through blocks of it some inches thick.

The growth of Atlanta, Ga., as a manufacturing town is shown by these figures from the Constitution. In the past five years Atlanta has nearly doubled her shops and factories, their number increasing from 196 to 302. Capital invested has risen from $2,468,456 to $6,560,000; employés in shops from 3865 to 6674. In 1880, $889,282 was paid in wages, and in 1885, $2,425,000. This growth would be surprising in five years of unbroken prosperity. At least three of the five years have been of universal depression.

There were two slight earthquake shocks in Charleston, South Carolina, on the morning of the 2d instant, the first at one o'clock, the second at eight. Eight slight shocks were felt at Summerville during the night, and a severe one was felt at Columbia at eight o'clock in the morning.

Professor Forbes, the State Entomologist of Illinois, has just finished a thorough examination of the wheat-growing counties in the southern part of that State, where losses have been caused by the ravages of chinch bugs. "He finds that the infested area has largely increased during the year," and "considers the outlook in consequence very gloomy for the 1887 wheat crop in that section, unless some unusual state of the weather should destroy the brood while hatching."

Governor-elect Seay, of Alabama, was installed on the 1st instant. In his inaugural address he declared himself in favor of Federal aid to education in the States, saying that "the general Government had put upon suffrage in Alabama an enormous load of ignorance in the shape of colored voters, and should come to the State's assistance in educating such voters." A bill is now pending in the Legislature appropriating $40,000 for a monument to Alabama's Confederate dead. Governor Seay "questioned the wisdom of erecting monuments in commemoration of civil strife; but, aside from that, he emphatically opposed any expenditures by the State for a monument to the dead until the wants of the needy survivors should be amply provided for."

A telegram from St. Louis says that a syndicate of capitalists of that city has been formed for the purpose of establishing an immense cattle ranch in Mexico. The ranch will comprise 1,250,000 acres in what is known as the Freezing Zone, in the State of Chihuahua, and will cost the syndicate more than $500,000. It is well watered and convenient to the railroads. An effort will be made to raise a better class of cattle than ordinarily produced in the Southwest, and blooded stock will be crossed with native.

The total number of deaths in the city last week was 392, against 404 for the week previous, and 100 more than the corresponding month one year ago. Of these 201 were males and 191 females; 43 died of consumption; 42 of pneumonia; 26 of diseases of the heart; 22 of croup; 17 of inflammation of the brain; 15 of marasmus; 13 of apoplexy, and 13 of convulsions.

Markets.—U. S. 4½'s 110½; 4's, registered, 128½; coupon, 129½; 3's, 100½; currency 6's, 123½ 133.

Cotton.—Spinners bought sparingly on a basis of 9½ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum was quiet but steady, at 7 cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Feed was firm and in light supply. Quotations—Bran, west, winter, spot, per ton, $16.25 a $16.75; bran, spring, spot, $15 a $15.50; red middlings, $15 a $16; white middlings, $16.50 a $18.50.

Flour and Meal.—Flour was active and strong, with an upward tendency. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania family, at $3.75; 500 barrels Ohio clear, at $4 a $4.20; 750 barrels do. straight, at $4.25; 375 barrels do. do., at $4.50; 625 barrels winter patent, at $4.50 a $4.75; 372 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4 a $4.15; 500 barrels do., straight, at $4.25 a $4.60; 900 barrels do. patent, at $4.90 a $5, and 375 barrels do., at $5.10. Rye flour quiet but steady, at $3.25 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat has been advancing in price the past week. No. 2 red closing at 8½ cts. bid and 8½ cts. asked. Rye was steady at 58 cts. per bushel for No. 2 Penna. No. 2 mixed corn closed at 46½ cts. bid, and 46 cts. asked. Oats were firm and higher—No. 2 white closing at 37½ cts. bid and 37½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were dull and lower, at 2½ a 5½ cts. Sheep were ¼c. higher, except for common, at 2½ a 5½ cts.

Hogs were ¼ to ½c. higher, at 6 a 6½ cts. for western. Lambs were unchanged, at 3½ a 6½ cts. The receipts were: Beesves, 3000; sheep, 10,000 hogs, 9500.

FOREIGN.—The London Daily News, commenting on that part of President Cleveland's message referring to the fisheries question, says: "The two governments ought not to allow themselves rest until they have aranged the question. The difficulty seems to be that America wants fishing while New England does not want free trade. The same insatiable greed for protection underlies the difficulty about the disposal of the surplus revenue. Protection will die hard in America. It is, however, beginning to be regarded with increasing popular distrust. The proposed revision of the tariff may be the beginning of the end."

United Ireland publishes a legal opinion given by Hugh Holmes, Attorney General of Ireland, to the Government as to its right to suppress the new movement of the Irish National League, which aims to beat the landlords by having tenants deposit with a trustee for tender such sums below the demanded rents as the tenants believe fair and are able to pay. The line of action which the landlords proposed to have the Government adopt to crush out this form of resistance was to arrest every person who should act as trustee, thus rendering the League's plan of paying rent futile, the landlords' agents being, of course, debarred from accepting tenders below the landlords' figures. Attorney General Holmes says men have legal right to act as trustees for tenants as proposed by the League, and the Government has no right to arrest them for so acting. Holmes also advises the landlords to seek some method of getting their moneys from tenants which will not involve Government assistance.

The Government has obtained from the law officers of the Crown at Dublin opinions to the effect that both tenants, trustees and others conspiring to defraud landlords of one rent are liable to indictment under the common law.

A riot occurred in the city of Cork on the 5th inst., on the occasion of the delivery of a speech in the street by William O'Brian. The police were stoned, and they in turn charged upon the rioters. A number of persons were injured.

Spain, after a long and difficult diplomatic controversy, protracted largely through the hostile spirit of the German military authorities, has finally succeeded in inducing Prince Bismarck to abandon his proposal to establish a naval station at the Caroline Islands.

Negotiations have been renewed for a special treaty to regulate trade between the United States and the Spanish West Indies, the Government at Washington no longer insisting upon the exclusion of other nations from the favored nation privilege. The Spanish Government is preparing to largely reduce the West Indian tariffs and reform the harbor and customs regulations whether a treaty with the United States be arranged or not.

France and Mexico have concluded a treaty of commerce.

In the German Reichstag, on the 4th instant, the "Military Septennate Bill" was discussed. General Von Moltke made an appeal for a unanimous vote in favor of the military bill which made a deep impression and is said to have converted many opponents of the measure. It is considered certain that the bill will be passed.

London, 12th Mo. 6th.—Count Von Moltke's speech in the Reichstag has made a deep impression in Europe, overshadowing all other topics. The Vienna Algemeine says that Von Moltke drew a picture so dark that the idea of war is almost a deliverance; that peace between France and Germany is now almost impossible, and that a terrible gulf yawns in Central Europe.

The Porte has issued a circular to the Powers to the effect that the Sultan assents to the candidacy of Prince Nicholas of Mingrelia for the Bulgarian throne, and invites the Powers to cooperate for a speedy settlement of the Bulgarian question.

It is reported by a member of the Dominion Geological Survey staff, investigating the coal deposits in the Saskatchewan region, "that the coal supply in the Northwest is absolutely inexhaustible. The whole district lying between Rocky Mountain House and Fort Pitt is one vast series of coal beds, both hard and soft, of the best quality."

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Fifth Mo. 26th, 1842. Think I never sat down in meeting more stripped and emptied; such a heavy feeling, that I feared drowsiness would overcome me. After being thus made to feel my own weakness, a little strength was given to cry unto the Lord; and O! the comfortable assurance, that He did hear, and would deliver from all fear, if there was only a looking unto Him, and Him alone. Strengthen, O Heavenly Father! the covenants entered into this day; for without thy holy help vain will they be.

27th. A feeling of much quietness hath attended throughout this day; and I may say this evening my heart overflows with gratitude for the Lord's mercies, "which are new every morning."

30th. Toiling all day long, yet taking nothing.

Sixth Mo. 3rd. Attended Concord Monthly Meeting. Till near the close of the last meeting, O how tempted and tossed was my lot! then the cry was raised, "Save, Lord, or I perish."

5th. I sat down after breakfast to my reading, but couldn't get along; so closed my book, and wrestled with many tears. The burden of sin and iniquity seemed too heavy to be borne. But by and by I was comforted in remembering that Jesus came to save sinners. We have several of the Visiting Committee with us, among whom is our dear friend Wm. Evans, who was strengthened and enabled to preach the everlasting gospel. He was led in the first place to address very tenderly, tried and discouraged states who had been made afresh to feel their utter helplessness and dependence, vileness, and great deformity; so much so that they had been made to abhor themselves. We were shown how necessary these humiliating seasons were, in order that we might be completely emptied, and no flesh might glory. As these kept the word of the Lord's patience, He would keep them in the hour of temptation, so that we ought to look upon such seasons as blessings from Him. He knew it was pleasanter to us to sit and hear the gracious words which proceed from Him, but it would not do always to be thus fed, or words to this import. Enlarging further in a very instructive manner. Another class was closely spoken to; some who had, through continual disobedience and giving way to temptation, caused themselves many sorrows; and were travelling along under great condemnation, "Blushing and confusion of face" were often their portion; their iniquities separating them from their God, and their sins hiding his face from them. These, he believed, had known in days past an advancement; but for want of holding fast their allegiance, he feared they were about ready to turn back "like a deceitful bow." But instead of this, if they would only cleave unto the Lord, looking unto Him and Him alone, He would subdue their enemies, fight all their battles, and make them conquerors over their soul's enemies. He said that it was no time to be breaking our ranks; it was a low time, and we need all to be upon our watch, or the enemy would enter, who is seeking to lay waste and destroy, &c., &c. If ever my state was spoken unto, it has been this day. The dear children, too, were tenderly addressed; so that we have all of us renewed cause to be thankful; and if there is not an improvement, greater will be our condemnation.

10th. Was awakened last night with a storm, accompanied with heavy thunder and lightning. It made me feel very solemn, not knowing but in the twinkling of an eye, I might be summoned to the awful bar of justice; and O! the conviction, that all was not in readiness. But it has pleased Him, in whose hands are our lives, to cause me to see the light of another day. May I be helped to live it aright. Thou alone, O Heavenly Father! can give ability to do so.

23rd. At our meeting had the company and labors of dear Sarah Hillman. "See, the smell of my son is the smell of a field which the Lord hath blessed." Since taking her seat this language of Isaac, when blessing his son, was brought to remembrance. Expressed her belief that this place was a field the Lord was blessing. Her concern for us was that we might be found walking worthy, &c. To the children her language was impressive. It seemed to me there are many of them better than some of us placed over them. I feel my own shortcomings.

30th. Think I never experienced such brokenness of spirit as during our meeting this morning. It seemed as though I could have wept aloud. I often feel myself like a very fool, and ready at times to query, Why is it thus with me? have ever any trod a similar path? If it will only render meet for an entrance into a kingdom of rest and peace when done with time here, I am willing to "go softly all the days of my life" in bitterness of soul, enduring all the turnings and overturnings necessary.

Seventh Mo. 3rd. Thou knowest, O Heavenly Father! the secret travail and exercise of my spirit. "O, send out thy light and thy truth: let them lead me; let them bring me into thy holy hill, and to thy tabernacles."

4th. Prayer hath arisen, that I may be kept and brought through "all the days that are appointed."

6th. Sadness hath accompanied throughout this day. Enabled to intercede, before retiring to rest, for strength to withstand an enemy who is watching continually for my weaknesses, and at times coming in like a flood, as though he would sweep all before him.

10th. Given afresh to feel this morning, that it is not by any strength of my own, a careful walking or a comfortable day is enjoyed. Feel stripped and emptied, so that my heart sinks within me. Would that all my thoughts, words and actions might tend to the glory of God. Went to our meeting under these feelings. Upon gathering into silence, the comfortable language seemed to be sounded: "I am in the midst;" "My strength is made perfect in weakness." Enabled to lift up my soul in prayer.

11th. A beautiful morning, after a long dull spell. A fresh cause for gratitude to our Bountiful Giver. From many hearts no doubt it has arisen; while others, I fear, have gone forth to their labor—it being harvest-time—without even once remembering who it is that has caused the sun again to brighten upon us. O, how can any be so forgetful of that Hand, which is so often widely opened! "Thou crownest the year with thy goodness, and all thy paths drop fatness," &c.

The following are extracts from a letter of A. W. H., dated Seventh Mo. 11th, 1842:

"Thou wishes to know how S. Emlen is! she improves slowly, but hope this fine day will have a bracing effect. We miss her much, particularly at our meetings; having so few elderly Friends. Although her voice was not often heard amongst us, there was a secret travail and exercise, which was a strength to the body. The company of such is a great blessing to an assembly. We are told "the prayers of the righteous avail much." Our meetings of latter time have been held in silence, except a few words spoken by a Friend from the city. In her little offering yesterday, she said, 'It was the littleness, the lowness of our dear Lord's appearance, that so many were offended at. If there was only a willingness to receive Him in the way of his coming, what would He not do for us! even to lead on step by step,' &c. To me it felt precious. It is a great privilege to be able to attend meetings; but we must ever remember that our going will avail little, if there is not an endeavor on our part to labor for ourselves. For, as says a pious writer, to act a slothful and unconcerned part on these solemn occasions, argues a total absence of devotional feeling. Will the harvest be gathered without labor? Will the reward be given without service? Will the Almighty bestow to those who ask not, or be found of those who seek not, or open the treasures of his kingdom to those who do not knock? Nay, we must be sincere, industrious, fervent and persevering, laboring with all might through his Spirit in the inner man for the blessing. If there is any difference between the efficacy of our meetings for worship in these days and those of our ancestors; if we too seldom hear individuals in the present age say, with Barclay: 'When I went into the silent assemblies of God's people, I felt a secret power among them which touched my heart, and as I gave way unto it, I found the evil weakening in me and the good raised up;' if the truly devotional among us have now harder labor and less consolation; if the ungodly sit without conviction, and the lukewarm without fear, is it not because we have less of that among us which is a savor of life unto life, and of death unto death? is it not because we have less exercise of soul before the Lord? less vehemence of desire, less perseverance of supplication in spirit? Was the Almighty more gracious to our forefathers than He would be to us, if we were what they were? Would his power be less felt in our meetings than in theirs, if there was amongst us the same hunger and thirst after righteousness, the same earnest concern and devotedness of soul? No! for the Lord is no respecter of persons; and if when met together in his name, we were but fervent enough in spirit, who can doubt but that our assemblies would again become, in a signal manner the place of his presence and power."

"I do think with thee, that K. Scott's view respecting this school (Westtown) is correct; and desire we may live so near the source of life, as to be able to promote the growth of the good seed of the kingdom in the hearts of the children. I know they are quick-sighted, and how needful it is a right example be set before them! May I be preserved from doing any thing to hinder its growth, if I am not able to forward it."

14th. I thought this morning while sitting silently in our little meeting, what a privilege to meet thus together! and if nothing more than a state of waiting be attained, it is an unspeakable favor. John Churchman says: "To be preserved inwardly watchful and quietly resigned to wait upon the Lord, though we partake not of immediate consolation by the renewing of life, is a great blessing, for which we ought to be thankful; as we cannot stay our own minds, nor curb our thoughts without divine aid."

18th. Previous to our meeting yesterday, I was made deeply to feel the weaknesses and infirmities of poor nature; so that I could say with Job, "even to-day is my complaint bitter;" and "O that I knew where I might find Him! that I might come even to his seat!" Under the above feelings I assembled with our large family for the solemn purpose of worshipping Him who alone knows the secrets of every heart. I was borne down under a sense of the exceeding sinfulness of sin, hardly daring to look toward the Lord's holy temple. My past life was opened like a book before me; and as I silently viewed it, my heart sank within me; but, the remembrance that "there is mercy with Thee, and plenteous redemption," gave fresh confidence to look toward his holy temple; entreating for an evidence of forgiveness. And if I am to be perfected through deeper sufferings than ever yet experienced, O spare not till all is made meet for acceptance: only be thou pleased, Heavenly Father, to be with me.

Toad-stools and their Allies.

As I was passing by the yard of a friend on the 29th of Seventh Month, he called me to look at some small white toad-stools which had attracted his attention, not from any peculiarity in their form or color, but because they grew in a definite curved line, forming about half a circle. The damp weather which had prevailed for much of the past week or two, evidently favored the growth of this form of vegetation, for fungi of this and other forms may now be found in many places; but it was somewhat of a puzzle to determine why this cluster was arranged in a single row, and why there were no others among the adjacent grass. Finally my friend remembered that a Locust tree formerly stood near by, which had been cut down, and that one of the roots might have followed the line now marked out by the toad-stools. This appeared to explain the phenomenon, since it is well-known that many of the fungi, such as toad-stools, derive their nourishment from decaying vegetable matter. The fine dust-like seeds from which they spring, float through the atmosphere, and when they alight on a spot where their food is to be found and the state of the weather is favorable, they grow and produce the toad-stool or other fungus from which they originally sprang.

Fungi are very widely distributed over the earth, and though less attractive to most persons than those forms of vegetation which bear the exquisitely shaped and tinted flowers which charm the eye of the beholder, yet they are full of interest to those who closely examine them; and they play a very important part in the economy of nature. They consist essentially of three parts—the spawn or mycelium, which is a mass of branching threads, corresponding to the roots of other plants, and which in many species is buried from sight in the substance from which the plant derives its nourishment; the visible growing part, which springs from this spawn or mycelium, or root, such as the stem and its umbrella-like top in the toad-stools which I saw in my friend's yard, or in the common and well-known mushroom, and which is designed to produce the seed; and lastly the seed itself, or spores as they are called. The seeds of all the higher orders of the vegetable kingdom contain an embryo or germ, which is the part that first begins to grow and sends out a tiny rootlet. But the seed of a Fungus has no such germ, but consists of a cell with a double coat. It is this difference in structure which has led to giving it the name of spore, to distinguish it from the more highly organized seed of flowering plants. These spores are generally very small, and when I looked at the toad-stool I picked up, I could see no trace of them. Yet they are produced in great abundance. The underside of the umbrella-shaped cap of the toad-stool is covered with numerous thin plates, like gills, hanging down and running from the centre stem to the outer edge of the cap. On these plates the spores are developed.

A few days after examining the toad-stools in my friend's yard, I picked up several other kinds in a walk through a damp piece of woodland; and selecting a plant which appeared to be about fully developed, I cut off the stem, and placed the umbrella-like top on a piece of white paper, covering it with an inverted tumbler to avoid dust and the agitation of the air. On looking at it a day or so afterward, I found on the paper faint rows of ridges radiating from a centre, and corresponding in position to the gills on the under side of the toad-stool. On taking, with the point of a pen-knife, a small portion of the material thus deposited on the paper, and placing it under a microscope, I found it was a mass of innumerable minute oblong cells—the spores or seeds of the plant—individually seeming nearly transparent, and collectively presenting the appearance of a white powder.

My curiosity being excited by these observations, I referred to a botanical work,—Berkeley's Description of British Fungi,—and found that the toad-stools belong to the first of the six great families into which the myriad forms of these lower orders of vegetable life have been arranged. In this family the surface which produces the spores is exposed to the air; in the toad-stool and mushroom it lines the surface of the gills. The plants I had been examining belong to the tribe

Agarics, a word derived from the Greek name for mushroom, which contains more than 1000 species, varying in size, color, shape and other peculiarities. In the edible Mushroom, the top is a dull white on the outside, and the gills beneath are flesh-colored. In the species which first attracted my notice, the gills were of the same white color as the rest of the plant. Among the kinds which I picked up in the woods (as before mentioned) was a small one that was a bright red throughout; another was white above and of a delicate violet tint below. One clump that came up at the edge of the pavement in our village street, was quite tender in its structure, so as to be easily broken, and had black gills under its white top. One of these, also, I placed under a glass, to obtain from it the ripened spores, but it all melted down into a filthy black liquid, swarming with maggots, probably from eggs which some fly had deposited upon it. This experience impressed upon my mind another distinction among these Agarics, i. e., that some are deliquescent, or melting; while others are more persistent. The same lesson was taught me to-day, while looking over the contents of a plant box, which had remained undisturbed for a few days. On taking out one of the plants, my hand was smeared with a black paste, the source of which I soon traced to a fungus that had been placed there and forgotten, and had melted down, according to the habit of its species.

The spores of the different members of the mushroom family are not all of the same color. The bright red species which I found in the woods, when placed on a sheet of paper, left its trace in lines of orange spores which were deposited by the gills on its under surface. Another variety produced brown spores. Indeed this difference in color of the seeds or spores is one of the characters used by botanists in distinguishing the different species.

A striking feature in many of the fungi is the rapidity of their growth, and the quickness with which they decay and disappear. In a single night a crop of toad-stools will spring up, and in a few days all will have matured their spores and withered or melted away. There are other kinds, however, which are of slower growth, and possess greater solidity and persistence. J. W.

For "The Friend."

The Abounding of Iniquity.

When Christ was personally among men, He taught that before the winding up of the gospel dispensation false prophets should arise and deceive many. "And because iniquity shall abound the love of many shall wax cold; but he that endureth unto the end, the same shall be saved." Does not iniquity abound now? And is not the love of many waxing cold in the ways of religion and God? So that the ways of truth are evi spoken of; and many have become lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God. And hence, the abomination that makes pure and undefiled religion desolate is gaining an easy access amongst us, and is often seen standing in the holy places receiving the praise of the credulous and deluded audience. May we not look upon these things as the beginning of sorrows which are spoken of in the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew; and which are to come to pass in the last days, to more effectually try them that dwell upon the earth? For "many false prophets shall arise and shall deceive many." And such as oppose them, "shall be hated of all nations for his name's sake."

But if iniquity does abound in the unbelieving world, are we, the professed believers in Christianity, redeemed from all iniquity? This is a question which should seriously impress us all, as our salvation depends upon it. Or, if we have been in measure redeemed, do we not, many of us, so mingle with and participate in the iniquity that abounds, as to, in a great degree lose our first love, or suffer it to wax cold?

If we find that we are still indulging in the lusts of the flesh, the lust of the eyes or the pride of life, which are not of the Father, but of the world that lies in wickedness and abounds in iniquity, would not that tell us, if we would listen to it, that we are not yet fully redeemed, and that we have something still to do before we are prepared to enter the joys of heaven: or if we find that "all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil speaking, be not put away from us, with all malice; and that we are not kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven us, then we may justly fear that we are not fully redeemed from all iniquity; and that there is something yet for us to do before we cease our striving against sin.

But let us hold fast our confidence and still follow our Redeemer through the washings of regeneration, and He will lead us into all Truth, and make an end of sin, so that we can enjoy the liberty of the redeemed children of God in the glorious gospel day, where we can see the King in his beauty. But I believe this is a great attainment, and requires a deep spiritual work, and many baptisms into the death and sufferings of our holy redeemer. And I believe the more we sympathize with, and partake of the iniquity that prevails, the more we lose our strength for the work, and the more our love for pure and undefiled religion will wax cold, and the less fruitful we shall be in the field of offering, and the less joyful in the house of true prayer.

This spiritual work which we have to do, we should be prompted to by the spirit of the Lord, and not by the spirit and activity of man; for that worketh not the righteousness of God, but only the glory of man. Yet it is not by Christ's standing at the door of the heart and knocking for entrance, that He saves us from all iniquity. By this he shows a willingness on his part to enter in, and do for us, in the way of purifying the heart, what we cannot do for ourselves. But as man took a willing part in the first transgression, by listening to the tempter, and letting him into the heart, and thus causing sin and iniquity to enter into the world; so now we must do a willing part, by hearing his voice, and by opening the door of the heart and letting Him in who came to destroy the works of the devil, and became, as the Lamb of God, a sacrifice for us, to take away the sin of the world, and thus make an end of sin, and make reconciliation for iniquity. He does for us the part which we cannot do for ourselves; if we hear his voice, and open the door and let Him in, that He may enable us to work out our own salvation with fear and trembling before Him. For He works within us both to will and to do, as He sees we have need, and as we are willing to co-operate with Him in the work.

Now, if any one should ask, "How are we to know, or how are we to hear without a preacher?" I will ask, "Who is a better preacher than Christ himself?" who teaches as never man taught; and who is himself the way, the truth and the life. So that which may be known of God, is manifest in men; for God hath showed it unto them by the light of his indwelling Spirit. And it seems to be the great object of the gift of God through Jesus Christ, to a fallen world, "that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works."

But as man was left free to do and act for himself in the first transgression, which brought iniquity into the world; so now he is still left free to do and act for himself, in accepting or rejecting the offers of redeeming love, which are held out as a free gift for our restoration. So if we are lost the fault will be our own. But we need not expect that to be done for us which we must do for ourselves, by and through Him who is ever ready to strengthen us: for we have no strength in Divine things only as we receive it from Him; and without Him we can do nothing towards our own salvation, or to aid in the salvation of others. But we can do all things through Christ that strengthens us. Man lost his Divine strength, and his right to the tree of life, by his disobedience. But the tree of knowledge of good and evil still remains in full bearing. And the enmity which was put between the fruit of the two seeds of good and evil still remains. They are ever antagonistic and opposed, the one to the other: hence the discordant elements arise which are so frequently troubling Societies; but we still have the power of choice between the two.

Under the weight of the iniquity that abounds the true seed of the kingdom is oppressed and cast down; so the word of the Lord has not free course, and is not glorified as it should be. And those who attempt to stand against the tide of iniquity, are accounted as the filth of the earth, and the offscouring of all things. So the ways of Zion mourn, and men are prevented by unbelief from advancing in the work of holiness. Our Saviour himself, so far as his humanity was concerned, could not do many mighty works because of the unbelief of the people. And his disciples now often feel oppressed, and weighed down, and kept back, on account of the iniquity and unbelief of the brethren, many of whom seem to be taken captive by the enemy, and carried to Babylon, where their harps are hung as upon the willows in the midst of the streams of confusion; so they cannot sing the Lord's song in a strange land, or among those who are strangers to the covenant of promise. But the tried remnant among them weep when they remember Zion. But the disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his lord. If the Master could not do many mighty works, in places, on account of unbelief, we need not expect his disciples to. And if He was despised and rejected of men, so will his disciples be. But He bore the cross for us, and we must bear the cross for Him. So let us lift up the hands that at times incline to hang down, and press forward towards the prize at the end of the race; making straight paths for our feet, lest that which is lame be turned out of the way; but let us seek rather that it should be healed. And while we are in the world, let us strive to be preserved from the iniquity that abounds. D. H.

Dublin, Indiana, Eleventh Mo. 7th, 1886.

The meeting-house at Arch—formerly Mulberry—and Fourth Streets, was considered central to the homes of Friends in this city, the early part of the present century. Through removals, mostly to the westward, north-westward and to the surrounding country, it has ceased to be so. The change has gradually taken place on account of the multiplication of places of business and of manufactories, in the older settled parts of the city. As young people have married, they have generally selected homes further from their places of business. These they can comfortably reach in a short time by the steam and street cars that intersect the city and connect it with the country.

Only a few Friends at present live within three-quarters of a mile of the Library, and their number is steadily diminishing. A considerable percentage of them are advanced in life, while the children have almost disappeared.

Several years ago, a few families living across the Delaware River, in Camden, N. J., made use of the Library. There are none such at present.

On consulting with a number of Friends in and near the city, it was found a very general feeling prevailed that the time had fully come for the Library to be removed to a part of the city more convenient to the Society of to-day. Attention was called to the situation of the building, recently completed by the city meetings, for the accommodation of the Select Schools. This school building was erected on a lot, owned by the Society, at Sixteenth and Cherry Sts. It is central to city Friends, and convenient of access to those in the country, being but three squares distant from the Pennsylvania Railroad Station. The teachers and pupils of these schools have largely used the Library in the past; they would be greatly accommodated by having the books in the near neighborhood of the school-house. By building on the same lot, the expense of purchasing the necessary ground would be saved.

It was ascertained that the "Committee of Six,"—two from each Monthly Meeting, having charge of the property belonging to the city meetings,—were in possession of funds which might properly be used for erecting a suitable building, and for defraying the cost of re-classifying and removing the books to their new quarters.

The subject was brought to the notice of the Monthly Meetings, by the Library Committee, in the Eleventh Month, 1885. Each of those meetings appointed a committee to confer with the Library Committee, in carefully considering the suggestions made by the latter, as well as the whole subject. This committee presented a report to the Monthly Meetings, in the Second Month, 1886, in which the following recommendations were made:

"That the Committee of Six be directed to pay to the Library Committee a sum not exceeding $15,000, for the erection of a new building and fitting it up with cases, &c.

"That the Library Committee have liberty to occupy for a new Library Building such part as may be necessary of the lot on the west side of Sixteenth Street, north of the Main avenue, not exceeding 55 feet in depth from Sixteenth Street, the south line of such building to be on a line with the north side of the Main avenue and north of the row of trees. Such new building to be constructed with a view to its being used northward in sections should it be found desirable to do so in the future.

"That the Library Committee be directed to proceed with the new building as soon as possible on such plan as they may approve.

"That the Committee of Six be further directed by the Monthly Meetings after the payment of the above appropriation of $15,000 to pay to the Library Committee out of the income of the residue of the property in their hands such sum annually, not less than $600, as can be spared to be applied to increasing the efficiency of the Library.

"That the Library Committee be directed to assign a part of the building when erected as a "Department of Records," and that the several meetings within our Yearly Meeting be offered the privilege of depositing therein their Records of Marriages, Births and Deaths, or other Records, should they desire to do so. Such Records to be catalogued by the Library Committee, and to be under their care, and so arranged that the said Meetings shall have every facility of access to them."

These recommendations were adopted by each of the Monthly Meetings, and the Library Committee at once proceeded to carry them into effect. A building, intended to be practically fire-proof, was contracted for, and is now nearly ready for occupancy. It is forty feet square, seven feet back from the street, and one story high. The cases are about eight feet in height, some of them arranged round the building, and the others, which are double, are placed in parallel rows. A second tier of cases is placed above those on the sides of the floor. This is reached by a stairway, which leads to a platform, both being made of iron. The main room is to have a table placed in it, for the accommodation of readers. In the northeast corner is a neat alcove. A room in the southeast corner is separated from the alcove by a vestibule, which is just inside the Sixteenth Street door of entrance to the building. This room has a large bay window, looking southward, and will be in special charge of the Librarian. The books now in the Arch Street fire-proof, are intended to be placed in it.

The room for Records, 10 x 37 feet, extends over this room, the vestibule and the alcove. Special care is taken to guard this record room from injury by fire. It has inside wooden shutters, covered with metal; these being regarded preferable to iron shutters, which are liable to warp when heated.

All the floors and ceilings of the building have iron beams, supported by brick arches. The roof is slate. No communication with the loft or cellar, is made inside the building. The cellar floor is thoroughly cemented, to prevent the effects of dampness. The heating is effected by two furnaces, with flues which are carefully protected by brick-work.

The Committee have thus endeavored to the best of their ability and with the means at their command, to provide a safe and convenient Library building for Friends of Philadelphia and its vicinity. While the collection is a miscellaneous one, and it is still intended that suitable books of all kinds shall be added in the future, the writings and histories of Friends are especially valued. This department the Committee are desirous of making more complete; and they solicit contributions of such works. Duplicate copies will be acceptable, some of them to be retained, and some to be used in exchange for other Friends' books.

(To be concluded.)

rance are we to Buy Bread?—Better, "loaves." The ordinary Oriental loaf is made of a circular piece of dough, rounded on the top, and about half a dozen inches in diameter. Frequently it takes the form of a flat cake of a dozen inches in diameter, and of less than an inch thick. Among the poorer classes, a cake similar in size and shape to the one just mentioned is in use, but it is made of unleavened dough and is not so thick. In almost all Oriental towns, the baker's shop is an institution that can hardly be missed. Like other Oriental shops, it is open to the street; but there is a large counter in front, upon which the flat and round loaves are placed for sale. Looking beyond the counter into the back part of the open space, one sees the rude oven of dried bricks in which the bread is baked; and, if one is up early in the morning, he may see the process of baking going briskly on, and the bread being passed over the counter to the applicants.

"NEARER TO THEE."

BY MINNIE E. KENNEY.

"Nearer to Thee, my God, nearer to Thee,"

Thus shrilly sweet the childish treble rang,
As, pausing in her play, a little maid
In fitful snatches all unheeding sang.

The tender prayer fell from her heedless lips
As thoughtlessly as song of bird in June,
The childish voice rang out, now shrill, now sweet,
Now softly crooning the familiar tune.

"Nearer to Thee." The maiden, older grown,
Half-shyly pauses at the untrodden road
Which stretches out before her as she stands
Upon the threshold of her womanhood.

"Nearer to Thee," she sings, but skies are fair
And love smiles on her pathway, so the prayer
Is but the sweet refrain of an old hymn,
Without a thought of need or meaning there.

"Nearer, my God, to Thee!" Heavy the cross,
The aching shoulders bend beneath the load,
And as the hidden thorns press sharp and hard
The tear-dimmed eyes can scarcely see the road.

"Nearer to Thee!" The quivering voice is weak
That earnestly uplifts the songful prayer,
"E'en though it be a cross that raiseh me,"
Content, if so, the heavy cross to bear.

"Nearer to Thee." The shadows darkly gather,
The way is lonely and the path is steep,
Chill are the night winds sweeping thro' the valley,
While still the gloomy shadows grow more deep.
"Nearer to Thee," O, let each toilsome footstep
Be one step nearer Thee, and through the gloom,
Father, hold out Thy hand and lead Thy child
Safely through darkness up to Thee and home.

"Nearer, my God, to Thee, nearer to Thee," Through all life's journey every day to be Still nearer, though we walk upon the hills
In the glad sunlight, or still following Thee
Pass through deep valleys that the darkness shrouds.
Nearer, still nearer, be my prayer and song,
Till joyfully our souls shall wing their way
Freely from their prison house to dwell with Thee,
And near to Thee rejoice in endless day.

TALKING IN THEIR SLEEP.

"You think I am dead,"

The apple-tree said,

"Because I have never a leaf to show—
Because I stoop,
And my branches droop,
And the dull gray mosses over me grow!
But I'm all alive in trunk and shoot;
The buds of next May
I fold away—
But I pity the withered grass at my root."

"You think I am dead,"

The quick grass said,

"Because I have parted with stem and blade!
But under the ground
I am safe and sound
With the snow's thick blanket over me laid.
I'm all alive, and ready to shoot,
Should the Spring of the Year
Come dancing here—
But I pity the flower without branch or root."

"You think I am dead,"

A soft voice said,

"Because not a branch or root I own!
I never have died,
But close I hide
In a plummy seat that the wind has sown.
Patient I wait through the long winter hours;
You will see me again—
I shall laugh at you, then,
Out of the eyes of a hundred flowers!"

Of what worth is the form of Godliness without the life and power of it?

[The following epistle, issued by Ohio Yearly Meeting, is not only sympathetic in its tone, but contains judicious advice. The mild spirit in which it is written brings to remembrance the expression of the Apostle James—"the meekness of wisdom." We hope it may prove comforting and strengthening to many who mourn over departures from our principles which they seem unable to prevent; and may encourage them to continued faithfulness in bearing an honest testimony for the truth.—Ed.]

An Epistle to Remnants of Friends and Individuals wherever situated, who are endeavoring to maintain the doctrines and testimonies of the Religious Society of Friends as promulgated by George Fox, Robert Barclay and others.

Dear Friends:—For several years past the attention of Friends of this Yearly Meeting has been much turned towards the "Scattered Remnants of Friends in various parts of the land," and we have been favored, from time to time, to enter into correspondence with several organized bodies of such, who, we trust, are contending for the maintenance of the precious testimonies of Truth as promulgated by our worthy forefathers.

This correspondence, if carried on under right authority, may prove mutually beneficial, and have the tendency to unite us together in the same household of Faith, and make us each other's helpers in the Lord.

But we feel renewedly sensible at this time, that there are many other dear friends in various places, who have not yet seen their way clear to extricate themselves from the mixture and unstable element in which they are placed; who feel oppressed and borne down by the trying condition of things in our beloved Society, seeing no way of escape, the heritage laid waste, the precious principles of Truth trampled upon, and few to uphold them.

To such our sympathies have gone forth, and we tenderly salute you, we trust, in the bonds of Christian fellowship, desiring to encourage all such to put their trust in that Power that is above every other power, whose voice the winds and the waves obey, and who, even in this day of treading down, in His time and way, can say to the proud waves of opposition and declension, "Thus far shalt thou go but no farther, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed."

Struggle on, dear friends, with the eye of your minds fixed on the Good Master, who sees and knows your every trial and difficulty, and will yet arise for the help of all who look unto Him; removing their difficulties or giving strength to bear them to His honor. A way will often be made for trusting hearts where none appears, and light break forth to guide their steps aright.

Turn your minds inward to the Teacher who teaches as never man taught; to the Minister of Ministers; the Minister of the sanctuary and true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched and not man. For your encouragement we revive the language of the Divine Master to his twelve apostles. "The disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his lord. It is enough for the disciple that he be as his master and the servant as his lord. If they have called the master of the house Beelzebub, how much more shall they call them of his household." If you, then, are of the household of the Divine Master, you need not fear what man can do unto you. Dwell low before Him, and with a single eye to his pointings and leadings. Do nothing in your own will and wisdom to extricate yourselves from the bondage and burdens under which you groan and are borne down. Wait till the spiritual Moses arises for your deliverance, and if you keep obedient unto Him, you will be enabled to enter into the promised land.

We conclude in the language of the eminent Apostle to the Elders of Ephesus. And now, dear Friends, "we commend you to God and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up, and give you an inheritance among all them that are sanctified."

Signed by direction and on behalf of Ohio Yearly Meeting of Friends, held at Stillwater, Tenth Month 1st, 1886.

WILSON HALL,
SARAH K. BRANTINGHAM. } Clerks.

The Two Voyages.

I have twice been "down to the sea in ships;" and though before steam paddled through the waves, yet the very different terminations of my voyages may afford a few hints to future passengers in their choice of ships and captains.

I was returning from the West to my home in Britain. The ship had been pronounced "seaworthy," my fellow-passengers were agreeable, and the "homeward bound" were able to smile even at "sea-sickness—after it was over, of course.

It was not until that time arrived, and I was able to walk the deck with something of the nautical roll necessary to preserve the dignity of the perpendicular, that I particularly observed our captain; and what I observed did not prepossess me in his favor. His conceit and self-sufficiency exceeded anything describable. It was his ship, his voyage, his skill, his weather, and, judging from his conversation, he might have received charge over sky and ocean with his bills of lading. "I know these seas so well," said he, "and carry sail in storms that many dare not face. I'm not born to be drowned."

"Do you judge so because it has not happened yet?" I asked. "You forget that the wisest of us knows not what shall be on the morrow."

"I can give a pretty good guess, however," he replied, "and I've never been mistaken yet. We weathered a storm last voyage that made the stoutest heart among my crew tremble, and none of them expected to see the morning. Ay, that was worst calling a storm. We tossed like a cockleshell on the grandest waves I ever saw, and they seemed resolved to dash us to pieces; yet here we are, every one of us! It must blow a gale such as I've never heard that hinders me from making port."

"I have heard," persisted I, "that dangers are not limited to storms. There are hidden rocks!" "Not when a man knows what he is about, which I think I do," returned he.

"It would not astonish me if you struck on a rock that is down in your chart," thought I, "to say nothing of any undiscovered. 'Pride goeth before destruction' at sea as well as on shore."

At length the faint outlines of some headlands of our native coast were enthusiastically hailed, and thoughts of home and friendly greetings began to emerge from the mists of apprehension, though the wind was increasing and the sea looked angry.

"Shall you anchor off the point, captain?" asked a passenger.

"I mean to be in dock with the morning tide," was the captain's brief reply.

"I thought you would telegraph for a pilot," returned the passenger.

"I am my own pilot, sir," and the captain whistled contemptuously.

"He's in one of his daring humors, and I'll bet anything you like that he takes the narrow channel," quietly remarked a sailor as he passed us. "Is it dangerous?"

"Very, in a gale, and there's one coming," replied the man; "but if any man can do it, it's our captain—only he might boast once too often."

Evening came, and the gale was becoming what the sailors called "pretty stiff," when the mate touched my arm.

"We are going in by the narrow channel, sir," said he, "and we may be dashed to pieces on the sand-bank. It is fool-hardy. Cannot you passengers induce him to take the safer course?"

I felt alarmed, and hastily communicated with two or three gentlemen, and proceeding together to the captain, we respectfully urged our wishes, and promised to represent any delay caused by the alteration of his course as a condescension to our apprehensions.

But, as I anticipated, he was immovable. "We shall be in dock to-morrow morning, gentlemen," said he. "There is no danger whatever. Go to sleep as usual, and I'll engage to awake you with a land salute." Then he laughed at our cowardice, took offence at our presumption, and finally swore that he would do as he chose; that his life was as valuable as ours, and he would not be dictated to by a set of landmen.

We retired, but not to rest, and in half an hour the mate again approached, saying, "we are in for it now; and if the gale increases we shall have work to do that we did not expect."

Night advanced, cold and cheerless. The few who were apprehensive of danger remained on deck, holding on by the ropes to keep themselves from being washed overboard. The captain came up, equipped for night duty; and his hoarse shout in the issue of commands was with difficulty heard in the wild confusion of the elements; but he stood calm and self-possessed, sometimes sneering at our folly, and apparently enjoying himself extremely. But presently there arose a cry of "Breakers ahead!" The captain flew to the wheel—the sails were struck; but the winds had the mastery now, and the captain found a will that could defy his own.

"Boats, make ready!" was the next hurried cry, but as too often occurs in the moment of danger, the ropes and chains were so entangled, that some delay followed the attempt to lower them, and in the meantime we were hurrying on to destruction. The passengers from below came rushing on deck in terror, amidst crashing masts and entangled rigging, and then came the thrilling shock, which gave warning that we had touched the bank; and the next was the fatal plunge that struck the foreship deep into the sand, and left us there at the wild waves' pleasure.

It is needless to dwell upon the terrors of that night. I was among the few who contrived to manage the only boat which survived. As I landed with the morning light, surrounded by the dead and fragments of the wreck borne up by the tide, I recognized the lifeless body of our wilful, self-confident captain.

He was like those who, on the voyage of life refuse counsel and despise instruction; who practically recognize no will but their own, who are wise in their own conceits, and satisfied with their own judgments, and trust in their own hearts, and, if left to be filled with their own ways, must finally make frightful shipwrecks just when they think themselves sure of port. And as this man was accompanied into eternity by those whose lives he had endangered and destroyed, so no man lives or dies unto himself, but bears with him the aggravated guilt of others' ruin through the influence of his evil example.

Two years afterwards I was at sea again. I joined the ship at Madeira; and while I admired her stately proportions, and rejoiced in her swelling sails, I cannot deny that it was with some anxiety I commenced my observations of the captain. He was apparently approaching middle age; and an expression of care and toil marked his countenance. He seemed to take no rest; but glass in hand and chart on deck, he watched by day and night. I found that he was not originally the appointed commander of the vessel; but in consequence of the death of the late captain, had assumed the post of responsibility, and so far had ably discharged his duty. But I knew too well that open sea and fair weather afford no great proof of a navigator's skill; and as we neared home I began to feel anxious about the course he would pursue.

When the point was visible, I ventured to ask him: "Well, captain, do you mean to try the narrow channel?"

"Neither of them, sir," he replied. "I shall telegraph for a pilot, and anchor till he comes."

"Then you do not feel sufficiently acquainted with the coast, I presume?"

"I think it better to avoid the risk of failure. My charge is too valuable for me to try experiments on the voyage home."

"You are a wise man," thought I, as I listened to the sound of the sailors' voices, as they dropped the anchor; and I went thankfully to rest."

At daybreak I rose in time to see a boat run alongside our ship, from which the pilot sprang on deck. The captain welcomed him with a hearty greeting. "Thank God!" said he; "my work is done." And I observed that, after he had indulged in a sound sleep, the anxious expression cleared away from his brow.

In the meantime, under the pilot's guidance, the ship cleared every danger, and our progress was rapid. It was impossible to avoid contrasting the results of my two voyages; and suddenly pausing in our walk, as a cheer proclaimed the city in sight, I said,—

"Captain, forgive a stranger's freedom, but I feel encouraged to ask whether you have done with yourself as with your ship—whether you have committed all your hopes for the eternal world into the hands of the great Pilot?"

The captain's countenance beamed with pleasure as he replied: "I rejoice to tell you that, by God's grace, I have. For years I took my own course, sought happiness in my own way; and had no doubt of my ability to save my own soul. Circumstances interrupted my plans. Anxieties and apprehensions arose; and having, by God's blessing, discovered my mistake in time, the relief, the joy with which I surrendered myself into the hands of the Lord Jesus Christ for guidance and salvation, was but faintly illustrated by my feelings when I gave up my ship into the pilot's charge this morning.—The Episcopal Recorder.

I have noticed that a married man falling into misfortune is more apt to retrieve his situation in the world than a single one, chiefly because his spirits are soothed and relieved by domestic endearments, and self-respect kept alive by finding that, although abroad he is darkness and humiliation, yet there is still a little world of love at home, of which he is monarch. Whereas a single man is apt to run to waste and self-neglect—to fall to ruins, like some deserted mansions, for want of inhabitants. I have often had occasion to mark the fortitude with which women sustain the most overwhelming reverses of fortune. Those disasters which break down the spirit of man, and prostrate him to the dust, seem to call forth all the energies of the softer sex, and give such intrepidity and elevation to their character that at times it approaches sublimity.—Washington Irving.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Canine Sagacity.—Dr. C. A. Packard, of Bath, owns a setter dog, too old now to hunt. One day, poor "Flash" had the misfortune to nearly tear out one of his nails, and the doctor was obliged to use the bone forceps to remove the nail. Flash stood the operation, never wincing. Not long after this, the doctor heard his well-recognized rap on the office door for admission. It was opened, and in came Flash, accompanied by a small dog with a bad wound upon one leg; and Flash brought the dog up before his master. The doctor attended to the binding up of the leg, and then Flash went out with his little friend.—Brunswick Telegraph.

Heat-Indicating Paint.—The London Electrical Review notices a paint which is a brilliant red, but gradually becomes darker when heated until it attains a very dark brown color. As it cools the original brightness returns. If the bearings of machinery are coated with it on the outside, the change in color will at once indicate to the engineer in charge if any part is becoming unduly hot.

Artificial Quinine.—It is said that a process of manufacturing this valuable drug, without the use of the bark of the Cinchona tree, from which it has heretofore been derived, has been discovered; and that it is expected that it can be furnished at a very low price.

Resuscitation of the Drowned.—The body of the patient is laid on the back, with clothes loosened and mouth and nose wiped; two bystanders pass their right hands under the body at the level of the waist and grasp each other's hand, then raise the body until the tips of the fingers and toes of the subject alone touch the ground; count 15 rapidly; then lower the body flat to the ground, and press the elbows to the side hard; count 15 again, then raise the body again; and so on, alternately raising and lowering. The head, arms and legs are to be allowed to dangle freely, when the body is raised.—British Medical Journal.

Cobras.—An Englishman may pass a considerable time in India without coming across any of these venomous reptiles. Cobras, however, are met with quite often enough, and sometimes in very curious and uncomfortable places. For instance, a young lady, in Southern India, noticed, as she was on the point of getting into bed that the pillow looked disarranged; and on taking it up to smooth it out, she discovered a cobra coiled up underneath it. She called for assistance; and her father coming to the rescue, speedily despatched the obnoxious intruder with a stick. I happened to mention this circumstance to an officer one day, and he informed me that the very same thing had happened to himself soon after he arrived in the country; and that in consequence, he never got into bed until he had examined the pillows.

In the year 1873, while quartered at Bellary, on going into the drawing-room of the bungalow, I discovered a cobra coiled upon the sofa cushion. It is however in the bath-rooms of an Indian bungalow, that cobras, when met with in doors, are most frequently encountered, as they come there in pursuit of the frogs which delight to take up their quarters there.

One day, my wife's ayah came running into our bedroom, saying that there was a large snake in the bath-room. Arming myself as usual with a stick, I went into the bath-room just in time to see the snake disappear into the waste water pipe, which ran to the back of the house, where the water found its outlet. The servants stationed themselves at the outlet while I endeavored to drive out the reptile. By thrusting a bamboo down the pipe, the snake was driven from his refuge and killed by the servants outside. This cobra measured about five feet six inches in length, and was the largest that I have ever seen killed."—Chambers' Journal.

Blue-Bottle Flies as Sanitary Inspectors.—An offensive odor in a room had become so unbearable that the carpet was taken up and a carpenter employed to rip up the flooring to discover if possible the cause. By a happy inspiration, the services of some sanitary inspectors in the shape of a couple of blue-bottle flies were first called into requisition. The flies buzzed about in their usual aggravating manner for some minutes, but eventually they settled upon the crack between two boards in the floor. The boards were thereupon taken up, and just underneath them was found the decomposing body of a rat.—Chambers' Journal.

Frozen Meat.—Since the introduction of the system of freezing by the compression and subsequent expansion of air, the trade in foreign fresh meat so preserved has largely increased. A steamer recently arrived in the Thames (England) from the Falkland Islands with 30,000 frozen carcasses of sheep.

Successful Domestication of the American Buffalo.—A gentleman is now successfully domesticating the American buffalo at Stony Mountain, Manitoba. Starting his herd in 1878 with four heifer calves and one bull, it now numbers sixty-one head, the greater number pure buffalo, the rest half breeds. One of the cows had calved at a time the thermometer registered thirty-eight degrees below zero, yet neither cow nor calf appeared to suffer in the least. When a blizzard comes on, the animals lie down together with their backs to the wind and allow the snow to drift over them, so that under the combined protection of their own wool and the snow, they are quite warm. Not one of this herd has ever exhibited the slightest symptoms of disease, although the only care they receive is occasional watching, to prevent them from straying away. Thus, winter and summer, they live and thrive on the bare prairie, with numbers undiminished by any of the ordinary cattle scourges, and with expenses for care reduced to a minimum.

Once a year the great fleece, weighing from ten to fourteen pounds, is shed, and its manufacture into a thick, warm cloth was at one time a regular industry at Winnipeg, until it was discontinued by the extirpation of the animals in the adjoining region. In its market value, the buffalo is not behind his smoother relative; for even if the quality of meat is inferior, the difference is more than made up by the great weight of the animal and by the value of the robe, which usually brings from ten to fifteen dollars. As draft animals they have proved a success; for notwithstanding their great strength, endurance and activity, they are as easily handled as ordinary oxen. In one particular only is the buffalo far inferior to other species of cattle, and that is as a milker; but to the ranchman milk is really of no consequence.

Bedson, the owner of the herd, after experimenting with crosses, is well satisfied with the hybrid, as it is in shape more like the domesticated cow, and is also a fair milker. Yet we doubt that this gain is sufficient to compensate for the deterioration of the fur; while, also, it would be a matter for endless regret if, in the prosecution of these experiments, the original pure race were lost. The rate of increase of the buffalo, though theoretically the same as with other cattle, is really much higher, on account of the lower rate of mortality.

When the present herd is sufficiently increased it is intended to divide it among several prairie ranches in localities where once the wild buffalo found its choicest pastures. This amounts almost to a restocking of the buffalo region.—American Agriculturist.

Insidious Fires from Steam-Pipes.—The Investigator in the course of a discussion of this subject, says: "It is very well known that wood, after remaining for some time in contact with steam, hot-air or hot-water pipes, becomes carbonized on the surface, and to a short distance below. The charcoal, of course, readily oxidizes. When steam is not in the pipes the charcoal will absorb moisture. When again heated the moisture is driven out, leaving a vacuum, into which the fresh-air current, circulating around the pipes, readily penetrates. It imparts oxygen to the charcoal, causes a more rapid rise in the temperature, till finally the point of ignition is reached. The rusting of the pipes, if it occurs, might also conduce to the same result, the rust being reduced by the heat of the steam to a condition in which it will absorb oxygen to the point of red heat.

Birds' Nests.—A family of birds, marked with bright colored plumage, build deep hanging nests, which conceal the inmates from the view of birds of prey that may be passing over them. To this family belongs the Baltimore Oriole or Golden Robin, a common and beautiful summer resident of many parts of the United States.

C. C. Abbott has published in his Rambles about Home the result of his observations on 39 of their nests which he found in various localities around his dwelling, in the course of three years. Of these, 22 were such deep pouches that when the bird was in one of them, it was concealed from view. The weight of the bird tended to draw the top together and make the concealment more perfect. These 22 nests were all located "at a considerable distance from any house, in uncultivated parts, the larger portion being on an unfrequented island; the others were on elm trees growing on the banks of a lonely creek. In both these localities sparrow-hawks were frequently seen, when compared with their appearance in the neighborhoods selected for the building of the 17 open-topped nests, all of which were in willow and elm trees in the yards of farm-houses, and in full view of people continually passing to and fro."

"The conclusion drawn from the study of these nests was, that the orioles, knowing that in this case there was little danger from hawks, constructed a less elaborate nest, one which answered every purpose of incubation, though it did not conceal the parent birds when occupying it."

—Persecution in Uganda.—A letter received from Uganda, written on Sixth Mo. 26th, says:

"It is now a full month since the bloody persecution of native Christians began. Those who were at the capital, and best known, were, of course, first arrested. About a dozen were butchered at once; many were spared or otherwise killed in the endeavor to capture them in various parts of the country; while thirty-two were burnt alive in one huge pyre, after having been kept prisoners over a week. Of course the great body of our people (as of the Frenchmen) took warning and fled into hiding. A few of them have since come to light, having got influential friends to intercede for them, and have been pardoned on the understanding (i. e., on the part of the king) that they renounce Christianity. But a large number still remain in hiding, able to move about only under cover of darkness."

Another letter written by one of the missionaries, whose children were killed, but who himself was afterwards sent out of the country, speaks of the faithfulness of one of the converts named Fredi.

"When our dear children were murdered he was standing by. The cruel chief who was his overlord (he himself having a small post called Musali), and who was carrying out Mwang's fearful command, threatened to burn him and all his household. Fredi replied: 'Very well; do so. I am a Christian, and I am not afraid.' This was merely a threat. When the chief heard that his Musali was to be seized last month he warned him to fly, but Fredi refused, and was taken and unmercifully clubbed to death before being flung into the flames. When I found heart to visit the scene of our children's murder, it was he who led me to the place. When we reached it, he knelt with me, and poured out his heart to God, that he would bring his salvation to those in darkness. In no long time he was to be a partaker in that blessed death: 'Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord.'"

—Union Evangelistic Movement in Philadelphia.—A large number of congregations (it is supposed near 400), belonging to many denominations, are combining in an effort to awaken greater religious zeal in Philadelphia, by special religious services, and by house to house visitation.

The City has been divided into sections, each of which is placed under the care of a committee of management, consisting of all the pastors and one additional person from each congregation. The special services are to begin with the second week in the First Month. And the places of worship of those congregations which participate in the movement are to be open nightly.

—Religious Instruction in State Schools.—This subject was one that was discussed at the Baptist Congress, held in Baltimore from the 16th to the 18th of Eleventh Month. Some of the speakers thought that any religious instruction in State Schools was an infringement of religious liberty, and a State ecclesiastical establishment. This extreme view was combated by others, who thought that a religious influence could be exerted through such schools, without violating any principle.

—Chinese Superstition.—Not long since one of the Chinese Board of Censors suggested (in accordance with superstitious ideas prevalent in that country) that the damage caused by the floods during the rainy season were owing to the fact that the Empress Regent had sent one of the eunuchs of the palace along with the Prince who was making a tour of inspection of the northern sea-ports! This censure awakened the anger of the Empress, who asserted her right to employ such emissaries, and published an order in which she says: "If the censor saw any harm in it why did he not remonstrate before it was carried into effect, instead of waiting for the occurrence of some public calamity to supply him with a text for his windy sermon? All his associates have the same silly habit. One of them, not long since, took advantage of a drought to accuse an officer of encroaching on public lands; and another availed himself of an earthquake in order to denounce a prominent offender. It is time to put a stop to such nonsense. Hereafter if any censor has a popular grievance to bring to the notice of the throne, if he has a case of official misconduct to denounce, or improprieties at court to point out, let him deal with the matter in hand, and not trump up a fancied connection with some local misfortune."

—Church Music.—The tendency in the human mind to substitute outward rites and forms for the pure spiritual worship of the Almighty is manifested in the growth of music in the different denominations. The Episcopal Recorder remarks:—

"The difficulties attending church music are known to all thoughtful Christians, and the via media between its total neglect by the Friends, and its undue exaltation by some churches, is confessedly hard to follow. The dispute between taste and principle is continually cropping out, and individual opinions are very hard to reconcile.

Some of the United Presbyterians, a body of most wise, devout and enlightened Christians, are bitterly opposed to the use of instruments, and fearlessly withstand the general drift. A convention of those opposed to organs recently met in Pittsburg, and passed resolutions appealing to their brethren to uphold the agreement entered into last year."

Among the resolutions adopted at this convention, was the following:

"Resolved, Believing instrumental music in connection with the worship of God to be without the authority of Divine appointment under the New Testament dispensation, and therefore a corruption of that worship, it is our duty to refuse in any way to countenance or support its use. And we hereby counsel all our brethren to stand firm and not defile or wound their consciences by any compliance with that which is contrary to conscience, or in regard to which conscience is not clear."

—Inspiration for Preaching.—An article on this subject in the Episcopal Recorder, makes several statements which closely approach to the views held by the Society of Friends on this important subject. It says:—

"Inspiration is a supernatural, divine influence, stimulating, clarifying and controlling the ransomed powers of man for gospel preaching.

It is distinguished from all rhetorical arts and worldly wisdom, that 'the excellency of the power may be of God and not of man.'

It does not come by or through collegiate and theological training. It is infused by the Holy Ghost. No learning, culture or eloquence can compensate for it, sacerdotal fingers are not ordained conductors of this gift of prophecy. God alone calls and ordains."

The writer makes this exclamation, near the close of his article: "God save the church from a professional, man-made ministry, and give us men with true apostolic inspiration!" To this we can say, "Amen!" But still more to be desired is the hastening of that day when all shall be taught of God; and there shall be no need that one should teach another to know the Lord, but all shall be divinely instructed by that "anointing which is truth and no lie."

Only he who is spiritually minded, can perceive the things of God's Spirit. Only he who is a partaker of God's nature, can really know God. He who denies the existence of light, proves only his own want of light. He who denies the power of the Spirit of God, proves only his own lack of that Spirit. He who denies the existence and attributes of God, simply shows that he does not know God, because he has not yet opened his heart to God.—Selected.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 18, 1886.

As a member of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, the Editor of "The Friend" felt some hesitation in deciding to publish the following article, because of its commendatory language towards the body to which he belongs. It was written by a valued aged Friend, formerly a member of the Binns' Body in Ohio, but who several years ago found refuge and a congenial church home in membership with our friends of Ohio Yearly Meeting.

The picture which the article gives of the manner in which the departures from the doctrines and practices of the Society of Friends were gradually introduced among those who at first had no intention of denying the principles handed down from our forefathers in religious profession, we believe to be a true account of what took place in many neighborhoods. And it reviews the feeling of how much we owe to the faithfulness of those Friends, who many years ago bore testimony against the errors which were then creeping into the Church; and were thus made helpful even to some who did not at the time realize the danger to which the Society was exposed, or see the inroads upon its peace and prosperity which were impending.

The article speaks particularly of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting; but those who endeavored to uphold the pure principles of the gospel, as professed by Friends, and to persuade men to live in conformity thereto, were not confined to Philadelphia and Ohio, or to any other Yearly Meeting; neither are they at this time. When the mists of prejudice and misunderstanding are dissipated, our hope is, that true Friends in every place will be prepared to own each other as brethren of the same household of faith, and be increasingly bound together in the unity of the gospel of Christ.

For "The Friend."

Cardington, Ohio, Eleventh Mo. 25th, 1886.

It now forcibly occurs to my mind to write out a statement of some of the early proceedings of that unwarrantable innovation that has swept over the Society of Friends in that part of the country where it has been my lot to reside, before and after this unhappy event took place. Whoever may see or hear of my concern, in thus exposing its first appearance and subsequent onward course, may know that I have no wrong motive in so doing; but believe it my duty to do so at this time.

When the alarm was first given of an innovation on the doctrines of Friends, I believe we in this section would, almost to an individual, have subscribed to the judicious course and concern of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in bearing testimony against departures from them. But we were then told that a misunderstanding existed; and that Philadelphia Friends did not quite see through the case; and that there were no doctrines advocated amongst Friends that would conflict with those always accepted by the Society. Prominent individuals from the East came among us, whose influence wrought a wonderful change, which soon became apparent; and perhaps I was as ready to accept their statements as others.

Thus it went on, and no little prejudice soon became apparent. It was stated that Philadelphia had disconnected itself from London Yearly Meeting, and had been cut off from the fellowship of other meetings. I occasionally met with Friends of Philadelphia, whose reserve, after learning what meeting I belonged to, I thought rather in excess. But now, I do not wonder at it; and, to do justice to myself, may acknowledge that it has had a tendency to convince me of the steadfastness of their adherence to the obligation resting upon them.

When those extravagant proceedings were first introduced into our meetings (which I will not describe here as they are well known in other neighborhoods) I thought they would not be accepted by us. It was remarked that there would be several rounds fired before our Monthly Meeting would surrender. But, astonishing to say, when the attack was made, our forces were seemingly paralyzed with fear lest there might be something back of it; and that opposition to it might conflict with our duty to God, and thus deprive us of the good intended for us.

This state of things gave great advantage to our new friends. Our Monthly Meeting was placed completely under their control, and was pushed out into the current; and where has it drifted to now? It then consisted of three meetings, at least two of which were Preparative, as mentioned in a previous number of "The Friend." Two of these meetings are abandoned, and the third but little strengthened. Among its members, oppressed with a heavy burden, are some very tender and worthy Friends, with whom the concerned part of the Society are in deep sympathy and travail of spirit, that our Lord may abundantly sustain them under their peculiar trials, and exalt his own blessed cause of truth and righteousness in the earth.

In conclusion, it appears to me that Philadelphia

Yearly Meeting, in common with other true Friends, is intrusted with the sacred and most important trust of holding, through much opposition, the doctrines and enlightened views of the Society of Friends, as promulgated by those devoted servants and hand-maidens of the Lord who counted not their lives dear that they might win Christ and establish for posterity a course of life that may be followed with great safety.

In the unchangeable truth and kind regards for all, I remain,
JOSEPH MORRIS.

We have at different times been impressed with the apparent unconsciousness manifested by some persons that Indians have the same natural rights as others in this country; and that they ought to be as free to travel where they please as any one else, and to enjoy "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," so long as they conform to those laws of good behavior to which all are subject. It was with pleasure, therefore, we noticed in The Council Fire the following item:

A sporting club of Helena, Montana, wrote on the 21st of [Ninth Month] to Agent Roman, of Flat-head Agency, protesting against his Indians being allowed to hunt outside their reservation. Agent Roman replied to these sporting men by referring them to a letter of his printed a year ago in the New Northwest, defending the Indians in their right to do just what these men want them restrained from doing. He also quotes from a letter to himself from James Fergus, of Fort McGinnis, Montana, on the subject, who says:

"It is popular to speak and write against Indians, and to trespass not only on their rights under treaties and as the original owners of the soil, but on their rights as men. Poor emigrants from across the ocean who have always been oppressed and kept under, and poor emigrants from the east who have been kept under the thumb of large corporations, no sooner get here than they too become oppressors and look upon the Indian as an intruder and trespasser on their rights. This thing of the strong oppressing the weak runs through all nature. Even the noble animal, man, has not laid it aside. We have our press through which we give our side of this Indian question, while the untutored Indian has only his agent to defend him and take his part, and I am glad there is one agent who does his duty in this respect."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President, on the 8th instant, sent to Congress the correspondence in regard to the Canadian fisheries disputes, with a letter from the Secretary of State on the subject. Secretary Bayard's letter says that notice has been given to the British Government that compensation is expected for the loss and damage, direct and consequential, caused to American fishermen, and he suggests that a commission be authorized by Congress to take the necessary proofs of the respective claimants.

The House of Representatives has passed a bill to extend the Post-office free delivery system to all places having 10,000 population or over, or whose post-office earned $10,000 during the past year.

The Iron Trade Review says that the sales of iron ore for 1886 "will reach the largest figures since the opening of the Lake Superior iron ore industry, thirty five years ago." For the season ending Twelfth Mo. the net amount for 3,536,500 gross tons were sold, compared with 2,938,486 tons in 1885, an increase of 598,105 over last year. The amount of unsold ore at lower lake ports one year ago was estimated at 130,000 tons. This year the unsold surplus is less than 70,000 tons.

A number of prominent colored people in various parts of the South are endeavoring to organize a "Colored People's World's Exposition," to be held in Montgomery or Birmingham, Alabama. The exposition is intended to illustrate the progress and achievements of the colored race in every department of life. The directors propose to ask Congress for an appropriation, and say they have already been promised the aid and support of a number of members.

It is reported from Dallas, Texas, that coal in immense quantities has been discovered in Henderson and South counties in that State. In the former county "one vein is 20 feet in diameter, and only 30 feet below the surface."

An earthquake shock was felt in Columbia, South Carolina, at 20 minutes past four o'clock on the morning of the 8th inst. The tremors appeared to last a minute, and were strong enough to awake sound sleepers.

Deaths by alcoholism, the New York Herald asserts on what it declares to be authentic statistics that make the fact clear, have decreased throughout the United States during the last fifteen years from a ratio of 111 to 45 in each 1000 from all causes.

Robert Emmet King, aged 22 years, who is serving a six years' sentence in the Missouri penitentiary for having stolen $48,000 from the Sedalia Savings Bank, has prepared a statement of the causes of his fall. "He sets forth that he entered the bank as bookkeeper at the age of 14 years, and at 17 began to drink and gamble. Losing his own money he took from the bank's funds, and covered his tracks by false entries. For five years he did this, until he had taken $48,000. He then took a $10,000 package and fled to Canada, but was persuaded to return by his father and his sentence to prison followed."

The deaths in this city last week numbered 412, which was 20 more than during the previous week, and 101 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing, 43 died of consumption; 29 of pneumonia; 27 of diseases of the heart; 26 of croup; 25 of old age; 18 of bronchitis; 14 of paralysis; 14 of typhoid fever; 16 of convulsions, and 10 of Bright's disease.

Cotton was quiet, but firm at 9½ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum.—Export demand for refined was light at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases, a decline of ¼c.

Feed was in fair request and firmly held, with light offerings. Sales of 2 cars good western winter bran at $17.50, and choice do. do. quoted at $18 per ton.

Flour and Meal.—Flour met with a moderate inquiry from jobbers, and ruled firm with small stocks. Sales of 250 barrels Pennsylvania family, at $3.75; 150 barrels Pennsylvania roller, straight, at $4.25; 375 barrels Ohio, straight, at $4.25 a $4.50; 500 barrels winter patent, at $4.65 a $4.75; 125 barrels do. do., at $4.90; 250 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4.10 a $4.15; 125 barrels do., straight, $4.50, and 500 barrels do., patent, at $5 a $5.15. Rye flour moved slowly at $3.25 per barrel for choice.

FOREIGN.—The English Cabinet met on the 10th instant. The order of business in the coming session of Parliament was revised, and the programme will probably be as follows: The session will open with the introduction of a coercion bill, including special provisions for the suppression of boycotting. It was decided that local government measures affecting England and Scotland shall have precedence over legislation on the same subject for Ireland. The result of this will be that no Irish business, except such as relates to coercion and to the bill extending the scope of the Ashbourne Land Act, will be transacted.

The London Chronicle's Vienna correspondent says that the Governments of Roumania, Servia and Bulgaria are about to sign an offensive and defensive convention. Each Government is to have identical rights to the disposal of a combined army of 400,000 men.

The Bulgarian Government has replied to the Porte that Bulgaria will never accept Prince Nicholas, of Mingrelia, for the throne, and that if the Porte proposes a proper candidate the Government will consider the question of new elections for the Sobranje.

The German Government has informed the Porte that it will not object to any arrangement of the Bulgarian question, especially concerning the choice of a Prince, if Turkey and Russia agree upon the conditions.

A new French Cabinet has been formed, with Goblet as President of the Council, Minister of the Interior and ad interim Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The Belgian Chamber of Deputies has rejected, by a large majority, Count Outremont's bill for universal military service.

The Berlin Tagblatt says: The Czar recently found on his writing-table a letter announcing that the Nichillists would wait no longer to deliver the people from bondage. He thereupon summoned the members of his council and ordered them to prepare a constitution suitable to the condition of the Empire. At the same time he informed his Ministers that he was determined to have an annual Parliament at Moscow.

The sugar industry at Formosa, one of the largest, if not the largest industry on the island, is threatened by a proposal emanating from Japan. At present it is estimated that Japan consumes some 83,000,000 pounds of sugar annually, most of which comes from Formosa, but a Japanese paper now asserts that the whole requirements of that country might be supplied by the Liu Chin Islands.

A deputation of Presbyterians has asked the Governor of Victoria to send a petition to the Queen against the French occupying the New Hebrides. The petitioners say that the occupation of the islands by the French imperils the missionary work which is being carried on there, and the interests of Australia. They ask that effective steps be taken to prevent the occupation of the islands, which is tantamount to annexation, and also ask that the Government protect the missions that are now established.

The Journal des Debats says: France has no desire to replace England in Egypt when Egypt is evacuated, but, if evacuation is to be conditional upon England remaining absolute mistress of the country, agreement is impossible. British pleas for time are equivalent to indefinite occupation. France does not make this occupation a casus belli, but declares that her interests and rights are prejudiced by it.

Cholera is increasing at Calcutta, and it is feared it will become epidemic.

By telegrams received from Buenos Ayres it appears that on the 6th instant there were 22 deaths from cholera in Rosario, and on the 8th, 7 deaths in Buenos Ayres and 10 deaths in Cordova from the same disease.

A telegram from Ottawa reports that a seam of anthracite coal, seven feet six inches in diameter, has been struck at Bauff, in the Northwest Territory. "This seam is only one out of six in that locality, the smallest being three feet in thickness. The six seams contain coal enough to supply the entire Northwest Territory for the next fifty years."

DIED, at his residence in Tuckerton, N. J., on the 9th of the Eleventh Month, 1886, ARCHELAUS R. PHARO, aged seventy-one years. Our beloved Friend peacefully entered into his rest but a little more than one year after the death of his wife; and his departure has added to the great void in Little Egg Harbor Monthly Meeting, of which they were both members. Devotedly attached to the teaching of Friends, our departed one was strictly attentive to his responsibilities in connection with the meeting of which he was for many years the stated clerk. During a very active business life, he manifested his faith by endeavoring to live uprightly and to promote the well-being of his fellow men.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Seventh Mo. 29th, 1842. On retiring to bed last night, the acknowledgment was raised: "Truly God is good to Israel," not only to those who are of a clean heart, but to those who are desiring above all things to have them so. Unworthy as we may feel He stoops to and remembers these. Our meeting this morning was a precious one. Dear Sarah Emlen again sat with us, after being confined to a bed of sickness for several months. She was strengthened to lift up her voice on behalf of her dear Lord and Master and his precious cause, which I have no doubt he feels afresh strengthened and encouraged to spouse. She revived the words: "Whosoever will be my disciple must deny himself, take up his daily cross and follow me," addressing herself to the children in so plain a manner that the least child could understand. We who were older were also instructed. She had also an encouraging, precious word for some present "who might be termed children," who were not ashamed to acknowledge their dear Lord and Master, and who often have to appear as fools for his name's sake. However these might be ready to ear at times, they should yet fall by the hands of their spiritual enemies, she believed they would be preserved: and that they would yet "see the ravail of their souls and be satisfied," &c. I was afresh strengthened to press forward.

Eighth Mo. 2nd. The favors of this evening all for deep, heart-felt gratitude. We have our friends Thomas Kite and Thomas Evans with us. In our evening collection, dear Thomas Kite was strengthened to put up the vocal petition, in a very solemn manner; first on behalf of the children, then the caretakers, and lastly on behalf of our poor Society. He reverted to the fathers and mothers who had been removed of late from amongst us, and prayed that it might please the Lord to raise up and qualify others, those who would be as Deborahs and Marys, magnifying the Lord, and rejoicing in God their Saviour. That He would prepare such by "his fire which is in Zion, and furnace in Jerusalem," &c., &c. Truly it was an evening to be remembered.

3rd. How my spirit revived within me, to find on gathering into silence in our meeting, strength afforded to approach His foot-stool; and although only in tears and sighs unutterable to lead, yet it did revive.

7th. This, too, has been a day of favor. Again during our meeting my soul did pour itself out as water before the Lord. O, for an evidence of acceptance and forgiveness! has been the travail and exercise this day, indeed, may I not say, almost continually, of my spirit.

14th. At our meeting to-day had the company and labors of our dear friend Alice Knight, who addressing the children said: "They that seek me early shall find me," &c. "The Lord loveth an early sacrifice," &c. Then flowed a word for the tried and discouraged, encouraging them to enter into covenant and to keep their covenants, &c., quoting: "Who is there among you that feareth the Lord, that obeyeth the voice of his servant, that walketh in darkness and hath no light; let him trust in the name of the Lord, and stay himself upon his God." She believed the language of some of us had been, "Is there no balm in Gilead, is there no physician there?" The provings and baptisms of such had been so deep they were ready to conclude theirs was a lone path. But we were shown that it was the way that all who had gone before had ever trod: that no new thing had happened unto us. In these discouraged seasons we were encouraged to "trust in the Lord and stay ourselves upon our God." This was a very safe, and a very sure state to be found in; and in the Lord's own time He would arise for the help and deliverance of these.

Our afternoon meeting was a season wherein my soul was sorrowful, may I not say, "even unto death."

16th. Attended Concord Quarterly Meeting. It was not till our last meeting, that I was sensible of any life, or of any travelling with the seed. But in that meeting the bonds which bound seemed burst asunder, and once more was my poor soul poured out in secret prayer, that He who had been with this people in days past, manifesting himself in and among them in so marvellous a manner, would be pleased still to remember us; and if deeper baptisms were neces-

[* It has ever been through close provings and deep baptisms, comparable to the refiner's fire and fullers' soap, and to "deaths oft," that the Lord's chosen band have been led and disciplined in the life of faith; have had their spiritual understandings enlarged; their willingness to suffer with a suffering and crucified, yet risen and glorified Saviour proved; unto having their fire shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace. All His must be refined as silver is refined, and tried as gold is tried, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness. Therefore let none call in question the dealings of the Heavenly Chastener with his children whom He loves, and as seems to have been the discipline meted our dear friend, that they may be made partakers of his holiness.

It is in this way our holy Redeemer, who has opened for us "a new and living way," and is himself "The Way," prepares his followers to make straight steps for their feet therein, and fits them for usefulness in his Church. He breaks all their schemes of worldly dependence, by proving that without Him they can do nothing; by setting before them the indispensable cross, ere the crown can be won; by showing in humility and contrition of soul, the infinite superiority of religion over every other attainment; by teaching practically, the lessons of regeneration and holiness, and true communion with Christ, through the renewings of his Spirit; and by conformity to his will, as the sanctification and great aim of beings formed for heaven and eternal happiness.]

sary thus to purify, and to make fit to show forth his wonders and his praise, that He would spare not till we were made meet for his acceptance. It did feel to me that very deep sufferings would be necessary before that purity and cleanness was ours; or before the Lord's name be exalted among the people, as in days past and as in former years; for surely there are many things tasted and handled, which must be done away.

In the first meeting we had several communications; the burden of which was for those in the younger walks of life. Near the close of our last meeting, dear Hannah Rhoads had a precious little communication, quoting: "The Lord on high is mightier than the noise of many waters, yea than the mighty waves of the sea." The waiting soul was sweetly encouraged; and she believed the strength of these would be increased. She further said, that she believed there were brighter days ahead for this people: brighter than any of us had yet seen, &c., &c. May the Lord hasten his work, is the secret prayer of my soul.

Tenth Mo. 4th. This is the week of our Examination, and a number of the Committee are with us. O! the love I feel towards those who are the true disciples of our blessed Master.

Eleventh Mo. 11th. O that we may live so near to that which is good, as to be able to hand forth to the dear children when called for, that which will be as bread! I have desired that some of them which have given trouble, may be brought to see that it is their good alone we have at heart. Feel peace for a little labor bestowed on some of this class, who have just left my room.

13th. This morning, on assembling at meeting and gathering into silence, a little strength was mercifully, once more, vouchsafed to lift up my head in hope; yea, out of very weakness was the poor soul enabled to pour itself out before Him who alone sees and knows my dependent condition.

15th. Endeavored to walk carefully through this day. I was sensibly made to feel the many weaknesses with which I am surrounded. Have feared there is not that love felt to flow toward my Heavenly Father there ought to be; I am so dead to feelings of gratitude.

19th. A sweet quiet rest enjoyed last night; and gratitude, so desirable, seemed to clothe my spirit. "His mercies are indeed new every morning." Great is his faithfulness.

[† It is a Scripture testimony: "Blessed is the man that feareth always." This seems to represent a state of filial fear and Christian sensibility, which is afraid not only of a want of gratitude, but of offending the ever-present Holy One in thought, word, or deed. William Penn, in speaking of the awakened and tender in his day, says in effect, Where before nothing was examined, nothing now went unexamined. Our friend, A. W. H., appears to have been leavened with this, as a servant devoted to her Lord; as one craving to "serve Him with reverence and godly fear." And to these, will not the precious promises be verified: "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him;" "He taketh pleasure in," and "his angel encampeth about them?" Also unto these, "Shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings; and they shall go forth and grow up as calves of the stall."]

20th. Dear Thomas Kite was with us last night. In a family reading we have on First-day evenings, after the children retire, Thomas had a few words by way of testimony, for the encouragement of tried minds present. Seemed to have faith to believe, that the feet of some present would be lifted out of the mire and the clay, and established upon a rock; and a new song put into their mouths, even praises to their God, &c.

22nd. Attended Concord Quarterly Meeting; where we had the company and labors of our friends Thomas Kite and Ezra Comfort. Thomas revived the command to Jacob, "Arise, and go to Bethel, and dwell there; and make there an altar unto God," &c. Jacob's language to his household was also revived, believing a similar one was extended to some present: "Put away the strange gods that are among you, and be clean, and change your garments. And let us arise and go up to Bethel; and I will make there an altar unto God, who answered me in the day of my distress, and who was with me in the way that I went," &c. He enlarged instructively. Ezra's concern was for parents, relative to the right training of their dear children. Urging their living so near to that which is good, as to be able to give them bread when they ask it, &c.

24th. Had a good visit this evening from our dear friend James Enlen, which comforted; though I felt very unworthy.

Twelfth Mo. 2nd. Called upon last evening to witness—and so unlooked for—the close of life to my dear cousin, Henry C. Williams, son of Richard and Ruth Williams, of Philadelphia. He seemed perfectly sensible to the last, though unable to speak. He was a dear, innocent, good child; and I can but believe all is well with him.

May this be the commencement of a new era in my life; may the thoughts, words, and actions, of every day yet allotted, be closely looked into; and may there be a living unto Him who gave to me a being.

6th. The 3rd was a day of quietness throughout our large family. The children all seem sensibly to feel that affliction has come upon us; ordered, I do most fully believe, in mercy. May it be improved by every one of us, lest the rod be lifted over us even more heavily.

Toad-stools and their Allies.—No. 2.

As I was walking along an old cart-path through a dense piece of woodland, with my attention turned to the toad-stools and the allied forms of vegetation, I noticed two or three specimens resembling the common mushroom in shape, but rather larger and of stouter build. The color was a lively dark maroon, and the skin which covered the well-rounded umbrella-like top, appeared to be coated with a glutinous varnish, which rendered it shining and sticky. The column which supported the cap, was not so smooth as in the mushroom, but marked with vertical depressions or incisions, which gave it a roughened look. I gathered a few of them, and on breaking the stem of one, almost immediately the color of the inside mass changed, becoming quite dark with a lilac tint. I find that this peculiarity of some of the toad-stools is attributed to the chemical action of ozonized air, to which the breaking exposes the substance of the stem. The under side of the top, instead of being lined with gills, as in all that I had previously gathered, was filled with a mass of fine tubes, resembling honey-comb with the mouths of the cells opening downward. But these cells were very small, scarcely larger than the point of a pin, yet very distinct. The lining of these tubes produces the spores, just as the inner surfaces of the gills, in the gill-bearing species; and on placing one of the tops on a piece of paper, it yielded a harvest of brown spores which had fallen from the tubes or pores. These, however, were not arranged in radiating lines, as were those that the gill-bearing toad-stools left on the paper; but in a multitude of minute piles, or dots, marking the mouths of the pores or tubes from which they had fallen.

On turning again to my treatise on Fungi, I find that in the second Order of the great Family, in which the spore-producing surface is exposed to the air, this surface is arranged not in gills, but in tubes or pores; and that to this order the name of Poly-porei (or many-pored) is given. So that the plant I have been describing is not an Agarie (or mushroom-like plant) as the others were that I had before met with, but one of the Poly-porei. It belonged to the genus Boletus, which was the ancient Greek name for a similar plant.

On the 18th of Eighth Month, I again wandered through the same piece of woodland, and was rewarded by finding several varieties of Fungi which I had not previously seen. Some of these were large white Agaries, that is Toad-stools with radiating gill-plates below. The top of the cap, instead of being regularly rounded as in the common mushroom, was depressed in the centre, making a considerable hollow. On cutting off one of the stems, I found its pores filled with a white milky juice. Some of the gill-plates, instead of pursuing their course from the centre to circumference without interruption, were split into branches leaving little cavities at the forks, which seemed like the first approaches to the porous tissue which marked the Boletus already described. I suppose this must be a species of the genus Lactarius (or milky), one of the characters of which is that it has a milky juice, white in some of the species, and saffron-red in others. This juice is poisonous and acrid in some, while in others it is mild.

One of the toad-stools was yet not fully developed, and the whole of the gills on the under side of the cap, were covered with a white membrane or veil which hid them from view. This plant developed after it was gathered, and this veil was loosened from its attachments at the edges of the cap, and then hung down, or shrivelled up forming a fringe around the stem. There was no such veil or fringe on the milky species (Lactarius) above described. So I found that its presence or absence was another of the marks by which botanists tell one kind from another.

All of the kinds which I met with, that I have spoken of thus far, had a smooth skin covering the top or upper side of the cap. But in one of these I collected to-day, this skin, which was of a light brown color, was dotted all over with irregular raised projections like small warts. Another that I found was a sooty white color, with similar, but larger and almost black warts. This was not an Agarie but belonged to the Pore-bearing family, its under surface being a mass of open honey-comb-like cells, like the Boletus.

I was quite pleased to meet with so many of the Pore-bearing Fungi in this walk, having gathered about six distinct species. One of these was large and fleshy, of a mushroom shape, four or five inches in diameter. Another of a brown shade, was crowned with a cap less than an inch in diameter, with yellow pores so small as scarcely to be discerned by the unassisted eye, and the whole supported by a very stout curved stem.

Several kinds of a more solid and corky texture were growing on dead twigs or branches, or adhering to decaying stumps of trees. Some of these were quite beautiful, being expanded into thin rounded and curved leaf-like plates, variously indented, and marked on the upper side with concentric lines of several shades of color: the whole of the under side being covered with the fine tubes or pores in which the seeds are produced.

There was one short and stout specimen of dark lilac dove color, whose flat top seemed like the expansion of the column below, rather than a separate part of the structure. At first glance I thought it also was one of the Pore-bearing Fungi, but a closer examination, with the aid of a lens, showed that what I had taken for pores were really the spaces between closely arranged projecting points, or minute soft spines with which the under side was studded. On placing some of these under the microscope they were found to be covered with projecting cells, some of which were crowned with seeds or rather spores. I had thus met with an example of a third order of those Fungi in which the spore-producing surface is open to the air. This order is called Hydnæi, from the Greek name of a species of truffle, and includes those Fungi in which the spores are produced on the outer surface of spines, teeth, or other projections, and not in the cavities of tubes, or the inner-lining of gills or plates.

Among the spoils of my walk were some curiously branched white Fungi, which in shape were like trees or bushes much subdivided, but only an inch or two in height. In these the surface which bears the seed is neither depressed into cavities as in the two first orders I have mentioned, nor raised on points or other projections as in the third, but spread evenly over a part of the plant. This is a characteristic of the fourth order of this family of Fungi. Many of the species belonging to it grow on the bark or trunks of felled trees, and some of them assume a shape resembling that of a little ear—and from this peculiarity the whole group has received the name of Auricularini, derived from the Latin word for ear. For "The Friend."

Josiah White.

There is a remarkable passage in the Journal of George Fox, in which he states that after he had experienced the purifying operations of the Spirit, "the nature and virtues of the creatures were so opened to him by the Lord" that for a time he was at a stand in his mind, whether he should practice physic for the good of mankind. And he expresses his belief, that through the Divine Power, physicians might be "brought into the wisdom of God, by which all things were made and created; that they might receive a right knowledge of the creatures, and understand the virtues of them."

The subject of this memoir was one who, without a medical education, appears to have been gifted with a remarkable insight into the remedies adapted to many diseases; as is illustrated by the anecdotes which follow. These anecdotes also seem to show that he regarded this insight as a gift from Him from whom cometh every good and perfect gift; and that it was his duty to exercise it without any pecuniary reward, for the good of others.

He was born near Alloways Creek, in Salem County, New Jersey in 1705. His father died while he was young, and his mother marrying again, he received no part of the paternal es-ate. He was apprenticed to a weaver, and soon acquired a reputation for perseverance and industry. He conceived the idea of making extensive meadows along Alloway Creek by damming its waters, and the confidence in him was such, that although this kind of improvement was almost unknown, and he was then very young, his scheme was adopted, and he was entrusted with the contract for its execution. This he satisfactorily performed, but failed to reap the fruits of his enterprise. This agreement contained a clause, that the dam should stand one year before he was to receive the last payment for his work. One night, before the expiration of that period, an ill-natured neighbor cut a passage through the embankment, and the waters thus admitted carried away the sand and materials of which it was composed. By this act of malevolence, he was broken up, and soon after removed to Mt. Holly, in the same state.

A pleasant anecdote is related of Josiah while still a lad, at Salem, which shows the importance of avoiding hasty and uncharitable judgments. A meeting had been appointed to be held at Salem, by John Salkeld, in the course of a religious visit. This Josiah attended, and whilst walking to it, was overtaken and passed by John, who was mounted on a good horse, and rode at a rather rapid pace. This disturbed the equanimity of the boy, and he concluded that but little good need be expected from a meeting held by such a preacher: not knowing that the visitor was somewhat late in arriving, and that he was travelling fast in order to reach the house in good season.

Josiah entered the meeting house, and took the most distant seat from the gallery which he could find, ill at ease in his mind because the stranger had ridden so fast. Before long, John Salkeld arose, and commenced his discourse with the remark, that his religion was not like a pack on his back, which could be shaken off by the trotting of a horse. This must have been startling to Josiah, who knew that the speaker had no knowledge of his mental disturbance; and it led to a train of serious reflections.

At Mt. Holly he purchased a piece of land for 50 pounds, on which he managed by industry and perseverance to erect a fulling-mill, and a comfortable dwelling-house, where he resided during the remainder of his life. He married in 1734, but being industrious and active, he was able not only to provide for his family, but to find leisure to devote to the temporal and spiritual welfare of his fellow-men.

Through life his attention had been closely directed to the study of botany, but without the aid of books. So skillful did he become that he knew all the indigenous roots and herbs that he met with, and attained a wonderful insight into their power of curing disease. He almost invariably had his pockets filled with roots and herbs, collected in his walks. His walking cane was generally a stick of black alder, the inner bark of which he frequently used as a remedy. His prescriptions were simple, but it is said they were almost miraculously certain in their effect in overcoming disease.

His biographer relates, that when travelling in Pennsylvania with John Pemberton, he suddenly stopped his horse, dismounted and dug up a root. John asked him what he intended to do with it, to which query he made answer, "I don't know yet, but I expect I should find use for it ere long. When I see a plant which particularly takes my attention as that did, if I don't carry it with me I mostly feel sorry, and often have to go back and hunt it." After this the two friends travelled on cheerfully for some distance, when Josiah suddenly exclaimed, "I must stop at this house," pointing to one hard by. He accordingly dismounted and inquired if any one was sick at a house which he indicated across the fields. One of the family replied, "No," but another standing by, corrected him by answering, "Yes, there is a woman in that house who has been confined to her bed several years." Josiah on hearing this, produced the root he had a little while before dug up, and giving directions for its use, desired it might be sent over to the patient. He then proceeded with his companion.

The woman used the root and recovered. Her husband never before this period had believed in inspiration, but this circumstance convinced him of his error, and he became a convert to the doctrine."

He was frequently known to call at houses, both in Philadelphia and in the country, as he passed along, when he was a total stranger, and inquire if some one was not sick. Nor was the impression on his mind, which thus impelled him ever known to mislead him.

One evening Josiah White felt his mind drawn to go to a particular house in Mt. Holly, but concluded that the hour was too late, and so retired to his bed. But the impression on his mind prevented sleep; and at length he arose and in the middle of the night proceeded to the house alluded to. He found the family stirring, candles burning, and a bustle within. One of them had been suddenly taken extremely ill. He administered some of his remedies which speedily relieved the patient; and he returned home, went again to bed, and rested comfortably. The patient was a daughter of John Woolman, at whose house the incident occurred.

On one occasion, as he was passing along Second Street, in Philadelphia, he felt a sudden impulse to stop at a house, without any idea who lived in it. On inquiring if any one there was sick, he was told that the master of the house was extremely ill. His request to see the sick man was repeatedly denied, but he still did not feel himself relieved, or at liberty to leave the house. Finally the physician in attendance said it would be better to let him come to the sick chamber, and to hear what he had to say; adding that they need not follow his prescriptions. On entering the room, Josiah felt the palms of the patient's hands, and told him he had a fever in his head, and advised him to moisten some white-oak leaves with vinegar and bind them on his head and temples. He recommended also a peculiar diet and then withdrew. As the physician in charge stated that the oak-leaves and vinegar would be harmless, the application was made and proved very relieving. This encouraged the patient to try the diet prescribed, with the result of an entire recovery of health. He afterwards rode up to Mt. Holly to visit Josiah, and pressed on him a handsome reward for his advice. But in this case as in all others, compensation was positively refused.

How sensitive Josiah was on the subject of payment for his medical services, is shown by the following circumstance. A person in whose family he had frequently given advice; once sent him a quarter of fine mutton as a present, but without any reference to the benefits Josiah had conferred on him. He insisted, however, on paying for the mutton, for he said, it seemed always before him, when he went to gather herbs.

The last of the anecdotes which will be quoted in this article, refers to an elderly man in his neighborhood who had long kept his bed from a nervous affection, probably hypochondriac. One day Josiah went to visit him, and on his way plucked a bunch of nettles, which he carried along. The bed-ridden man stretched forth his hand to greet his friend, and received a sharp tingling on his bare arm from a stroke with the nettles. Surprised and pained, but ignorant of the cause, he again attempted to grasp his visitor's hand, but once more shrunk back under a second and severer application. The violent stinging of the nettles, and the agitation of body and mind produced by this rough treatment so aroused the hypochondriac, that he forthwith left his bed, and was soon restored to usefulness in his family. An International Indian Confederacy.

In his annual message this year to the Cherokee Council, Governor Bushyhead comes out strongly in favor of an international confederacy of all the tribes in the Indian Territory. This is a matter of great importance, and we heartily commend the governor's position upon it. He says:

I deem it my duty to invite your attention to the subject of a proposed confederation of the nations and tribes of the Territory, with the hope that you will take some action of a definite character, looking to the formation of an international government, clothed with such functions and powers as it may be deemed proper to confer upon it. The importance, not to say necessity, for such action is suggested by the fact that there are bills before Congress providing for the erection of a territory of the United States out of the so-called "No Man's Land," with such portions of the Indian Territory as may be included by the consent of the tribes residing thereon. Thus an insidious scheme for invading and dismembering the territory is sought to be carried out, which in my opinion could be defeated in advance by the union of the tribes in a confederation through which they would act together on all questions involving the interests of all. Such an organization would not only conserve the interests of the whole territory, but it would command the respect of the people and the Government of the United States. The danger and the power of the white man lies chiefly in his combination of forces. It behooves us to profit by the example. The Indian Territory, occupied by thirty tribes, each as in the olden days, distinct from the other, invites invasion of their rights from the selfish and the unscrupulous. The Indian Territory, with her thirty tribes bound together by constitutional compact into one federal body politic, would in my opinion be able, by virtue of the moral force such a union would exert, and by the combined wisdom and united action of all, to resist all schemes for the dismemberment of our country and invasion of our political and other rights.—The Council Fire.

For "The Friend."

The article in number 15 of "The Friend" in reference to Paul's experience, that "Woe was unto him if he preached not the gospel," is well worthy the consideration of all who may feel themselves called to any weighty service in the Church. No doubt, as the author of the article alluded to states, "The expression has been misused." I feel no controversy with him in his concern, yet this "necessity" which the Apostle felt, this "woe that would be unto him if he preached not the Gospel," is a precious feeling to those dedicated ones the language of whose hearts is, "I delight to do thy will, O God." It is this that gives them the assurance of their Master's will.

The loving and dutiful child that delights to obey his father is desirous to know his father's will clearly, and when the parent says, Do thus and so, he obeys from love, yet he knows that the rod will follow disobedience; still, the fear of the rod is not the only motive that prompts to obedience. The child may at times feel his duties onerous, yet he may feel that his success in life depends upon his faithfulness to his father's interests; the necessity he may feel on his own account, as well as the desire to please his worthy parent, sweetens his toil.

So it is with those who feel themselves called to any weighty service in the Church. They have to pass at times through seasons of deep proving. At such seasons it may prove strengthening to look back and to feel the assurance, as all the rightly chosen do, that "A necessity was laid upon me, yea we was unto me" if I had not resigned myself to my Heavenly Father's call. The necessity, the woe, is precious to such as these; and under a renewed feeling of it, these can say in sincerity. I delight to do thy will, O God."

Of that none of us might move in the Lord's work without feeling the precious woe which gives the assurance of his will, which to do, I believe, is the delight of many yet amongst us. "He that hath the bride is the bridegroom, but the friend of the bridegroom which standeth and heareth him rejoiceth greatly because of the bridegroom's voice."

New Garden, Eleventh Mo. 22d, 1886.

For "The Friend."

Whilst meditating upon the state of our religious Society, my spirit was bowed under a sense of our great weakness; whilst feeling also that there is a degree of submission to the Word of God that is nigh in the heart, that shows us the condition we are now in, and gives us a sense of what our forefathers were, and of what they suffered for the Truth. Oh that we could realize this more and more, and thus be brought nearer and nearer unto our God, that a willingness may be raised in our hearts to suffer with the suffering seed.

The desire has arisen, that the Lord would build up the waste places; that we may be born anew in Christ Jesus, putting off the old man and his evil deeds; that we may, through the grace of God, become vessels for his use, cleansed and prepared by his Word, so that the great work of the Lord may not be marred by us.

Those whom the Lord has cleansed and taken into his holy keeping, it is not in the power of man to defile; although they may cause them to pass through great affliction. But if they are faithful, all this will draw them nearer to God, who is love, and can fill their hearts with the overflowings of his love. And if they continue faithful to all the holy requiremgs of our Lord and Master to the end of their journey here on earth; oh, the heavenly bliss that will attend them when they come forth clothed in the white robes of righteousness, being of one heart, and of one mind, ever giving praises to our holy Redeemer! Let us be encouraged, then, to labor for that faith which overcometh the world, and draws us into near unity with our God. Oh trust in nothing but the redeeming love of God our Saviour. It is through his mercy we are saved. Who can declare his wonderful goodness to the sons and daughters of man? The length and breadth, the height and depth of his great power that taketh in all things—the heavens and the earth—and reaches forth to the hearts of poor, fallen men, quickening a spiritual life therein, and giving a saving knowledge of Himself, whom to know is life eternal? THE SNOW STORM.

Far south of east the sun arose
From beds of cloud that winter morn,
But cold and cheerless was the orb
From which the golden locks were born
By the dull haze, which overhead
Its all-pervading curtain spread.

The vane upon the steeple stood
Eastward, and trembling in the flood
Of winds that on the village poured,
And through the naked maples roared,
Hung in mid-air its silent form
In prophecy of coming storm.
And as the chilly day wore on,
More dimly shone the waning sun,
Till long before the hour of night,
The ravelous orb was hid from sight
Amid dense folds of leaden cloud,
Revealing neither rift nor rent;
And twilight shadows came, ere yet
The sun had touched the Occident.

So came the night, and from her wings
Of darkness, quivering, fluttering down,
The snow-flakes on the strong east wind
Came eddying, whirling through the town.
Into each alley, lane and street,
The blinding storm incessant beat;
Alike on hut and palace fell
The spotless mantle of the snow,
And many a mimic hill and dell
Grew in the drifting current's flow.
Against the great glass fronts it came,
And piled high up the window-frame.
Down the long pavements row on row
The street lamps glistened through the snow,
And quickly passed the hurrying feet
Along the half deserted street.

Within the well illumined stores,
Protected from the storm out doors,
A few late customers delayed
Around the fire to chat or trade.

But one by one the lights went out,
And one by one the busy men
Of toil and trade, their faces turned
To the sweet lights of home again.
The hand upon the yielding latch,
The footsteps in the lighted hall,
The music of a gentle voice,
And kindly answer to the call;

The slippers and the easy chair
By the warm fireside placed with care,
Dispel the thoughts of storm and snow
Before the home fire's ruddy glow.
The good wife at her sewing sat,
The children conned their lessons o'er
Beside the lamp, the baby played
Among his treasures on the floor,
Or climbed upon the father's knee,
With artless prattle telling o'er
The unknown tale with childish glee.

And so the social evening sped,
With pleasant stories told or read,
Forgotten was the storm that kept
Its carnival without, that crept
Through every tempting crack and swept Piercely about the shuttered pane,
That rattled to the blast again.

But bedtime came; the chapter read
Had charmed the baby's flaxen head
To sleep upon the mother's breast,
Where childhood fondly loves to rest;
And soon the blessed boon of sleep
Came to the household, as the sweep
Of angel pinions, letting fall
God's benediction upon all.
Thrice blest is he who from the strife
And toil and weariness of life,
When evening's welcome shadows come
Finds rest and happiness at home.

Oh home, most blessed spot of earth!
Where constant love and kindness reign
Within the family domain,
Where the staunch virtues have their birth
Which make our manhood truly great,
The hope and honor of the State;
What potent force is thine that turns
The heart where'er we roam to thee?

Thy fireside altar ever burns,
The pole-star on our stormy sea;
Thy sacred influence still must be
The corner stone whereon are built
The bulwarks of our liberty.

All night the chilly east wind swept
About the village as it slept.
Along the dark deserted street,
The watchman on his lonely beat Paused on his weary round to hear
The spectre storm-king's foot fall near;
Sounded all night his piteous moan
In sad and dreary monotone,
And on the silent sleeping town
His ghostly mantle floated down.

But never night so dark and wild
On which the morning never smiled,
The deepest shadows may not stay,
The darkest clouds will roll away;
And born of this tempestuous night,
Came stealing slowly, cold and gray,
The dawning of another day,
Revealing in the morning light
A world as new and pure as seems
The sweetest fancy of our dreams,
Unrivalled in its spotless dress!
Ethereal in its loveliness!

On street and pavement lay the snow
Knee-deep, and soon a godly row
Of men, with shovel and with broom,
Betrayed the sudden "business boom"
That with the snow storm came to town;
Until, white-walled the sidewalks lay
On either side, a narrow way
With footsteps passing up and down.
The sleighbell's merry chime rings out
Upon the air, the teamster's shout
Comes shrilly on the ear, the rout
And romp of childhood, wild with play,
The engine on its iron way,—
Waking the echoes that had slept,
To welcome in the busy day—
Came shrieking, toiling through the snow;
And from its path on either side
The white waves of the crystal tide
From the great cleaving snow-plow flow.

And soon the newsboy on his round
Shouts "Morning papers," and our eyes
Glace o'er events and happenings
Of the great world that round us lies.
And as I read I think how strange
And passing wonderful the change
The years have wrought; upon the wing
Of the tamed lightning now we bring
The news from every clime and zone,
Full and co-equal with our own.
Comes pulsing from each busy mart
Of earth, beneath the storm and dash
Of ocean, the electric flash,
The beating of the world's great heart.

And in the city's constant stir,
Amid the wild incessant whirl
Of wheels, the hissing rush of steam,
The electric candle's dazzling gleam,
And with the almost painful stress,
And clang and clatter of the press,
That triumph of a rapid age
Flings from its form the printed page,
Which out upon the unconscious night,
Like birds of passage take their flight.

Oh world of anxious push and strain!
Of grasping hand and restless brain!
Of avarice and engrossing care!
I sometimes pause and wonder where
The constantly increasing rate
At which we live will terminate.
But terminate it will and must;
The active hand, the planning brain,
Outwearied by life's constant strain,
Outworn by all its toil and pain
Full soon will crumble into dust;
Full soon will sleep to wake no more;
And all life's fitful storm's be o'er.

Hypocrisy is ever to be avoided as one of the vilest qualities.

Library of Friends of Philadelphia.

When the new building shall be occupied, it is expected to open the Library from 2 to 6 o'clock, on Third, Fifth and Seventh-day afternoons. It is hoped, however, that in the near future, the times of opening will be extended to every afternoon and evening, on week days. Thomas Chalkley's desire that the privilege of using the books should not be confined to our members, but be extended to other sober persons, is remembered. The proper guards for the safe handling and seasonable return of loans made to such persons, will receive attention. The building is arranged to accommodate about 15,000 volumes.

Space will allow a reference to only a few of the many valuable works contained in the collection. Cranmer's Bible, dated 1539, stands first in a pecuniary sense. It is thought to be worth not less than $1000. The earliest translations of the Bible published in England, were Latin. Cranmer's is the third edition, in English, being the authorized version of Edward VI. Its condition is nearly perfect. Charles Hildburn has traced but two other copies of Cranmer's Bible; one of these is imperfect, and both of them are in the British Museum. A vellum Bible, written before the discovery of printing, with illuminated initial letters and miniatures, painted in bright colors, is rated at $125—the value being impaired on account of several of the pictures having been cut out, although otherwise the book is complete, and excellently well preserved. A memorandum states it was purchased of John Kendall, by John Pemberton, for one guinea (five dollars.)

For an account of the M. S., giving interesting memoranda of London Friends' Meetings held in 1682-3, see "The Friend," vol. I., pages 192 and 206.

Editions of the early Friends' writings, published in their day, are well represented. Among these are essays or other writings of George Fox, Francis Howgill, James Nayler, George Fox the younger, William Penn, George Whitehead, Stephen Crisp, Edward Burrough, William Bayley, Robert Barclay, Thomas Ellwood, John Crook, Richard Farnsworth, George Keith, Charles Marshall, James Parnell, Isaac Pennington, Ambrose Rigge, and John Woolman.

Among the books relating to the early history of this country, and published in or near Philadelphia, are: "Good order Established in Pennsylvania and New Jersey in America," &c., by Thomas Budd. Printed by William Bradford in 1685. John Burnyeat's "Epistle to Friends in Pennsylvania." W. Bradford, 1686. "The frame of Government of the Province of Pennsylvania and Territories thereunto annexed in America." W. Bradford, 1689. This is unique and accordingly rated at a very high price. George Keith's "Appeal from the twenty-eight Judges to the Spirit of Truth," &c. W. Bradford, 1692, unique. There are several other pamphlets issued during the controversy with Geo. Keith, found in few if any other Library in the world. George Fox's "Gospel Family-order, being a Short Discourse concerning the ordering of Families, both of Whites, Blacks and Indians." Reynier Jansen, Philadelphia, 1701.

RECORD DEPARTMENT.

It will be remembered that a "Department for Records," was directed by the Monthly Meetings, to be placed in the new Library building. This direction has been complied with—the size and location of the room constructed for the purpose, has already been stated. A circular giving the needful information, has been prepared, and a copy of it sent to each Monthly Meeting in our Yearly Meeting, as follows:

To — Monthly Meeting of Friends and the Recorder thereof:

The three City Monthly Meetings, of Philadelphia, have erected a substantial fire-proof Library Building on Sixteenth street below Race, near the Select School. It is proposed to remove the valuable collection of books from Third and Arch Streets, continuing it under the care of the Committee appointed by the Three Meetings, with John H. Dillingham as Librarian and Custodian of Records. The only room on the second floor of the building is to be devoted exclusively to records of Meetings and kindred documents, and Friends are invited to deposit such of them as are not in use, with the Committee, subject to the order of the respective Meetings, the object being to secure a certain and safe depository.

A plan somewhat similar to this was adopted in London fifty years ago, and has been pursued there and elsewhere with great success. Recent examinations have shown that some of our records are missing and no doubt lost; others were found in the hands of persons, not always members, who considered them personal property. One book was publicly exposed for sale as waste paper, and many are stored in insecure places, where the custodians are often subjected by strangers to applications for inspection.

By the annexed rules records deposited will be carefully guarded from the public, while Friends, who would have the right of access at home, will be afforded full liberty to consult them.

It is especially desirable to obtain the records of Meetings that have been laid down or annexed to others, as well as lists of such records as are now in use or still needed at home.

The value of these records is increasing every year, and will be largely augmented by being brought together.

RULES.

- I. All records deposited in the Record Room of Friends' Library shall continue to be the property of the Meeting depositing, and receipts therefor shall be issued. They shall be subject to the order of said Meeting, and shall not be removed by any other authority. There shall be no charge for the care of them, and the Custodian may permit any person, who would have the right of access to them at home, to examine all the records of the Meeting to which said person belongs.
- II. The Records of Births, Marriages and Deaths, and Certificates of Removals may be inspected, and extracts made therefrom by any person, at the discretion of the Custodian and in his presence.
- III. All other applications to consult the Records are to be submitted to the Record Committee of the Library Committee. Said Record Committee shall have authority to permit their inspection in the presence of one of their number, or of the Custodian, who shall see that nothing unsuitable for the public be copied.
- IV. The Records shall be catalogued and classified as received, and there shall be an annual inspection thereof by the proper officer of the Library Committee.

It is to be hoped that Friends, particularly those in country places, will be awakened to an interest in this subject, so that the Records of the Society in their respective neighborhoods, particularly those in danger of being lost, may be preserved. As stated in the circular, the value of these records will be enhanced by being brought together. Some Friends may conclude that if the Records of their particular meetings are safely stored in fire-proof safes, in or near their several meeting-houses, it would be unnecessary to send them to Philadelphia. But it is well to bear in mind that there are many descendants of Friends of past generations, desirous of tracing their ancestors, who have to rely largely or altogether, on our records for the desired information. As removals were constantly taking place from one meeting to another, the importance of having the Records of all our meetings in one room, is apparent. Our city is remarkably central to the meetings composing the Yearly Meeting, and convenient of access to them all. Those who compose the Society that separated from us in 1827, and who have many of the old Records in their possession, manifest a willingness for us to have copies taken. Their Society in Baltimore, some years ago commenced, and have since successfully carried out, the plan of collecting the Records, which we are about attempting. They have courteously furnished us with valuable suggestions on the subject. It is an interesting circumstance that the minutes of Baltimore Yearly Meeting, covering a period of several years, were found in a paper-mill, with the covers torn off, just ready to be reduced to pulp!

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 110.

MINISTRY.

Precious indeed is the feeling of reverence and solemnity which the Lord is pleased at times to spread over the minds of those who are assembled to wait upon and worship Him. It is an evidence of the fresh extension of his goodness and mercy. A remarkable instance of this is mentioned in connection with a meeting appointed many years since, at Richmond, Virginia, for Richard Jordan, who was then travelling in that State. It was designed for the members of the Legislature which was then in session, and was held in the Legislative hall. The meeting was well attended, and Richard was engaged in ministerial labor, in so powerful a manner that the company was much melted into tears. After he had finished his service, and when it seemed seasonable for the meeting to separate, Richard arose and said he thought it a suitable time for those present to withdraw. No one moved. Richard repeated the words, still all remained seated. He then left the house, but having forgotten his overcoat went back to procure it, and found the company still sitting under a solemn covering which they seemed unwilling to dissipate, and so he left them.

The account given by the late Jacob Albertson of Plymouth, Pa., of a visit paid in that neighborhood by William Flanner of Ohio, illustrates not only the deep exercises into which ministers are sometimes plunged in their religious services, but also the character of that self-righteous and fault finding spirit which sometimes grows up in neighborhoods and meetings, and threatens the destruction of every green thing. At their meeting at Plymouth, William Flanner sat in solemn silence from 11 o'clock until nearly 1, when he arose with his hat in his hand, and said, "I have felt the prevalence in this meeting of a spirit hard to be reached; and I would much rather undertake to cut down one of the loftiest cedars of Lebanon, or one of the sturdiest oaks of Bashan than to contend with this lofty and self-righteous spirit. He then sat down, and soon after the meeting broke up. William dined that day at the house of Jacob's father, and his way seeming closed up, he claimed the sympathy and asked the advice of Friends—there being quite a number there. None seemed willing to offer any but this—that it would be safest to lie by until more light was vouchsafed. William said, "If I must lie by, I prefer going to Philadelphia for that purpose," and I, continued Jacob, "was directed to bring out the friends' horses. But when I returned with them, I found friends sitting in solemn silence, which William soon broke by asking if there was not a meeting of Friends within 10 or 12 miles, in that direction, pointing towards Providence, a branch of our Monthly Meeting. He was told there was: "then," said he, "that is the place to which I must now go." John Jacobs and father Livezey accompanied him.

"Soon after, I heard John Jacobs give an account of the meeting. In it, William was again much shut for a time, but at length arose, saying, "Friends, there is a spirit among you which has the eye of an eagle, and strikes with the beak of a hawk; and you are disposed to carry your neighbors' faults in the fore end of your wallets, while you are careful to stow away your own in the hinder end." He then went on in such a powerful testimony on the subject of self-righteousness as to bow the hearts of the people in a remarkable manner. John said, "I never shed more tears in any meeting in my life than in that one."

The homely comparison made by William Flanner, of putting one's own faults in the back of the wallet, and our neighbors' in front, belongs to the same class of easily understood illustrations as one used by Joshua Evans of Gloucester Co., N. J. It is related by a friend who attended the Yearly Meeting of New York in 1835, and lodged at the same house with Joseph Hoag. He says.—"I asked him if he ever knew Joshua Evans; he said he knew him well, for Joshua was as many times at his house, and he travelled some time with him in the course of his religious labors: and in those parts, long after his service was accomplished, Joshua was called and spoken of as the Man of God. Joseph Hoag further observed, that he went with Joshua to a meeting some distance, at a place where but few Friends resided. The meeting was large, and composed chiefly of those not members of the Society of Friends, some of whom were of the upper classes of society in that place. After a considerable time of silence, Joshua rose, and in a very simple manner observed, in substance, as follows:—"Suppose a person eminent for wisdom amongst you, was about to perform a long and important journey, with only one horse and a wagon, and when about to enter on the journey was to harness the horse behind the wagon; would you not all think it a very silly proceeding? And would you not, if he was your friend, remonstrate against the measure, and consider it foolishness in the extreme! And if he still persisted in his course, would you not believe he was not rational, and that he would never accomplish his undertaking?" with more to the same purpose. Joseph Hoag observed, that he himself at the time became concerned, and much at a loss to ascertain what Joshua would make of the case, or what comparison he was about to draw from the premises. After thus treating the subject until the assembly appeared to be astonished, and he believed thought the old man a fool, Joshua recited the text, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you," and said, "this was an admonition or command of the blessed Saviour himself, but people generally, instead of adhering to the admonition, or obeying the command, sought first the things of this world and the glory thereof, and appeared to be under an apprehension that the kingdom and righteousness of God would be added, without their care or concern; but when or how it was to be attained was a matter of indifference; although they thought, or would say, it was desirable. And in this careless and unconcerned state, many were summoned to appear before the great Judge, who had given the command; and that too, in many instances, before the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof had been sought for, or much attended to," with much more to the same import; also observing that such were more unlikely to accomplish the design of their creation, and be saved with an everlasting salvation, than the man would be to accomplish his journey with his horse behind the wagon; and for his part he believed that such a course was more unwise, and manifested more folly than that, and would produce more confusion and bitter disappointment in the end.

The assembly appeared to appreciate the comparison, and feel the importance of the subject, became solemnized, and, before the discourse closed, were mostly so tendered that the tears flowed plentifully, and a most solemn meeting it was; and was remembered and spoken of for years after."

Those who, as Joshua Evans said, are reversing the order prescribed by our Saviour, and seeking first the things of earth, can have no well-grounded hope that they are walking in the path which leads to eternal blessedness; but very different is the situation of those who are endeavoring to be faithful to all their Lord's commands. A lively instance of the glorious prospect sometimes opened to these for their refreshment, is shown in the remarks made by Mildred Ratcliff, at the table of her dear friend Jonathan Evans, the last time she was at his habitation:—"I deem it a great privilege that I have been once more permitted to be refreshed at thy table; and as it seems to me it is the last time the privilege will be enjoyed by me, I cannot rise without expressing my earnest desire and belief, that we shall be permitted through the power of God, and the mercy of his dear Son, Jesus Christ, to meet together in eternity and enjoy the feast of fat things at the marriage of the King's Son—the supper-table of the Lamb—where our enjoyment will be uninterrupted, and continued through the boundless ages of eternity. Oh! may we keep our eyes singly directed to the Pilot of our souls' happiness, and steadily follow Him: so that nothing present or to come may be permitted to separate us from being landed by Him in the haven of rest; where, in the enjoyment of the feast of fat things, we shall ascribe glory, honor and high praises to Him who sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb who liveth forever and ever."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Zoological Superstitions.—F. L. Oswald contributes an article on this subject to the Popular Science Monthly, in which he reviews several popular ideas, which he regards as incorrect. One of these is the notion that monkeys are prone to imitate what they see others do. He says he has owned monkeys of at least 20 different species, and has never been able to detect any trace of a propensity to mimicry.

The notion that serpents, have the power to "charm" birds or small animals, he thinks may have had its origin in the sluggish movements of poisonous snakes. Their flexible poison-fangs do not enable them to hold their prey at the first snap; and when they have bitten an animal, they often wait until the poison has had its effect, before proceeding to further hostilities.

Energy in Plant-Cells.—Along a highway in Iowa were planted years ago a row of soft maple trees, designed to serve as posts for carrying the wires of a fence. When the trees attained a suitable size, a piece of pine lumber 4 feet long and 2 by 4 inches in section was firmly spiked to each tree for the better attachments of the wires. The spikes seem to have rusted into the tree, and to have held very firmly, while by the continual deposition of new layers, the tree has crowded off the block, drawing the head of the nail directly through the pine wood; that is, new material has been thrust in between the wood of the tree on one hand and the block on the other, until the block has been fairly wedged from its place!

Now these results may seem somewhat surprising, but our surprise is not lessened when we consider that this energy is exerted by the thin layer of growing cells which separate the bark of the tree from the wood. From these delicate, thin-walled cells come the pressure which forced the head of the spikes through the pine wood.—T. H. McBride in Popular Science Monthly.

Death from a Fly-bite.—Gerald F. Dale, a missionary in Svria, recently died of malignant pustule. He felt something like a boil on his neck on Second-Day, was too weak to sit up on Third Day, and died about four o'clock the next morning. The disease is supposed to have been communicated to him by the bite of a fly bearing poisonous matter, which at once poisoned his blood.

Poisonous Honey.—In the sandy soils near the ocean, of New Jersey and other states south of Rhode Island, there grows a plant of the Heath family, commonly called stagger-bush, from its poisonous effect upon sheep and cows, which occasionally eat it. Its scientific name is Andromeda Mariana, and it is abundant in places. A writer from Long Island, says that the honey obtained by the bees from flowers of the Kill-calf, as he calls it, is poisonous; that he has himself suffered from partaking of it; and that such cases are well-known to physicians in that section of country. The taste of this honey is hot and peppery, and a few drops are enough to produce an unpleasant irritation in the stomach. In neighborhoods where this plant abounds, the people are careful to use only the honey which is made after it goes out of bloom.

Alcohol in Diet.—At the New York Academy of Medicine, Dr. William H. Draper, in the annual discourse, condemned the use of alcohol as a dietary agent. He declares that at this time the majority of thoughtful physicians were persuaded that the usefulness of alcoholic stimulants as food is overestimated. They are coming to believe that alcoholic stimulants are not only unnecessary to a healthy man, but that the effect of such stimulants upon the nutrition is deteriorating, and one of the most powerful agencies in producing physical degeneration.

Minister's Sore Throat.—The Lancet has been discussing "clergyman's sore throat," and comes to the conclusion that this common clerical complaint is mainly due to the fact that the habit of reading sermons compels clergymen to preach with their heads bent down. The natural habit in public speaking is to keep the head erect and the chest expanded. The Lancet points out that barristers, who talk as much as clergymen, and in buildings as ill ventilated, do not suffer from sore throat in the same degree. That is because they do not read their speeches, and because they are so situated that their audience is raised a little above them. Thus, they have every inducement to hold their heads up and give their speaking apparatus room for fair play. This is an additional argument against the fatal habit of reading sermons, which, we fear, is beginning to grow, even among Methodists. Who ever heard of conversions taking place under a read sermon? The rhetorical essay and the theological lecture are excellent in their place, but their place is emphatically not the pulpit.—Methodist Times of London.

Aniline Oil in Surgery.—Aniline oil is reported to be gaining considerable favor as a local anæsthetic in simple surgical operations, such as opening a felon. On dipping the finger in the oil for a short time it becomes so insensible that the flesh may be cut to the bone without pain.

A Plague of Mice.—In the colony of Lourenco, Brazil, in 1876, mice suddenly appeared in enormous numbers. They invaded the grain fields in such large numbers that the corn seemed literally alive with them, destroying in a few days everything that was edible, and where but a short time before bushels of grain might have been harvested not an ear remained, and the noise produced by their nibbling and climbing was audible for a considerable distance. After the corn-fields were devastated the potatoes next received their attention. Gourds and pumpkins, even the hardest, were gnawed through and eaten. Of green food, such as clover, oats, barley, not a leaf was standing. Even weeds were cut down and the inner parts eaten out.

In the house, the struggle for existence of these long-tailed invaders was truly amazing. In many of the dwellings hundreds were killed in a single day. The cats could contribute but little aid in fighting such a plague, for by their great numbers they drove the cats actually from the houses, not to return until the plague was passed. Nothing, except what was composed of iron, stone or glass was spared from their destructiveness. Furniture, cloth, hats, books—everything—bore the traces of their teeth. They gnawed the hoofs of the cows, and horses in the stables, literally ate up fatted hogs, and often bit away the hair of persons during sleep. They penetrated all apartments, and gnawed their way through boards and walls of houses. Ditches that were dug about granaries did not suffice; the mice would climb over each other, and thus reach the top.

The foregoing account of one occurrence in Lourenco will suffice to show to what extent the plague reached. The same province had suffered similarly in 1843 and 1863. Similar plagues, though far less in extent, have occurred in Europe, in which the field mice unaccountably appeared in greatly increased numbers. One may well think what would be the result were these little, almost insignificant creatures everywhere in such wise to take the ascendancy. Could all the conditions which now keep them in check be removed, every living thing on earth would be consumed in half-a-dozen years.—Science.

Medical Properties of Natural Odors.—The aroma of red cedar is fatal to house moths; the aroma of black walnut leaves is fatal to fleas. It is a matter of common observation that persons engaged in the business of making shingles from odoriferous cypress timber in malarial districts are rarely, if ever, affected by malarial diseases, and that persons engaged in gathering and distilling turpentine do not suffer from either malarial diseases or consumption. It is said that when cholera was epidemic in Memphis, Tenn., persons working in livery stables were entirely exempt from it. It is affirmed that since the destruction of the clove trees on the Island of Ternate the colony has suffered from epidemics unknown before; and in times when cholera has prevailed in London and Paris those employed in the perfumery factories have escaped its ravages.—Boston Journal of Chemistry.

Items.

—Distributing Christian books among the Chinese Literati.—In China, the mandarins are selected from the literary class. Once every three years candidates for office who have successfully passed two examinations in their native provinces assemble in Peking for a third examination, which will render them eligible to governmental offices. About 7,000 of these literary candidates, eager for office, entered the large area of low sheds to undergo an examination lasting nine days, divided into three sessions of three days each. Out of this number only three per cent. of those whose papers are the best pass the ordeal, and enter the high rank of "Hui Shih" or "Ready-for-Office."

Aware of the approaching triennial examination, the "Young Men's Christian Association of Peking," whose membership includes both Orientals and Occidentals, determined to distribute Christian books and offer prizes for essays written upon selected topics. An application was made to the "National Bible Society of Scotland" for a grant of 5,000 copies of the Gospels in "Wen-Li," or the classical style of the Chinese language, as being better adapted to the critical taste of this literary class. At the same time an application was made to the "North China Tract Society" to grant supplies of three tracts in amounts of 5,000 each. In addition to this, a small circular on pink paper was printed, on which it was stated that these pamphlets were distributed in order to induce these scholars to investigate the claims of Christianity, and therefore an offer of four prizes was made for the best four essays upon the three following topics:

1. How the career of Jesus on earth was efficacious in redeeming mankind from sin?
2. How, according to the Gospel, eternal salvation can be obtained?
3. How the opium traffic, both foreign and native, can be most speedily and effectively abolished?

This attractive pink circular with the three pamphlets and one copy of a gospel were neatly rolled up in one parcel, and "Y. M. C. A. of Peking. Respectfully Presented," in Chinese characters was stamped on the outside of the paper wrappers.

It was decided to distribute these packages of tracts just as the Chinese were leaving the Examination Hall on the last or ninth day. The time of leaving the examination is often in the night, sometimes shortly after midnight.

The distributors were divided into two parties. From two o'clock in the morning until daybreak, they waited eagerly for the candidates to appear. Not until the sun had scattered the darkness of night, about 5 A. M., did the worn-out students begin to issue forth from the little cells where they had been confined during their examination.

After nine days of excessive literary labor and its accompanying excitement, it was nothing strange that these candidates looked pale and haggard.

As a rule, these literary gentry received the little parcels politely. Occasionally one would show his disgust at these "foreign devil" books by giving the parcel a toss into the air, but even that proceeding was very exceptional. More annoyance was experienced by the outside crowd trying to snatch books from the distributors and out of the hands of the literati after they had accepted them. By keeping farther away from the entrance and nearer the outskirts of the crowd this snatching was, to a great extent, avoided. The work of distribution was kept up until two o'clock in the afternoon, when the last parcel of the five thousand was given away. The general opinion is that about nine-tenths of the books went into the hands of those for whom they were intended.—Christian Advocate.

—Proposed Methodist Hospital.—Dr. Stewart of Philadelphia, who died in 1881, left a large part of his estate for the establishment of a hospital to be under the control of the Methodist Episcopal Church, but to be open to all who might need hospital treatment without distinction of creed or race. The funds in the hands of the Trustees now amount to $223,000; but before they can be applied to the designated purpose, it is requisite that $50,000 additional should be raised by the Methodists.

A public meeting was recently held in Philadelphia to take steps for securing the required funds. That noble charity, the Pennsylvania Hospital, is nondenominational; and in the Jewish, Presbyterian, and other hospitals of this city, patients are received without reference to their religion. But, besides the increase of hospital accommodations rendered needful by the rapid increase in population of the city, the Methodists are stimulated to liberality in this enterprise by the desire that their members in sickness may have "the privilege of being surrounded by the moral and spiritual atmosphere which one has been accustomed to breathe all his life."

Controversy.—In one of the speeches at the Congressional National Council at Chicago, R. R. Meredith called attention to the fact that there was often a substantial harmony in the experience of Christians who differed in dogma. Augustus Toplady and Charles Wesley took prominent parts on opposite sides, in the bitter controversy in England in last century between Arminianism and Calvinism. Yet Toplady wrote the hymn,

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me, Let me hide myself in thee."

And Wesley also wrote,

"Jesus, lover of my soul,
Let me to thy bosom fly."

"The sentiment," he said, "was the same in both hymns, and those men were one in their experience."

—Prison Discipline in Neufchatel.—A good handicraft is taught to every prisoner, and all who are well-behaved are, after a period, placed with a master of the trade which they have severally learned, under the oversight of the police and a member of a voluntary committee. This committee is composed of 1,400 active members, out of a total population of 102,000. The prisoner, when "provisionally liberated," has to present himself every week to his patron, who receives the reports of his master and of the police. The patron sends an abstract of these reports to the Governor of the prison, and in this way, if his conduct remains good, the man's liberty is gradually restored, and he regains his position in society—with the additional advantages of experience of discipline and knowledge of a trade.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 25, 1886.

The Council Fire is the title of a Monthly Journal, founded in 1878, and issued by T. A. Bland, at 1121 Tenth Street, N. W., Washington, D. C., at $1.00 per annum. It is devoted to the interests of the Indian Race of this country; and manifests much zeal in their cause. As an advocate of justice and humanity, we commend it to the favorable notice of our readers.

The last number contains a detailed report of a visit to different parts of the Indian Territory made by the Editor, which gives considerable information as to the present advanced condition of civilization of the Choctaw, Cherokee, and other allied tribes who dwell there.

Its Editor believes that the Indians generally are not prepared for a dissolution of their tribal organization and an allotment of their lands in severalty, as recommended by the convention that met at Lake Mohonk in the summer. The following instance of the practical working of that scheme, shows one of the dangers connected with it.

"During my recent visit to Indian Territory I got some facts bearing on the subject of land in severity to Indians, which show that the average Indian cannot safely be trusted with title to his land. The Black Bob band of Shawnee Indians owned a tract of 30,000 acres of land in the vicinity of Olathe, Kansas. In March, 1885, patents in severity were issued to those Indians for these lands. These patents were placed in the hands of W. J. Buchan, to be delivered to the Indians. John Hutchings was appointed by the Government attorney for the Indians, with instructions to guard the Indians against fraudulent persons who might try to cheat them out of their lands. Ex-Governor Thomas Kearney of Kansas, at once proposed to the Indians to buy their lands, offering them $3 per acre. Buchan, the Government agent, and Hutchings, attorney for the Indians, advised and urged the Indians to sell to Kearney at that price. Two-thirds of them did sell, and the sales were approved by Agent Tufts, of the Union Agency, at Muskogee. Robert L. Owen succeeded John Q. Tufts as agent, before the remaining 10,000 acres had been sold. Kearney, Buchan, Hutchings, and W. G. Williams, a Shawnee Indian, visited Muskogee for the purpose of securing the approval of Agent Owen to the sale of the remaining lands. They presented sworn statements from professedly disinterested men in Kansas, that the lands were not worth more than $3 per acre, and Kearney, Buchan, and Hutchings verified the truth of these statements on oath. The agent was suspicious, and taking the Indian, Williams, aside, questioned him and got a statement from him that while on the face of it he was selling his land for $3 per acre, that he was to get from Kearney $1,000 additional, $100 of which he had already received. He was to pretend to sell his land for $3 an acre, and not say anything about the $1,000 lest the other Indians should fuse to sell for $3 an acre. He said that his 200 acres were worth $4,000, but that Kearney, Buchan, and Hutchings had talked to him so much that he was tired, and let them have it for $1,600 to get rid of them. The agent very properly refused to approve the sale, and reported the facts to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with a recommendation that an investigation be had. Special Agent White was sent out to investigate, and his report to the Indian Office, dated April 8th, 1886, says among other things that the lands are worth $29 an acre, and he recommends that the three conspirators, Kearney, Buchan, and Hutchings, be disbarred from practice before the Interior Department and prosecuted in the United States courts."—*T. SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In the United States Senate, on the 17th inst., the bill for the retirement and recoinage of the trade dollar was taken up and passed. The House bill for the extension of the free delivery system, and the Senate bill to modify the postal money order system, were also passed.

The annual report of the Director of the Mint shows that, for the past fiscal year, the expenses of the Philadelphia Mint were $481,598.33. The operations of the Philadelphia Mint nearly all showed a marked increase over that of last year. The coinage executed consisted of 24,997,460 pieces of the value of $27,660,039.40, against 42,864,323 pieces, of the value of $18,509,280.25, in the preceding fiscal year.

A telegram from Bismarck, Dakota, says the Indian Commission returned from Fort Berthold on the 18th inst., having concluded a satisfactory agreement with the Gros Ventres, Mandan and Arickaree, Indians, who agree to cede all their reservation north of the 48th parallel, also the larger portion of the territory lying between the Missouri River and Fort Buford reservation. The Indians agree to take lands in severity on their diminished reserve.

The amount of oleomargarine which has paid the United States tax of two cents is stated, in a recent report to the Senate, to have been 4,430,174 pounds. This would make a revenue of more than half a million dollars per annum, if the remainder of the year shows an equal consumption, apart from the revenue derived from the licenses of manufacturers, wholesale and retail dealers.

The Kansas City Star publishes an interview with one of the Colorado capitalists interested with New York, Chicago and St. Louis parties in a scheme to buy or lease for a long term the Cherokee strip in the Indian Territory, containing 6,000,000 acres, with the in-tion of opening it up to settlement. The price mentioned is $3 per acre. The scheme also includes the acquisition of 5,000,000 acres in No Man's Land, extending to Mexico, claimed by the Cherokees.

The Supreme Court of Ohio, on the 10th inst., affirmed the constitutionality of the Dow liquor law in all its features, including tax and lien provisions.

Orange trees, the Alta Californica states, are being introduced into California from Japan, and, it is said, they will give a new and excellent variety of the fruit.

The mackerel fleet of Portland (Me.) has returned, after a poor season, with a total catch of 10,000 barrels, as against 80,000 barrels last year.

The returns of the recent election on the liquor question in Clarke County, Virginia, show that the Prohibitionists were defeated by 500 majority.

The Pennsylvania Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals has been in existence nineteen years, and during that time has attended to 137,705 cases of neglect and abuse, and has prosecuted 3100 offenders.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 419, which was 7 more than during the previous week, and 108 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing, 293 were males and 120 females; 79 died of consumption; 45 of pneumonia; 34 of diseases of the heart; 22 of old age; 19 of croup; 16 of inflammation of the brain; 12 of marasmus; 10 of paralysis and 10 of typhoid fever.

Markets.—U. S. 4½ 110½; 4's, coupon, 128½; registered, 127½; 3's, 101; currency 6's, 123½ a 134. Cotton was quiet, but steady, at 9½ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum.—Export demand was light at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 81 cts. for 110 test in cases.

Fuel was scarce, firm and in fair demand. Sales of 4 cars western winter bran, fair and good, at $17.50 a $17.75, and 3 cars do. choice and very fancy, at $18 a $18.75 per ton.

Flour and Meal.—Flour met with a fair inquiry, and ruled firm, under moderate supplies. Sales of 125 barrels of superfine, at $2.75; 125 barrels extra, at $3; 125 barrels Pennsylvania family, at $3.75; 250 barrels Pennsylvania roller, straight, at $4.25; 250 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4.20 a $4.25; 1000 barrels do., straight, on private terms; 500 barrels Ohio and Indiana, straight, at $4 a $4.40; 500 barrels winter patent, at $4.75 a $5; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4; 375 barrels do., straight, at $4.50 a $4.65; 750 barrels do., patent, at $5 a $5.10, and 125 barrels do. do., favorite brand, at $5.25. Rye flour moved slowly at $3.25 per barrel for choice.

Grain.—Wheat has been somewhat irregular, but closed steady, with 8½ cts. bid and 8½ cts. asked for No. 2 red. Corn was quiet, with 46 cts. bid, and 46½ cts. asked. Oats were steady and quiet; No. 2 white closing at 37½ cts. bid and 37½ cts. asked.

Deer cattle were $\frac{1}{2}$ c. higher, at 2½ a 5½ cts. Sheep were $\frac{1}{2}$ c. lower, at 2 a 4½ cts.

Hogs were slow and $\frac{1}{2}$ c. higher, at 6½ a 6½ cts. The receipts were: Bees, 2200; sheep, 9000; hogs, 9700.

FOREIGN.—John Dillon, Member of Parliament for East Mayo; William O'Brien, editor of United Ireland; Matthew Harris, Member of Parliament for East Galway, and David Sheehy, Member of Parliament for South Galway, were arrested on the 18th inst. in the town of Loughrea, County Galway, charged with conspiracy to defraud. The prisoners have been acting as trustees in conducting the plan of campaign, and have been receiving from dissatisfied tenants the reduced rents refused by landlords or landlord's agents. At the time of making the arrests the police took away from Dillon £80, which he had just received in trust from tenants. The four men were taken before a magistrate and remanded for a week.

On the 19th inst., Joseph Richard Cox, Jeremiah Jordan and Joseph Edward Kenny, Parnellite members for East and West Clare and South Cork respectively, succeeded yesterday in completely hoodwinking the police and in collecting and escaping with all the rents due from tenants on the Vandeleur estates, in County Clare.

W. E. Gladstone, in a letter to Prof. James Stuart, member of Parliament, says he thinks that the Home Rule measures are conservative in the truest sense of the term. He adds that if he can help in some measure to settle the affairs of Ireland he will confer upon Great Britain a service greater than any he has as yet been able to do.

The London Post in an inspired article, warns Turkey against further coquetting with Russia. The British Government, it says, has undergone great sacrifices to uphold the integrity of Turkey, even against the opinion of a large portion of the English people. Any hesitation on the part of Turkey will now compel England to adopt a course to counteract Russia's threats by measures that will speedily impress the Porte with the fact that Turkey's present doubtful policy is the worst for her real interests.

Count Herbert Bismarck, the German Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, at the reception of the Bulgarian deputation, advised the Bulgarians to reach an understanding with Russia.

The North German Gazette welcomes the indications of a better feeling between Russia and Germany, as shown in a recent article in the St. Petersburg Messenger. The two nations, says the Gazette, recognize that there are permanent binding interests common to both. The Gazette attributes the press bickerings to the influence of partisans of a policy of revenge against France.

The Paris Temps has advice from Zanzibar saying that the entire African coast between Kipini and Lamoo, including Manda Bay and the island of Galita, has been ceded to Germany.

A telegram from Ottawa says that an elaborate statement concerning the seizure of Canadian sealing schooners in Behring's Sea by the United States authorities has been prepared by the Dominion Government for transmission to the Imperial Government. "It will probably be made to appear that the United States Government views its fishing privileges on the Atlantic and on Pacific coasts from totally different standpoints."

DIED.—Seventh Month 13th, 1886, at the residence of her parents, Flushing, Ohio, ALICE, daughter of Stephen and Margaret Hobson, in the 23d year of her age, a member of Flushing Monthly Meeting of Friends, Ohio. This dear young Friend was unassuming in her manners, and careful and upright in her intercourse with others. She had been in declining health for several months, and often feelingly alluded to the uncertainty of her recovery, manifesting a sweet spirit of patience and resignation in relation thereto. A few days before her death, the physician informed her that she could not recover. Soon after, on her father entering the room she said, "Father, the doctor says I cannot get well, and I have prayed that my sins may be forgiven me." She now experienced a deep conflict of spirit, and afterward in allusion to it remarked: "I felt at first that it would be very hard to die and leave you all, but now I feel very different." and frequently requested those about her not to weep, saying she was willing to go, and that she did not suffer so much as she had done. From this time, during the brief space allotted her, she manifested much concern for those about her, imparting much counsel and instruction. She encouraged the young to read the Holy Scriptures more, saying, she had not spent as much time in that way as she ought to have done. Also, to attend meetings for religious worship, and admonished them not to think too much about dress, &c. She bade her relatives and friends an affectionate farewell, saying, it will soon all be over; and when her voice was so weak that she could not be understood, with uplifted hands and a countenance beaming with heavenly smiles, she impressed those around her that she realized a sensible foretaste of the unspeakable joy and peace that was, through great mercy, permitted to be her happy experience. Then extending her hands to her father and mother and clasping theirs, she quietly ceased to breathe, and so easy was her transition that it was difficult to ascertain the exact time when her purified spirit took its departure.

—, at her residence in West Chester, Chester Co., Pa., Eighth Mo. 6th, 1886, AMELIA ANNA PENNELL, in the 57th year of her age, a member of Concord Monthly Meeting of Friends. She endured many years of suffering with patience and resignation to the Divine will.

—, at his residence, Medford, New Jersey, on the 28th of the Eleventh Month, HENRY W. WILLS, an elder and member of Upper Evesham Monthly and Particular Meeting, aged 81 years. The cheerful, hospitable, and humble disposition of this beloved Friend, endeared him to his family and a large circle of friends, by whom his removal will be greatly felt. But we have the comforting belief that he was of that blessed number that, at their Lord's coming, were found waiting.

—, in Newburg, Orange County, New York, at the residence of his son, Samuel Birdsall, Twelfth Month 1st, 1886, GIDEON M. BIRDSALL, aged 92 years and 15 days.

—, at his late residence, Moorestown, N. J., on the 10th inst., STODDELL STOKES, a member of Frankford Monthly Meeting, Pa., and formerly a resident of Stroudsburg, Pa., in the 99th year of his age.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Twelfth Mo. 9th, 1842. On retiring last night and taking a retrospect of the day, could look up with more confidence. I believe there has been a more honest endeavor to maintain the watch. Another day is now before me, O, may preservation be experienced.

11th. During a little season of retirement early this morning, I was favored to draw near unto my Heavenly Father, and to crave a continuance of his protecting care and preservation. A quiet feeling prevailed throughout our morning meeting. After which it seemed as if the enemy renewed his force, and for want of keeping my eye steadily fixed on Him who hath all power, both in heaven and on earth, I find my strength has become weakened.

29th. Favored this evening with a religious opportunity which I hope may prove a fresh stimulus to be found working out our souls' salvation with fear and trembling, while the day lasteth. Dear Elizabeth Evans, who is here on a little visit, had a religious opportunity with all the teachers and the assistants; the superintendents being also present. We were shown what would alone qualify us for filling up our places rightly, &c.; how instrumental we might be made in bringing the dear lambs committed to our care, unto Christ, if we would only seek aright for that grace which alone is able to help. A warning voice also went forth to some present who she believed were losing ground in best things. In days past, although children, they had been keeping pace with the Lord's army; but of latter time they had broken their ranks, &c. O, the awakening call that went forth! saying, the Lord's host is going on; thou wilt be left behind, &c., &c. The opportunity closed with solemn supplication.

First Mo. 22d, 1843. Once more a little ability was given, during and previous to our meeting this morning, to draw nigh unto my Heavenly Father, and to pour out my heart as water before Him. Also to intercede that He would be pleased to point out the way more clearly in which He would have me to go; and the covenant was again and again renewed, "I will follow thee, only be with me."

Our afternoon meeting was also a favored one. Dear Sarah Emelen's voice was once more heard amongst us, in very tender persuasions with the dear children to close in with the offers of mercy; to yield unto their Heavenly Father all that was called for; and no matter how small the offering was, great would be their reward, repeating: "Bring all the tithes into the storehouse," &c. Spoke of the seamless garment worn by our blessed Redeemer, saying: "that it was not worn without a design." Greatly did she desire that covenants entered into under this roof, and might she not say in that room, by some of the dear children, might be kept when they left this place. She then believed that these very children would be made preachers of righteousness in their lives and conversation, &c.

A quiet, good feeling attended our evening collection. And upon retiring, feelings of gratitude flowed to the giver of all good, for once more remembering our low estate, and feeding with that bread which alone can make and keep alive the poor soul.

Second Mo. 2nd. Thou knowest, O Heavenly Father, all I desire is to be found serving thee acceptably.

5th. This day was entered upon in much weakness. But by being faithful to a little pointing of duty, strength seemed a little renewed: for which favor my heart was made to overflow with gratitude to Him, who was pleased thus to reward so feeble an endeavor.

17th. Have endeavored to walk more carefully; to avoid indulging in things which weaken my strength. But O! how the enemy has laid his snares to cause me to sin in thought, that which he cannot accomplish in actions. Thou knowest, O Heavenly Father, through what weakness I have endeavored to withstand him, when he has come in like a flood! Increase and strengthen, I pray thee, the little grain of faith that yet remains; that I may know an overcoming of all my soul's enemies. There seemed a little ability during our meeting yesterday to crave that this petition might be heard.

19th. Unsettled in meeting among the dear children. O, for ability availingly to plead for them, as well as for ourselves! Comforted since meeting in reading the strait poor Asa was in when he cried unto the Lord his God, and said: "Lord it is nothing to thee to help, whether with many or with them that have no power," &c.

21st. Attended Concord Quarterly Meeting. No public Friends there except our friend Samuel Cope. The meeting was held in much quietness, until broken by our dear friend with these words of the apostle: "Behold I go bound in the spirit unto Jerusalem," &c., &c., "but none of these things move me," &c. Opening and enlarging thereon in a very instructive manner. Throughout the last meeting there was, I thought, a lively exercise felt; and in my small measure I travailed with the travelling seed. O that we may become more a redeemed people! freed from letting and hindering things, so as to be able to hold up the standard in its ancient simplicity: not compromising with the world in any thing however small it may in our eyes appear. There is a weakness among many of us in the present day, which is, I verily believe, lessening our strength; and causing the honest inquirer after Truth, and the weak of the flock, to stumble. It is in imitating the fashions of the day in the making and cut of our apparel; and this even with some of the children of the standard-bearers amongst us: parts of whose dress being very inconsistent, being made in imitation of the world as near as they dare. How my spirit has mourned over these things! and this day, under a fresh feeling of the weakness crept in amongst us, was my heart poured out before the Lord: interceding that the spiritual eye of all of us might be opened to see things as they really are. That so there may still be a standard lifted up, with also a flocking unto it, as doves to the windows. Thou art able, O Lord! for thy own work. Hasten it, we pray thee, in the hearts of the people.

23rd. When the children were collected for meeting, I felt a drawing to go in and encourage them to stillness therein. After which my own weakness and shortcomings presented. Little will our precepts avail, if there is not on our part a right example set. I do not mean only an outward stillness, but an inward travail and exercise, that the weightiness of our spirits may evince to them our earnest engagement, and our very countenances prove the same.

Third Mo. 26th. I remembered this evening, whilst dwelling on my situation, how it was with the children of Israel! the more they were afflicted the more they multiplied and grew; yea, even when their lives were made bitter to them through hard bondage. But, alas, how fared it with them in the days of prosperity!

Fourth Mo. 2nd. "What shall we render unto the Lord for all his benefits?" What good meetings have we had this day! The afternoon was held in silence. In the morning, dear Sarah Emelen lifted up her voice both in testimony and in supplication. Each and all of our states seemed present with her. She first set before us the perfect and upright life of Job, who feared God and eschewed evil. She said, what was written aforetime was written for our instruction; and desired us to remember how Job, through all, held fast his integrity! Even when tempted to curse God and die, he could say, "Shall I receive good at the hands of the Lord, and shall I not also receive evil?" "I have heard of Thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee, wherefore I abhor myself and repent in dust and ashes." Thus, she said, it would be with all of us when we come to see ourselves as we really are; but told us it was possible to slide into such a hardened state, as not to feel our depravity. A lively conscience, she said, what a blessing it was! In a very feeling and affectionate manner, she spoke of the immortality of the soul. When man first breathes the breath of life, then it is he becomes a living soul. At first her exercise seemed to centre in a state or states present, who had heard the voice, but had not obeyed; and were going on choosing their own way, till they had nearly silenced this inward monitor: so that should the Lord speak to them out of deep trouble, comparable to the whirlwind, she seemed to fear their state was such that even then it would not be heard. While addressing this class she was much affected, and said she could weep day and night for such; withal setting forth the preciousness of the immortal soul, &c., &c. She next addressed some who were about to enter upon the troublous ocean of the world. Surrounded as they would be by many temptations, she desired such to seek after that one thing needful, as Agar petitioned: "One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after," &c. Then querying what this one thing was, she continued, 'tis the grace of God, which would keep and preserve in the day of trouble; if we have this for our foundation the storm may beat, the rain descend, the wind blow, but our building will stand. Her supplication was a very solemn one. After a moving appeal to our Heavenly Father, she went on—"Thou who knowest us altogether as we really are, Be pleased once more to turn thy hand upon those who are disregarding Thee, choosing their own way; follow them still, we pray Thee, even to the greatest extremity of their wanderings; O, spare them a little longer, like the fruitless fig tree, for the sake of their poor souls; for the sake of their tribulated parents; and above all for the sake of thy dear Son. Enlarging further in a very feeling and moving manner. Next were remembered the little fearful ones, who desire Thee more than the increase of corn, wine or oil. Be their comforter, be their consolation, &c. Then for the bereaved and afflicted ones—the mourners every where; that so Thy great name may be praised even in the midst of the fire," &c.

29th. After an absence of three weeks (our vacation) returned to this place yesterday; think I never entered upon duty here feeling the weight of things more heavily. May there be a fresh and earnest application of heart unto Him who alone is able to strengthen for the work.

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend."

Toad-stools and their Allies.—No. 3.

A short walk into a piece of low-lying woodland on the 25th of Eighth Mo., introduced me to some members of the Fungus tribes, with which I had not before been acquainted.

I found some new species of those forms in which the spore-producing surface is arranged in plates or gills below the cap (the Agaric family), and in tubes or pores (Polyporei); but was still more pleased, as I was about leaving the woods on my return, to see a rounded or pear-shaped mass, about the size of a Bartlett Pear, but not quite so elongated in shape, projecting from the earth. It was white, and of a rather compact spongy texture. This was, I believed, a member of the second great division of the Fungi, i. e., those in which the spores are formed in the interior of the plant without being exposed to the air. As this was the first of these that I had met with, since commencing these researches, I secured it as a treasure. An examination of it after my return home, led me to the opinion that it was a species of puff-ball, and probably belonged to the genus Lycoperdon, one kind of which sometimes grows to the size of a man's head, and is eatable when young.

Not far from this plant, I found a small rounded Fungus, about an inch in diameter, with a smooth, tough, dove-colored skin, the whole mass having a firmer feeling than belongs to many of the family. On cutting one into two, the inside was found to be a firm mass of cells, of a dark chocolate color. It was another of those species which produce spores within the body of the plant.

I did not reach my home until evening—and then warned by previous experience, I removed my specimens from the collecting box, and spread them out on the mantel of the dining room. I was surprised the next day to find that part of the Lycoperdon was covered with a pale yellow mould which had formed on it during the interval. Under the microscope, this was a beautiful object, consisting principally of a network of delicate transparent tubes, which branched in various directions. I had thus unwittingly cultivated a specimen of another great division of the Fungi, i. e., that to which the moulds belong. If we should have this fall the warm, moist weather which often prevails at this season of the year, I shall probably have many opportunities of seeing different members of this group; for every housekeeper knows how difficult it is to prevent the formation of moulds on provisions and other articles. They are beautiful objects for microscopic examination, but their organs are often too minute for satisfactory investigation without artificial aid.

Under the head of Mushrooms and Toad-stools, we may include nearly all of the members of the first grand division of Fungi, of which I have spoken. These are in general the most conspicuous, and easily examined of the different families. Many of the others are microscopic in size, and yet play a part in the processes of nature, of equal or even greater importance. Of the six great divisions of Fungi, I have mentioned but three; and I hesitate to enter upon the others at present, both from want of a fuller knowledge of them, and because I fear I cannot sufficiently interest others in them by merely written descriptions. Yet if any of my readers will take the pains to collect and examine the different forms of the larger Fungi which abound at this season of the year, compare them with each other, and note the various differences which distinguish one from the other, they will lay a foundation of knowledge on this subject, which may induce them to pursue still further a study, which modern discoveries have raised to great importance.

The Fungi differ from most other vegetable productions in containing a large proportion of nitrogen, an element which abounds in the flesh of animals. Several of the species are largely used for food; but as others are unwholesome, and many kinds very poisonous, great care is requisite in the selection. Even those which when fresh are eatable, become unfit for food as they approach decay.

They form an important article of food among the Fuegians and other savage tribes. In England and France the common Mushroom is a favorite species for this purpose, while in Italy other kinds are preferred. It is probable that most forms contain more or less of a poisonous alkali, and the amount of this varies with the condition, manner of growth, &c. One of the best English writers on Fungi, cautions his readers against too free a use even of the most wholesome kinds, and advises that they be eaten with a large admixture of bread. He recommends further to avoid all which have a disagreeable or forbidding smell, or that are not perfectly sound; and to take care that they are so cooked as to make them tender and easy of digestion.

The fine, dust-like spores of Fungi are produced in such abundance, and are so widely disseminated through the atmosphere, that whenever favorable conditions present, they are sure to develop. Their rapidity of growth is marvellous; and so also is the variety of situations in which they are found. It is not uncommon to find a species of Coprinus, (a mushroom with black gills and pores, already noticed in these articles) on the dressings of amputated limbs. Indeed it has become a usual practice in surgery as a defence against such growths, to treat the cut surface with a fine spray of carbolic acid solution which destroys the vitality of the vegetable spores.

"A gigantic Mould, of a dark shining green when dry, appears frequently on casks, or on the walls in oil-mills. The same species occurs sometimes in great abundance on casks of grease, flourishing in the most wonderful degree, and ultimately exhausting to a great depth the substance in which it grows."

Tannin is destructive to most vegetables, yet a species of Fungus frequently makes its appearance on the wood with which tan-pits are lined. So, also, there are other substances which are poisonous to nearly all forms of vegetable life, but which furnish a habitat for Fungi. The opium factories of India have suffered greatly from a Fungus which develops on the extracted opium. Solutions of arsenic, sulphate of iron, sulphate of copper, &c., do not prevent the growth of some forms of Fungi, though destructive to others. A few years since, a little Mould, developed in the solution of copper, used for electrotyping in the department of the Coast Survey of Washington, and proved an intolerable nuisance. It decomposed the salt, assimilating the sulphuric acid, and rejecting the copper which was deposited around its threads in a metallic form. One of these Moulds is sometimes developed in strong wine; another species is peculiarly attached to wine-cellar, where it hangs about the walls in black powdery tufts. Another form of Fungus attacks the corks of wine-bottles, destroys their texture, and at length impregnates the wine, making it unfit for use. There is an instance on record, in which a Fungus attacked a cask of wine, and grew to such a size as to completely block up the entrance to the apartment in which it was placed.

A beautiful red Mould sometimes appears in the centre of loaves of bread soon after they are baked. This was at one time notoriously the case with a coarse kind of bread at Paris, called "barrack-bread." Its appearance was explained by the fact that the spores of some Fungi will bear a moist heat equal to that of boiling water without losing their power of germination. In very hot weather, a Fungus of a bright blood-red suddenly develops on cooked provisions, spreading in little jets as if spirited from an artery.

For "The Friend."

"The attitude of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting" is often alluded to as "unique," "isolated." The oft repeated charge that it was "drifting towards Unitarianism" seems to have nearly died out; there are, however, strenuous efforts still made by some leaders to persuade their fellow-members to believe that it is fast going to decay. "Whether sound in doctrine or not, I don't know, but it is dying out," says one; "its place in the Church is too small to consider," says another.

While my heart's reply to these is, "Father forgive them, they know not what they do," I will not close my ears against what they say of the body of Christians my lot has been cast with; and I query, Lord, is this truth? and if so, how far do I contribute towards such a condition? Many times through life, and in many ways, have my enemies driven me to seek earnestly for an increase of humility; they may not love me, but I will love them, and wait, watching for an opportunity to do them good: in this spirit I find no room to wish them hurt, but instead thereof, abundant healing. I would not resist any thing others may say of us; but I would inquire concerning it as in the house of God, that even our holy things might be brought into judgment. I would have us open and quick to learn from whatever source—enabled to cast from us the evil that would prompt "stand by thyself I am holier than thou." If the excess in one is but the rebound from deadness in another, I would acknowledge it; if the license of to-day is but the natural outcome of long borne suppression, I would admit it frankly; yet Truth is precious, and he who departs from it because of departure in another, proves himself unstable.

Departures in faith and practice have become so radical, that Yearly Meetings adopting protest only, will find protest futile. The root remaining discension will continue.

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has deemed it right to protect her borders as far as possible from error, and under this fostering care her members to-day are very largely a compact, united body, laboring harmoniously together for the dear Master's cause, as He in his unquestioned prerogative, makes clear the way. There is much weakness to acknowledge—boasting is excluded. "We are nothing, Christ is all."

Of many in days past who were instrumental in shaping the course Philadelphia Yearly Meeting pursued, I believe it may truthfully be said, "their root was spread out by the waters, and the dew lay all night upon their branches; their glory was fresh in them, and their bow was renewed in their hand." Men and women like Joseph and Hannah Rhoads, do not walk in darkness.

I hope our attitude towards all bodies calling themselves Friends, is, and may continue to be, that of love—begetting unity where possible, charity, patience, forbearance: keeping free from entanglements: attending to our own business: doing the work of our day in the fear of the Lord, with a single eye to his glory and the spread and strengthening of his kingdom at home and abroad.

SAMUEL EMLEN.

Freshness of Spirit.

With the lapse of time there is always danger that the first zest and zeal will pass and leave us servants of duty or slaves of routine. Joy and enthusiasm fold their wings, and we walk wearily where we once passed with swift and victorious movement. Our business becomes drudgery, our duties onerous, our relations of affection lose their charm of sentiment.

The secret of perpetual freshness in a human soul, of renewing life each day in the beauty of the first creation, lies in the clear and permanent perception of the great spiritual forces and truths of which all visible things are the symbols.

The mother ministers to her child without pause or rest. Head, heart, hands and feet are incessantly taxed to care for, develop and direct the young life. There are times when all these grow weary and would fail if it were not for the consciousness, kept clear and luminous by love, of the inestimable worth of the growing soul that receives all this as its right, and does not even think its gratitude. Every true mother understands the spiritual relationship in which she stands to the little group at her feet, and this perception sheds a continual radiance about them and her.

Not less deeply and fruitfully are we all related to our duties—those incessant demands upon our life which at times almost drain it to the last drop. Met simply from a sense of obligation, without the abiding consciousness of their spiritual significance, they deplete and exhaust us; but met with the clear insight which discerns the growing purpose of God behind them, they become transformed and radiant with prophecy and promise; the drudgery of the day is no longer drudgery when one sees in it the slow unfolding of a great new thought for one's coming life.

In all our relations with the men and women about us, there is the same tendency to weariness and the same remedy for it. In the sacred privacy of the home there are, year in and out, the same faces, names, voices, duty, occupations; there is a routine which conceals and at times almost buries the deep and beautiful ties that have made the family imperishable and invulnerable amid the vicissitudes of civilization. They only know the joy which makes these relations wells of inspiration and happiness along the journey of life, who hold in clear view the rich spiritual relationships of which the family ties are a perpetual and beautiful revelation, a parable repeated from generation to generation with ever-deepening meaning.

Spiritual strength is the only real strength, because it alone is capable of infinite renewal; and in the possession of this strength lies the secret of that freshness of sentiment and zeal which, like a dew from heaven, revives the rarest flowers along the path of life, and renews day by day the beauty and fragrance of their earliest blooming.—Christian Union.

Dwarfing.

For "The Friend."

Japanese gardeners are notorious for their dwarfing propensities. Pigmy specimens of the forest giants are considered an essential feature in their landscape adornments. By keeping their plants in small pots, and persistently checking their growth by pruning the tops and roots, they produce stunted little hiliputs that are wonderful curiosities as abortions of nature. They have miniature oak trees one hundred years old, and only twenty inches high. Pines and firs two feet high, whose gnarled appearance bears evidence of a century of struggles for life in cramped quarters and in continual conflict with the gardener's pruning knife. There were a few such specimens planted around the Japanese building at the Centennial Exhibition.

And so, many a Christian's life is dwarfed by neglecting the opportunities for doing good that are presented; and thereby checking his spiritual growth. Obedience must keep pace with knowledge, or we shall cease to learn. Our talents must be improved, or they will be taken from us. But many, whose lives should shine as bright lights in the world, are dwarfed into insignificance through fear of encountering the opposition of surrounding influences. They find it easier to drift along in the channels of prevailing customs, than to testify against them by word or example, or both, as duty may require. They have not the moral courage to stand up and boldly maintain in the face of public opinion a righteous disapproval of unrighteous customs; and thus their sense of discernment between right and wrong becomes dimmed, so that they do not see clearly what their whole duty is. Their growth is checked through inaction. And then they plead as an excuse for their negligence, "If I was only sure what my duty is," I would be willing to make any sacrifice that was required, but at the same time they are more willing to keep out of their Master's service than they are to offer themselves freely as Isaiah did, when he said "here am I, send me." They shun rather than seek the daily cross that was commanded by our Saviour, and is now called for by his spirit within us.

Although nominally Christians, they never attain the dignity and importance which that noble name implies. They are dwarfed and stunted like the Japanese gardener's trees.

For "The Friend."

Weighty Sayings and Quotations.

We may know what is said or written of Christ but not savingly know Him for ourselves. A head knowledge is one thing, but a heart-felt and a heart-changing knowledge is something else. The one fits us for earth, the other fits us for heaven. We are by nature prone to do the will of the deceiver, but not the will of our Saviour. Is not the natural man dead in trespasses and sins, until he is quickened and made alive by the Holy Spirit? And when he is made alive, does he not need the milk of the word, and the bread of life before he can grow strong in the Lord, and be enabled to work for Him? And do we not need the bread of life day by day? Does not the natural or outward life, and the spirit of man, move the natural man in worldly things? And should not the inner life of the spiritual man move him in heavenly things?

All individuals and churches are fallible and liable to err, when not led and not actuated by the light of that infallible Spirit which cannot err.

The unerring and infallible light or grace of God which brings salvation, has appeared to all in order to lead all who will be led by it, out of the fallen nature and to restore them into the lost image of God. And nothing less than a Divine and eternal light and life, can lead us to the eternal day. And this eternal and universal light shines in the dark hearts of all as a conqueror for sin; and to enlighten and lead all who believe in it, and comprehend it, out of their sinful nature. But will Christ be a Saviour to such as do not open their eyes, and receive his light, and so walk in it as to be saved by Him?

IMPUTED RIGHTEOUSNESS.

"Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin." We must first be brought into this blessed condition before our faith will be imputed unto us for righteousness. Was not Abraham in a living and obedient faith when he was called upon to offer up his only son as a burnt offering unto the Lord? Abraham knew that it was through Isaac that all the families of the earth were to be blessed. For it was said, that "in Isaac shall thy seed be called." So his trial of faith must have been great, yet "he staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief; and therefore his faith was imputed unto him for righteousness." For he believed that God was able to raise up Isaac from the dead. And our faith will be imputed unto us for righteousness only as "we believe on Him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead."

God will not justify the ungodly unless they become obedient through living faith, which works by love and changes them from ungodliness to purity of heart. And in that faith all the families of the earth are blessed. But the righteousness and the blessings of the gospel are not imputed to us, nor to any of the nations of the earth, by obedience to the rituals of the ceremonious or outward law, or by works of righteousness which we in the strength of man can do.

As life and immortality are brought to light by the gospel, which is inwardly revealed, it becomes us to use this life and light in working out our own salvation; and then we may be instrumental in turning many to righteousness, so as to shine as the brightness of the firmament in God's everlasting kingdom.

But "as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also." And nothing but a living faith will be imputed unto us for righteousness. Christ's righteousness becomes our righteousness only as we willingly accept it. And it is freely offered to all, without money; and without price.

Christ came to his own outwardly, but they as a people received Him not. But as many as received Him in the way of his coming, to them gave He power to become the children of God, even to as many as so far believed in Him, and in his overshadowing power as to be begotten of Him and born again. And He comes to his own now inwardly and spiritually, and as many as receive Him, and work with Him and use the power which He gives, become his redeemed children; because they savingly believe in his name, and their faith is imputed unto them for righteousness.

But it is by obedience with good works that we become heirs of that righteousness which is of faith. And when Christ's righteousness comes to be our righteousness through faith; then shall we be like He was, when personally on earth—a friend to sinners but not a friend to sin.

Children as Teachers.

"Mother," said Fanny C., a sweet little girl of seven years, brushing back her auburn curls, "mother, what does this mean?"—"For our conversation is in Heaven."

The child had been sitting a full half hour, on the cricket at her mother's feet—her bright face bending over her book with that earnest gaze that betokens the most intense thought; but she had not, it seemed, entirely satisfied herself. So she looked up confidently to her mother for information. But she was also absorbed in a book and did not heed the gentle child, who again repeated more eagerly, "Mother, what does this mean?"—"For our conversation is in Heaven."

"What book have you, Fanny?" asked her mother. "Oh! the Bible." "Well I am glad you are reading it to-day;" [it was First-day] and the conscience struck mother glanced at the "last new novel" in her own hand, which she had been devouring.

"But you have not told me what this means, mother—"For our conversation is in Heaven."

"Oh! it means that we should talk about good things, that is, about heaven and the angels; and read the Bible," said her mother.

"You know when the ladies were here at your party, mother?"

"Yes, my love."

"Was their conversation in heaven?"

"I fear not, my child. But why do you ask?"

"I have been thinking," said the little girl, drawing a long breath, as though her thoughts had been compressed with much difficulty—"I have been thinking that people must speak very loud to have their conversation in heaven, and I wanted to know if that was the reason which made the ladies at your party talk so loud."

Her mother could not forbear smiling at the idea of such nonsense as usually comprises the conversation of a fashionable party, being heard in heaven; yet she keenly felt the rebuke of the innocent child, while she endeavored to answer carelessly—"We do not talk about heaven at our parties, Fanny."

"But when is your conversation in heaven, mother?" persisted the little girl.

The question was a simple one, but her poor mother was more troubled to answer it, than she would have been to discuss the effects of gravitation or the properties of light. She bent her lips to the cheek of her lovely daughter, and a tear mingled with a kiss, as she thought how this world had engrossed her heart and soul, her time and her talents; and how neglectful she had been of the moral and religious training of her precious child. "And now she is teaching me!" thought the mother.

And a happy teaching it was. She is an altered woman; and her little girl no longer thinks it necessary for ladies to talk loudly to have their conversation in heaven.—Selected.

BEGIN WITH NEW YEAR'S DAY.

A widow sat in her cottage dark;
For the fire was burning low—
Such a feeble fire, such a tiny spark,
You could hardly catch the glow.

Her eyes were dim, and her back was bent,
But her fingers busy yet;
From her burdened heart a cry up went
To Him who can ne'er forget.

A baby slept on a pallet bed,
From care and sorrow free;
While a gentle girl laid her weary head
To rest on her mother's knee.

She spoke with sorrowful voice and look;
"They tell me 'tis New Year's Day,
But I hardly believe it, mother dear,
With all the old debts to pay.

Old trials, old clothes, old shoes, old house,
Old hunger, and need of gain,
The only new thing I see, mother dear,
Is a hole in the window-pane.

In books, when people are sad and cold,
A good man always comes
With a basket as full as it can hold
Of loaves and pies and plums:

And when he finds the mother good,
And the children pale and thin,
He puts a hankerchief over their eyes
And says they must go with him;

And they wake to find a lovely stay;
And he hopes they will always stay;
Oh, mother, I wish this man would come
And knock at our door to-day!"

Then the mother laid her sewing down,
And in tender tones began:
"My darling, I know a Book, all true,
Which tells of a glorious man—

Who is knocking at our hearts to-day,
And if we let Him in,
He nevermore will go away,
But wash us clean from sin.

And then just close our weary eyes
As in the tale you've told,
And take us to a 'better land!
Where e'en the streets are gold.

Oh, such a land! no mortal eye
Hath seen its pleasures bright;
We shall never pine for sunshine there,
For Jesus is the light.

Yet He was sad and weary once,
And therefore knows our way,
So trust Him, darling, for evermore,
Beginning with New Year's Day."

A NEW YEAR'S WISH.

What shall I wish for thee? Friend of my journey,
Standing with me on this land-mark of time,
Watching the ebb of a wave that returns not,
Past beyond ken, with the voice of yon chime.

What shall I wish for thee? Life has been dreary, Hands have waxed feeble, and hearts have grown sore;
White sails are fading afar in the distance,
Freighted with vain hopes, they came back no more.

Once, from my heart, happy wishes were springing—
Riches, and gladness, and health and long life,
Friends to be near thee, and dear ones to cheer thee,
Sleep without sadness and home without strife.

Ah! life some lessons has taught me since then,
Turning light wishes and hopes into prayer;
How can I choose for thee? How can I wish for thee?
Best of my wishes may bring thee a snare.

Now, as the ocean of time heaves around us,
Think I, How perished such treasures as these?
Too rich the bark to want Christ at the helm,
Therefore it sank in the depths of the seas.

Better, the fishing-boat tossed on the billow!
Better, the storm that the Lord bids it brave!
Safe shall the harbor be gained ere the nightfall,
Safe shall He pilot it over each wave.

Therefore I wish—not for calm, or for sunshine—
May God choose our lot in this year and in all;
Only that Christ be in sorrow or gladness—
Only to trust Him, whatever befall.

Christ for the wintry days, Christ for the Summer,
Christ for the bright hours, Christ for the dark;
Brave be our hearts as we launch on the New Year,
Never to perish with Christ in the bark.

The Compliment in Journalism.

The custom of "paying compliments" is pretty sure to lead to, if indeed it be not generally prompted by, insincerity, and insincerity means untruthfulness. It is therefore antagonistic to that simplicity of address which should characterize the speech of the Christian. It is the habit of the world, and, because it was opposed to the truth, Friends came away from it. The Wesleyan Methodist has seen the folly of this thing in journalism and thus pointedly speaks:

"We seldom pay compliments. They are nearly always offered by insincere people, and we want to be always sincere. There was a time when these columns were full of them; but we believe that to really good people, the consciousness of the performance of duty is the best reward. Let a brother know he is appreciated, but don't tickle his vanity by special references. Few can stand it, and you fill the role of tempter, and help your brother to sin."

The foregoing allusion was probably called out in part, by a practice very common in the "religious press" of printing items of "personals" wherein the doings of this bishop, and that "Rev. Dr." or evangelist are given prominence. I will not say that all reference to the movements of those publicly engaged in religious service needs to be always suppressed, but that right judgment is called for when the rule of reticence, so to speak, is departed from. The Wesleyan's true concern, however, was doubtless largely owing to the so common practice, in the report of ministers' sermons, of referring to the speakers in terms of excessive commendation and even of adulation. It was Solomon who said that "the flattering mouth worketh ruin." I have therefore queried when I have seen it stated that our daily newspapers, instead of publishing so much worthless news and gossip, should give much more space to reports of religious and philanthropic meetings and movements, whether the spiritual vitality of the community would greatly profit by the exchange—unless indeed the reporter used his pen with a better restraint in the bestowment of flattering adjectives than does, in too many instances, the ministerial editor. Were the daily papers to devote a large percentage of their space to “good matter” such as indicated, reported in the popular way, would not the effects be as mischievous in that direction as have become the widely spread public reporting of inter-collegiate ball-matches and boat-races upon the pupils in our higher institutions of learning? Blandishments, especially when publicly bestowed, are able to accomplish that which cannot be done by hatred, contumely and “all the fiery darts of the wicked.”

The Boston Christian, upon the subject of dealing in compliments, further says: “The man who has a hankering after compliments will do well [selfishly speaking] not to allow his convictions to stand in the way of his subservience to constituted authorities. If he keeps on the right side of the ‘powers that be,’ his abilities will be proclaimed and trumpeted abroad. But if he happens to find himself on the other side of important questions, it will be a long time before the public are likely to find out how ‘eminent’ or ‘able’ or ‘useful’ he is. Time sets some things right; eternity settles all things. In that day how vain and trivial will be the compliments of earth, in comparison with the Master’s word, ‘Well done.’”

In the Student, probably three years ago, there was a suggestion that some of our young members of a literary turn of mind, might profit peculiarly by engaging in journalistic pursuits or by contributions to the periodicals. The conscientious writer, however, will be very apt, as said above, “to find himself on the other side of important questions,” the side which is not popular. He will see how the daily press publications work together and compliment each other, even those professing of a high moral tone, bestowing encomiums on sheets the scandalous contents of which they would think it very wrong or inexpedient for themselves to print. Should he feel a concern on account of this to extend kindly counsel, he will be likely to learn how coolness may succeed warm commendation, and thus to prove the unreliability of the maxim—in the sense that the maxim is usually understood—that “honesty is the best policy.” Finally there may open up a prospect of receiving pecuniary compensation for his time and toil, but the Guiding Hand may indicate how (in this case at least) it were better to refuse any pay lest self-interest be charged, or independence be lost, and so any part of the truth which should be spoken, be withheld. Yet experiences differ, and there may be that laid upon one which may not be required of another.

It will not be inferred, from what has been hereinbefore expressed relative to “compliments” that the judicious manifestation of approval is in any wise discouraged. The family or school in which reproof is never relieved by commendation, will be likely to exhibit some unsatisfactory and unhappy results as a consequence of this one-sided way of procedure. While mere flattery or excessive commendation is apt to have its root in selfishness, the simple, kindly word of encouragement and approval is as the “cup of cold water” of which our Divine master would have us not forgetful, seeing it may be blessed to both giver and receiver. There are those, little or not at all publicly known, and who seldom get far away from the thresholds of their quiet homes, who have done acceptable service in this direction. There are also those whose lives have known little release from pain, or toil, or sorrow, and who have experienced little of human sympathy or approval, who nevertheless, have not lacked enduring sustenance and support, their whole expectation being like David’s from the Lord. The following extract from a late paper, well expresses the latter thought:

“There is no greater strength manifested on earth than that of quiet endurance. I have known, and so have you, those on whom for years there has not risen a single unclouded day; those, too, who know all the gladness of life, but for whom the sun was darkened long before it had climbed to its meridian height; those whose bereavements have involved the loss of everything that seemed to make life precious; those who have been rendered permanently helpless by chronic disease, and can never hope for a painless waking hour or a night of restful sleep; those whose penury has been absolute, and entire, with no prospect of relief.

“Among these have been the very bravest, strongest souls that I have ever known; and it has seemed to me that no emergency of outward action, not even of the foremost of the sacramental host in waging the great conflicts in behalf of the truth and the right, has equalled theirs, who could endure without murmuring, and could render constant thanks to God for the heavenly manna which has fed them, for the living waters of which they have drunk deep draughts, for the hope full of immortality, which has never for a moment forsaken them.”

JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

An Experiment.

G. F. Pentecost in The Independent relates the following chapter of his early experiences:

When I was a little boy of eight or nine years, I was sitting with my old grandmother before a great old-fashioned open fireplace on which a great fire of logs was burning. The dear old mother suspended her knitting for a moment (she was always knitting), and stooped down to arrange the two ends of a stick of wood which had burned through and fallen out on the hearthstone. In doing so, her spectacles fell off her nose on to the stone hearth, and one of the eyeglasses was unfortunately broken. But my “granny” was not disturbed by the accident. She quietly pulled the extra pair, which she always carried on the top of her head, down to her face, and picked up the broken pair. Having satisfied herself of the extent of the damage, she at once released the whole eyeglass from the frame, and, turning to me, said:

“Here Fred, is something which will amuse you,” and she handed me the unbroken eyeglass.

I did not know in what way I might be amused by what to my eyes was but a little piece of glass. It was a double convex lens; but then a convex lens was a scientific instrument of unknown value to me, so I said:

“I don’t see how I am to amuse myself with that, “Grandma?”

The dear old lady rose from her place before the fire, and leading the way, said: “Come with me, my dear, and I will show you how you may amuse yourself with this bit of glass whose use and power you do not understand.”

It was a brilliant day in winter time: the sun was shining from a cloudless sky, and being near noon time, it was at the height of its power.

My grandmother led me out on to the broad veranda on the south side of the house, and taking a piece of white paper with her, she placed the bit of glass above it, facing the sun. In an instant there appeared a brilliant circle of white light upon the surface of the white paper. This at once interested me. I could not understand why the sun shining through the glass should make it so white and light. But the wonder was to come. Drawing the glass up and down the brilliant spot increased and decreased in size until at last the spot of light shrank into an infinitesimal point of white light; and then in a moment, to my astonishment, the paper began to smoke, and then to burn. I was filled with wonder and amazement. The power of a double convex lens to concentrate rays of the sun upon a focal point and generate such a heat as to produce combustion was unknown to me. In the midst of my exclamations of wonder my good grandmother repeated her experiments upon the side of the house and upon the sleeve of my jacket, until I was wild with a desire to try it myself. Having obtained the precious instrument, I experimented with it until I succeeded in operating it with satisfactory results; and then I bolted down the village street in search of boys to whom I intended to exhibit my wonderful “burning glass.” I quickly found an interested company of spectators, to whom I explained the wonders of the glass and made demonstration of its powers upon their jacket sleeves and upon the back of their hands, whenever I could induce some skeptic to allow me to prove to him that the smoke and fire were no tricks but real substances produced by the glass.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 111.

MINISTRY.

In the exercise of the ministry, as in other things of a spiritual nature, the Lord is often pleased to make use of instruments that seem weak and even contemptible to the wise and prudent of this world. Barbara Everard, who lived at Ashwell in England, was an example of this, of whom Joseph Oxley says in his journal:—“In this place lives Barbara Everard, a poor, honest, decrepit creature, apparently convulsed all over, by which her speech is much affected, and understanding also. Yet the Lord has been pleased to make use of this young woman in an extraordinary manner, having bestowed on her a gift in the ministry; in which office she appears above many of far more natural talents. In common conversation she is difficult to be understood, being of a stammering tongue; but very clear in utterance in her ministry, her matter very correct and sound, opens the Scriptures very clearly, and preaches the Gospel with great power and authority, and is of singular service in this place: she had at this meeting good service.”

In a letter to Joseph Oxley, dated 9th of Seventh Month, 1760, Barbara speaks of herself and of one of her engagements as follows:—

“I believe the Lord will have a people to bear testimony to his great name and truth in the earth, for He is sometimes pleased to make use of mean and contemptible instruments, to bear testimony to his great name, of which number I am one, as thou knowest very well. Yet the Lord doth not forsake me, for He is near to help all those that put their trust in Him.

“For some time I had a concern upon my mind to go to a place called Weson, about two miles from Baldoek, to have a meeting, where there had not been a meeting held for about 20 years before, which made me loth to give up to it. But when the mighty power of God arose in me, I was made willing; and my uncle and one of our young Friends went with me; and the meeting was very large, there being as was supposed 200 people at it; and I had a good, open time among them, and they behaved soberly, so that I came away with a reward of peace in my own bosom: for the Lord is a rich rewarder of all them that faithfully serve Him."

Barbara's expression, "When the mighty power of God arose in me, I was made willing," reminds one of the similar language of the Apostle, "I can do all things through Christ, who strengtheneth me." It is this divine power and wisdom which comes from on High, that gives all its authority to Gospel ministry. As people come to feel after and trust to this, they will be preserved from placing their confidence in anything which man can do in his own unassisted strength. The Apostle Paul reminds the Corinthians that his speech and his preaching among them had not been with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power, so that their faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God. Yet Paul was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, and was well versed in the learning of the Jews. Ratty, in his account of Friends in Ireland, makes a similar statement in regard to Alexander Seaton, one of the early ministers of our Society; that although he was a scholar, he was not much known to be such in his services for the Lord, not esteeming that learning in comparison to the gift of God, and the operation of his Holy Spirit.

Job Scott was a man of unusual powers of mind; but it is recorded of him, that in the exercise of his gift, he was "circumspect not to minister without fresh anointing; and careful in attending to the turnings of the key of David; well knowing that when that shuts none can open; and therefore when he perceived his subject to close and the life withdrawn, however clear his opening, and free the spring of life had been at his beginning, he would suddenly sit down, however, in the cross; for he had a testimony to bear against all superficial and lifeless ministry, and very exemplarily avoided it."

The same care was exercised by Thomas Wilson, one of those dignified laborers in the Gospel, whom the Lord raised up in the early days of the Society of Friends. When on a religious visit in Ireland, he says, "The motion of life in me for travelling ceased, and I durst not then go further, but returned back to the County of Wexford, and wrought harvest-work at Lambstown for some time." James Dickenson coming over from Cumberland, "the Lord was pleased to open my way to go with him, and we travelled together in true brotherly love, and had a prosperous journey." After a time, "I was afraid of running before my true Guide (because they who run and are not sent of God can neither profit the people nor themselves) and so I staid at work in the City of Waterford about 16 weeks."

Isaac Penington in describing his own experience gives an interesting account of the effect upon him of that divine power which accompanied the ministry of George Fox. He had before met with Friends, but, he says, "the more I conversed with them, the more I seemed in my understanding and reason to get over them, and to trample them under my feet, as a poor, weak, silly, contemptible generation. After a long time I was invited to hear one of them (as I had been often, they in tender love pitying me, and feeling my want of that which they possessed;) and there was an answer in my heart, and I went with fear and trembling, with desires to the Most High, who was over all, and knew all, that I might not receive anything for truth which was not of Him, nor withstand anything which was of Him; but might bow before the appearance of the Lord, my God, and none other. And indeed, when I came, I felt the presence and power of the Most High among them, and words of truth from the Spirit of truth reaching to my heart and conscience, opening my state as in the presence of the Lord. Yea, I did not only feel words and demonstrations from without, but I felt the dead quickened, the seed raised; inasmuch that my heart (in the certainty of light, and clearness of true sense) said, 'This is He, this is He, there is no other: this is He whom I have waited for and sought after from my childhood; who was always near me, and had often begotten life in my heart; but I knew him not distinctly, nor how to receive Him, or dwell with Him.'

His own conviction having been effected, not by the wisdom of man but by the power of God, when he was called unto the ministry, he was careful that his own labors and those of others should be under the same divine anointing. William Penn testifies of him, that "He was very urgent that all those who knew anything of the heavenly gift of ministry unto others, would always wait in their several exercises to be indued with matter and power from on high, before they opened their mouths in a testimony for the Lord." Christopher Taylor says, "His ministry was accompanied by a holy, heavenly zeal, in the opening life of God's eternal power and wisdom: so that the tender power of God that spoke through him, would preciously raise the life in others."

Anecdote of Chief Justice Holt.—Sir John Holt, Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, 1709, who, it is said, was extremely wild in his youth, being once engaged with some of his rakish friends in a trip into the country in which they had spent all their money, it was agreed that they should try their fortune separately. Holt arrived at the inn at the end of a straggling village, ordered his horse to be taken care of and bespoke a supper and a bed. He then strolled into the kitchen, where he observed a little girl of thirteen shivering with ague. Upon making inquiries respecting her, the landlady told him that she was her only child and had been ill nearly a year, notwithstanding all the assistance she could procure for her from physic. He gravely shook his head at the doctors, bade her be under no further concern, for that her daughter should never have another fit. He then wrote a few unintelligible words in a court hand, on a scrap of parchment, which had been the direction affixed to a hamper, and rolling it up, directed that it should be bound upon the girl's wrist, and there allowed to remain till she was well. The ague returned no more, and Holt, having remained in the house a week, called for his bill. "God bless you, sir," said the woman, "you're nothing in my debt, I'm sure; I wish, on the contrary, that I was able to pay you for the cure which you have made of my daughter. Oh! if I had had the happiness to see you ten months ago it would have saved me £40." With pretended reluctance he accepted his accommodations as a recompense, and rode away. Many years elapsed; Holt advanced in his profession of the law, and went on circuit, as one of the Judges of the Court of King's Bench, into the same county, where, among other criminals brought before him, was an old woman, under charge of witchcraft. To support this accusation, several witnesses swore that the prisoner had a spell, with which she could either cure such cattle as were sick, or destroy those that were well, and that in the use of this spell she had been lately detected, and it was now ready to be produced in Court. Upon this statement the Judge desired that it might be handed up to him. It was a dirty ball wrapped round with several rags, and bound with packthread. These coverings he carefully removed, and beneath them found a piece of parchment, which he immediately recognized as his own youthful fabrication. For a few minutes he remained silent; at length, recollecting himself, he addressed the jury to the following effect:—"Gentlemen, I must now relate a particular of my life which very ill suits my present character, and the station in which I sit, but to conceal it would be to aggravate the folly for which I ought to atone, to endanger innocence, and to encounter superstition. This bauble, which you suppose to have the power of life and death, is a senseless scroll which I wrote with my own hand and gave this woman, whom, for no other reason, you accuse as a witch." He then related the particulars of the transaction with such an effect on the minds of the people that his old landlady was the last person tried for witchcraft in that county.—Pettigrew's Superstitions connected with the History of Medicine and Surgery.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Discovery of the Velocity of Light.—This discovery furnishes an interesting illustration of the manner in which some disagreement between the real and the expected results of an experiment or a calculation, sometimes gives the hint which leads to important discoveries.

At one time (says an exchange) Römer, the astronomer, was engaged in a series of observations to determine the period of the revolution of one of Jupiter's moons. To do this, he noted the interval between the successive disappearances of the moon in the shadow of its planet; and having found this, he proceeded to verify it by constructing tables of the satellite's motions, and by comparing these tables with the actual motion as observed through the telescope. But to Römer's astonishment, he found that his tables were all wrong. Somehow or other, the moon failed to appear at its predicted time. At first it always came late and with a lateness which gradually increased until it reached the amount of twenty-two minutes; then a change came, and it began to show the same regular increase in the earliness of its appearances. Here, apparently, was a total failure of the result which Römer had aimed at. But Römer knew, that, if he had failed, his failure had a cause; and he set himself to find it. He had noticed that the variations in the apparent motion of the moon which was under observation, corresponded with the changing position of the earth in her annual course round the sun; and the suggestion came to him that the apparent variation in the motion of the satellite was due, not to any actual variation on its part, but to the difference in time occupied by the light from the satellite in travelling to the earth, according as the earth was near to Jupiter, or far from it. Here was a clew to a great discovery,—no less than the discovery of the velocity of light, with which Römer's name is now indissolubly connected.

Specimens of Buffalo.—In view of the rapid extinction of buffalo in the States and Territories of the Union, the National Museum recently sent its chief taxidermist, Wm. T. Hornaday, with two or three assistants, to Montana and Wyoming, for the purpose of securing good specimens before it is too late. Hornaday now reports in a letter to Prof. Baird that he has succeeded in getting twelve of these animals, some of which will be mounted and placed on exhibition in the National Museum, and the remainder distributed to the principal colleges of the country.—Washington Star.

Poisoning by Hair Dies.—The Medical News says, that as no cosmetic for the skin has been found that equals white lead in body, smoothness and adhesiveness, so no dressing for the hair is effectual in gradually darkening it unless it contains lead; which can be discovered in most of the "hair restorers" in the market.

The long continued use of any of these lead preparations slowly poisons the system; and it is safer to avoid them altogether.

Bounty on Destruction of Wild Animals.—The Secretary of the State Board of Agriculture recently addressed a circular to the Treasurer and Commissioners of each county asking them how much bounty had been paid for the destruction of wolves, wild-cats, foxes, minks, hawks, weasels, and owls since the act of June 23rd, 1885, went into effect. What would be the effect of repealing the law as far as it refers to hawks and owls, and what would be the effect if the whole law were repealed? The answers to the first question indicate that the total amount paid by all counties will not fall short of $100,000. The answers to the second question were practically unanimous in favor of the exemption of hawks and owls, and to the third question it is evident that if the existence of the law depended upon the Treasurers and Commissioners, it would promptly be repealed. The Commissioners of Crawford County write that the destruction of hawks and owls is a great damage to the farm.

The Palmyra Palms.—The South Eastern province of India, on the Coromandel coast, is a comparatively parched and barren region, being cut off from much of the rain of the South West Monsoon by a high mountain ridge. Yet it is well adapted to the growth of the Palmyra Palms, which sends its long roots to great depths in the earth in pursuit of moisture. Bishop Caldwell says that when digging a well in his grounds, he struck these roots 40 feet below the surface.

Its leaves and wood are applied to a variety of uses, but its chief value is as a producer of food; it furnishes the chief means of support to several millions of the human family. In an article in the Sunday School Times, Helen H. Holcomb, says of it: "The most valuable product of the tree, is its juice or sap. This sweet water flows from the flower-stalk at the top of the tree. From the heart of the circle of leaves crowning the top several bunches of flower-stalks appear during the fruiting season, and each stalk throws out many branches. When cut or bruised, each branch yields about a pint a day of sweet water. The chief occupation of the inhabitants of the Palmyra-growing districts is the gathering of the sap of the tree, and converting it into sugar. The women and children gather wood from the angles, and boil the sap; while the able-bodied male members of the family find occupation in climbing the trees and collecting the sap. A strong and active man will climb, upon an average, fifty palmyra trees twice and sometimes thrice, a day; and as these trees are from sixty to ninety feet high, branchless, and perfectly straight, it is, as may be imagined, hard and exhausting labor, especially in such a climate as that of India.

The tools of a palmyra climber consist of a large curved knife, for removing the old leaves and cutting the flower-stalk, and a pair of wooden pincers for bruising or crushing the stalk after it has been cut or sliced, to facilitate the flow of the sap. These he carries in a pouch fastened to his waist cloth on one side; and fastened to, or bound up in, the same garment, on the other side, are a number of small earthen vessels. When ready to make the ascent, he places against the foot of the tree a crutch. Mounting this, the climber passes his feet through a loop of palmyra fibre to keep them together. He then clasps the tree with his joined hands, while the soles of his feet, bent inwards and supported by the loop, clasp the tree as much as the hands do. The climber draws himself up by his hands and his feet follow. Thus, by a series of springs, he reaches the top of the tree. Seated upon one of the gigantic leaf-stalks, he cuts and bruises the numerous flower branches, and then attaches to each a little earthen vessel. After the first ascent he takes with him, each time he performs his difficult journey a leaf bucket, plaited double, to hold the accumulated sap.

The unfermented sap, as it is taken from the tree, is very nourishing, and is the usual breakfast of the palmyra climber, as well as of his household.

The sap is boiled in large earthen pots over a slow fire, until it becomes a thick syrup, when it is poured to harden into moulds, each one formed of half a coconut shell. The sugar thus manufactured is coarse and dark, but is highly esteemed by the people, who use it in a variety of ways. The surplus stock is sold in exchange for rice, cloth, and other comforts. The sap when fermented, becomes a sweet, intoxicating drink, called "toddy." Happily however, the palmyra climbers of South India are a temperate people, and seldom use it in this state.

—The Choctaw Claim.—The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the United States justly owes the Choctaw Nation $2,800,798, mainly for lands in Georgia, bought of them when Andrew Jackson was President of the United States. This debt has been due over fifty years. The Indians have been insisting on its payment during that time. They not only lose the interest on this large sum, but they have spent large sums of money in prosecuting the claims; and we are informed that the present attorneys, whose persevering efforts have secured this judgment, are to get 5 per cent. of the whole amount, or over $140,000.—The Council Fire.

—Indian Industry.—The little school paper called The Indian Citizen, conducted by the pupils of the Industrial School at Chemawa, Oregon, (near Salem,) quotes from The Council Fire for Tenth Month Colonel Tappan's tribute to their industry and enterprise in buying a farm with money raised during vacation, and adds:

"This is very kind, and we thank you for it; but we beg to say that one hundred of us earned $1,500 to buy this 85-acre farm in less than three weeks. There is not a lazy boy or girl in this school.

"We came here in the spring of 1885, and found this place a perfect wilderness. Upon the grounds where our beautiful buildings now stand, the gigantic fir trees towered almost to the very skies. Come and look at it now.

"The Indian boys, by their energy, perseverance, and determination to do right have wrought this change.

"Only give us a chance. Educate us. Teach us to work, and we will solve the Indian problem of this country by becoming useful men and women."

—The Council Fire.

—Women's National Christian Temperance Union.—At the 13th annual convention of this body, at Minneapolis, on the 22d of Tenth Month, more than 400 delegates were present. There were also six fraternal delegates from England, Canada, Sandwich Islands, the Choctaw Indians and the colored people of the South were also represented.

There was a sharp discussion on the resolution reaffirming the adhesion of the Union to the Prohibition Third Party movement. This was opposed on the ground that it would be a mistake to commit the Union to any political party; but it was carried by a large majority. Notice was then given that at the Convention next year an amendment to the constitution would be offered, providing that "in religion the Women's Christian Temperance Union should be non-sectarian, and in politics non-partizan."

This association has for its ultimate object the complete overthrow of the traffic in intoxicants. It has 39 departments, each with its own superintendent; and includes every State and Territory of the Union.

—Tunesassa School.—It was stated at a recent meeting of the Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, that the School for Indian children had been re-opened in the new building at Tunesassa, with 35 scholars, and that everything seemed to be working smoothly and well. The building is greatly superior to the one that was burnt, in capacity and convenience. The sub-committee who recently visited the Seneca reservations, held a number of councils with the Indians in different localities, and read to them an address prepared by the General Committee. They found the Indians were much interested in the discussion of their political affairs; and were fearful that their rights and interests might be unfavorably affected by some legislation on the part of the United States Government. The Friends who visited the reservations reported a very decided improvement in the manner of living among these Indians, and in the cleanliness and neatness of their houses, especially in those which were presided over by women who had been trained in our school.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 1, 1887.

At the suggestion of a friend we publish in the present number of "The Friend," under the heading, "Children as Teachers," a short sketch illustrating the importance of so guarding our ordinary conversation in the family and in the world, that it may be made helpful for the instruction and improvement of others. "Out of the abundance of the heart, the mouth speaketh"—and unless grace reigns in the heart, it cannot be expected that "the words of our mouth" will be acceptable in the sight of our Lord, or tend to the promotion of his kingdom in those about us.

It would be a profitable review for many of us if we would often, after having been in company, reflect upon what had passed there; and consider what light our words would throw on our ruling motives and most engrossing thoughts. Would not some be forced to admit, that they must seem to a keen observer, to be almost wholly devoted to the pursuits of business and the increase of their worldly property? Others, whose talk had been of picnics, parties and plans for amusement, that these subjects were to them the rod of Aaron, which swallowed up all love of serious things? Others, that they had no higher aspirations than to raise a laugh, and be considered as witty or jocular companions? Others, that literature and intellectual culture were the things most of all to be desired?

There is a needed caution to be observed against conversing on religious topics in a careless and formal way; nor should such subjects as have been above alluded to, be altogether excluded from our social circles; but is there not a meaning in the advice of the Apostle, that our words should "be seasoned with salt"—that that divine love, which should dwell in the hearts of those who desire more than anything else to be joined unto the Lord in an everlasting covenant, should so tincture our conversation as to be helpful to those with whom we associate? Is there not reason to fear that some goodly people withhold more than is meet in this respect, and fail to be of as much service to the cause of the Redeemer as they might have been, if they had been more watchful to make use of the opportunities they met with "to do good and to communicate" of that which was in their hearts?

The expression, "our conversation is in Heaven," which arrested the attention of the child, as mentioned in the article spoken of, has a much wider meaning than a mere reference to spoken words. At the time the present version of the Bible was made, the word "conversation" meant the conduct, behavior or course of life. This meaning has now gone out of use; and therefore it is well that the Revised Version substitutes for "conversation," the expression "manner of life," which is the meaning that was designed to be conveyed and which was conveyed by the word two or three hundred years ago.

We must, then, not only be careful that our spoken words should exercise an influence for good, but that our whole conduct and "manner of life" should be such that others, seeing our good works, may glorify our Father who is in Heaven.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—General John A. Logan, soldier of the war for the Union, United States Senator from Illinois, and Republican candidate for Vice President of the United States at the last Presidential election, died Twelfth Month 26th, in Washington, after a short illness. He was sixty years of age.

The Secretary of the Treasury, on the 21st ultimo, sent a communication to Congress saying that the capacity of the vaults already constructed for the storage of silver dollars, is now practically exhausted. There is, therefore, a necessity that provision be made for the storage of silver dollars at the earliest practicable day. Estimates are transmitted of the cost of a storage vault of one hundred million dollars, capacity within the court yard of the Treasury building. For a double steel-lined vault the estimates are $106,673, and for a simple vault, without steel lining, they are $27,804.

Congress adjourned on the 22nd, until First Mo. 4th. Judge Peckham, of the Supreme Court at Albany, has decided that the action of the Legislature last winter, repealing the charter of the Broadway Street Railway Company of New York, is constitutional. He also held that the mortgages are a lien on the property.

Almost one-third of the total of 48,000 votes in the recent Washington Territory election were cast by women.

A large mortality among cattle in Northwestern and Southwestern Iowa is reported. Pleuro-pneumonia is suspected, and the Governor has ordered an investigation.

Several negro families from South Carolina passed through Little Rock on Twelfth Mo. 21st, to settle in Southern Arkansas. They will soon be followed by large numbers of other emigrants to the same region. They say that the cotton crop in South Carolina "was virtually a failure the past season; that the price of the staple was lower than ever before, and the landlords under the law absorbed the proceeds of the black labor. They had no political rights, being to all intents and purposes disfranchised. Under these circumstances emigration was a matter of necessity, if not choice."

At a meeting of the Central Labor Union in Chicago, held on the 26th ult., the delegates to the First Month Convention of the United Labor Party were instructed "to resist all efforts toward a compromise between labor and either of the old parties. Should such a compromise be decided upon by the Convention, the delegates are to withdraw. A resolution passed by the Furniture Workers' Association, demanding that the State declare the coal mines common property, was endorsed."

The number of deaths in this city last week was 350, being 5 more than last week, and 105 more than the corresponding week last year. Of the foregoing, 53 died of consumption; 41 of pneumonia; 21 of diseases of the heart; 19 of convulsions; 15 of Bright's disease; 14 of bronchitis; 12 of old age, and 11 of croup.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s 110½; 4's, registered, 127½; coupon, 128½; 3's, 101; currency 6's, 123½ a 134.

Cotton was in limited request, and sold in small lots to spinners on a basis of 9½ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum was quiet, but steady, at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Flour and Meal.—Flour was quiet, but unchanged in price. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania family, at $3.85; 125 barrels Pennsylvania roller, straight, at $4.25; 125 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4.25; 250 barrels do., straight, at $4.50; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.75 a $4.90; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4.25, and 500 barrels do., patent, at $4.90 a $5.10. Rye flour.—Choice was quoted at $3.25 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat closed steady, with 89½ cts. bid and 89½ cts. asked for No. 2 red. No. 2 corn closed at 45 cts. bid, and 45½ cts. asked. Oats advanced, No. 2 white closing at 37½ cts. bid and 38½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were ¼c. higher, at 3 a 5½ cts.

Sheep, good stock, ¼c. higher; common, ¼c. lower, at 2 a 5½ cts. Lambs were higher, at 2½ a 7 cts.

Hogs were firmer, at 6 a 6½ cts. The receipts were: Beeves, 1500; sheep, 6000; hogs, 9000.

FOREIGN.—Labouchere, in a recent speech, at Northampton, said that he regarded the Nationalist plan of campaign as simply the application of the trades-union principle, legalized in England, to industry in Ireland, in order to enforce the right of workers to sufficient produce of their toil to enable them to live and thrive.

It is stated that C. S. Parnell is convinced that the position of the Irish tenants is worse now than when he introduced the Anti- eviction bill. That the plan of campaign has, as asserted, procured abatements in rents where everything else has failed he regards as improbable. He thinks it remarkable that the Government should propose a coercion bill, as the entire absence of crime leaves no excuse for coercion. The suppression of the Irish National League would inevitably result in the formation of secret societies that would rival one another in the commission of crime, and thus necessitate the landlords asking Parliament for further coercive powers.

Parnell will lead a strong attack upon the whole policy and action of the Government towards Ireland at the opening of the coming session of Parliament.

Lord Randolph Churchill has resigned his seat in the Cabinet owing to a disagreement with the Admiralty and the War Office with reference to increasing the expenses of the country in view of the existing financial difficulty, and also because he disapproved the home legislative measures of the Cabinet. The desire to increase the expenses of the Admiralty and War Offices, to which Lord Randolph was opposed, indicates, it is believed, that the Government are of the opinion that a European war is imminent and that extra naval and military preparations on the part of England are required to make her influence felt on the continent.

It is known that the bulk of the Conservatives are opposed to Lord Hartington as the successor of Lord Randolph Churchill, and wish to remain a purely Conservative Cabinet, holding that the vacancy in the Ministry should be filled by one of their own number.

The largest and most disastrous fire in Liverpool since the year 1847 occurred on the morning of the 24th of 12th month, when the extensive general retail stores of John Lewis & Co., on Brunswick road, were entirely destroyed. The stores contained an enormous stock, all of which was consumed, as was also an attractive menagerie connected with the establishment. The total loss is placed at $2,000,000.

On the same day the British iron-clad Sultan ran into and sunk the French steamer Ville de Victoria, while the latter was lying at anchor in the Tagus. The Sultan dragged her anchors and drifted against the Ville de Victoria. After the collision, she collided with and damaged the steamer Richmond. The Ville de Victoria's crew and passengers numbered 63, of whom 30 were drowned.

The Hovas have paid the 400,000 francs war indemnity due France under the terms of the treaty of peace, and the evacuation of Tamatave by the French is imminent.

The Spanish Government has despatched officials to establish a settlement at the mouth of the Muni river, on the west coast of Africa.

Advices from Vienna say it is reported there that a serious difference exists between the Cabinets of Vienna and Berlin. It is claimed that Prince Bismarck is serving Russian designs without regard to the interests of Austria. Von Tisza, the Hungarian Premier, it is stated, will soon hold a conference with Count Kalnoky and insist that the situation be cleared up and that Bismarck be asked to declare whether Germany is an ally of Russia or of Austria-Hungary.

A telegram from Buenos Ayres says that in Cordova on Twelfth Month 21st, there were reported 25 cases of cholera and 19 deaths. In Mendoza there are 30 cases daily and the number of deaths is increasing. In Buenos Ayres, during eight hours, there were 35 cases and 23 deaths.

A telegram from Havana says, the value of the fresh fruits exported from that port to the United States during the year which ended on the 30th, is estimated at $500,000 in gold. Of this amount $285,000 was for pineapples, and $140,000 for oranges. It is calculated that the railway freights collected on sugar and molasses respectively are equivalent on an average to 15 per cent. of the full value of sugar, and 10 per cent. of the value of molasses.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The Committee in charge of this institution will meet in Philadelphia on the 7th day of First Month, 1887, at 11 A. M.

The Committee on Instruction will meet on the same day, at 9 A. M., and the Committee on Admissions at 9.30 A. M.

WM. EVANS, Clerk.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The school will be opened in the New Building on Third-day, the 4th of First Month, 1887.

The session will close on Fifth-day, the 14th of Fourth Month, and a deduction will be made in the charge for Board and Tuition proportionate to the diminished length of this session as compared with a full term.

Conveyances will be at WESTTOWN STATION on the 4th of First Month, to meet the trains that leave the Broad Street Station of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, at Broad and Filbert Streets, Philadelphia, at 7.07, 9.03 and 11.13 A. M., and 2.47 and 4.55 P. M.

THE UNION TRANSFER COMPANY will send for baggage to any place in the built-up part of Philadelphia, if notice is left either at No. 838 Chestnut Street; at the South-East corner of Broad and Chestnut Streets; at the Baggage-room, Fifteenth Street above Market, or at Market Street Ferry (north side), and will deliver it at the Broad Street Station of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, at a charge of Twenty-five cents per trunk, to be paid either when the order is given or when the trunk is called for. For the same charge they will collect baggage from any of the other railroad depots, if the Railroad checks held for such baggage are left at one of the offices of the Transfer Company above designated. In all cases it must be stated that the baggage is to go to Westtown Boarding School, Westtown Station, on the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad (Central Division).

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE.

Near Frankford, (Twenty-third Ward), Philadelphia. Physician and Superintendent.—JOHN C. HALL, M. D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board of Managers.

DIED, at the residence of William C. Buzby, Mt Laurel, New Jersey, on the 13th of the Twelfth Month, 1886, MARY MOORE, a beloved member of Freshanz Monthly and Preparative Meeting, in the 82nd year of her age. The humility, and exemplary life and conversation of this dear Friend, and the kind Christian spirit in which she administered reproof and encouragement, will be long and we trust profitably remembered by those with whom she associated. They have the comforting assurance that the language, "Thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord," is applicable to her.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Fifth Mo. 1st, 2nd and 3rd, 1843. Although hourly brought to feel my many infirmities and short-comings, yet have experienced at times during the three past days, that help is laid on One that is mighty, and able to deliver even unto the uttermost, all that come unto Him, and that put their trust in Him. May there be a cleaving closer and closer: for "Thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee."

18th. Troubles of various kinds mark our earthly pilgrimage. The great matter is, so to live as to be able to meet them with meekness; not in a repining disposition, or a disposition not willing to suffer wrong as I ought! which I fear was not the case in a little occurrence that took place the other evening, wherein my feelings were tried and wounded. But for want of that Christian fortitude wherein we experience strength, I have been sensible that it was not blest to me as it would have been, had I cleaved unto my dear Master. Whilst quietly dwelling in retrospection upon the circumstance this morning, I was enabled to feel humbled, and could look unto my Father in heaven in child-like dependence. I was also comforted and encouraged in reading a letter of Isaac Penington, which my eye unexpectedly lighted on, a part of which is as follows:—"O friend! hast thou a sense of the way to the Father? then be careful that thy spirit daily bow before Him and wait for breathings to Him from his pure Spirit, that He would continue his mercy to thee, keeping thee in the true sense, and making thy way more and more clear before thee every day; yea, and bearing thee up in all the exercises which may befall thee, in every kind; that by his secret workings in thy spirit, and helping thee with a little help from time to time, thou mayst still be advancing nearer and nearer towards the kingdom, until thou find the Lord God administer an entrance unto thee hereinto. * * * And be not careful after the flesh, but trust in the Lord, that though thou art weak and little; though thou meet with those that are wise and knowing, and almost every way able to reason thee down; what though thou hast not wherewith to answer; yet thou knowest and hast the feeling of God's pure Truth in spirit, with a desire to have the life of it brought forth in thee, and so to witness the change and renewings which are by his power. O dear heart! herein thou art accepted of the Lord, and here his tender love and care will be over thee, and his mercy will daily reach to thee; and thou shalt have true satisfaction in thy heart, and hold the Truth there; where all the reasonings of men and all the devices of the enemy of thy soul, shall not be able to reach; yea thou shalt so feel the Lord to help his babe against the strength of the mighty in the season of his good pleasure, as shall exceedingly turn to his praise; and so thou shalt experience that those whom God preserves, all the gates of hell shall not be able to prevail against. Therefore look not out at man, or at the words and wisdom of men, but keep where thou hast felt the Lord visit thee, and He may visit thee yet again and again, every day, and be teaching thee further and further the way to his dwelling place, and be drawing thee thither, where is righteousness, life, rest and peace forever!"

Sixth Mo. 1st. Received yesterday a message of love from my dear friend Thomas Kite; to which was added the following: "Be not discouraged because of the difficulties the Christian traveller has to meet with, for the Captain of our salvation was never foiled in battle, and remains to be near to his sincere followers; and in his own time, as faith and faithfulness is kept to, will give the victory."

5th. In our morning meeting dear Sarah Emlen, for the first time this session, opened her mouth in testimony. On first rising she spoke of the circumstance of the Prodigal Son. How it set forth the joy there was in heaven over one sinner that repenteth; that although he had strayed far and wide, how joyfully on his return he was received! Should any feel that they, too, had sinned and were no longer worthy to be called children, the arms of their Heavenly Father were opened to receive them, &c. She spoke of the precious gift of repentance; there were none of us but that stood in the need of it; for who could say they had never sinned; never grieved his Holy Spirit; never once spoken unadvisedly with their lips, &c. What a precious thing repentance is! how it brings down, lays low the unsubjected will; producing tenderness and contrition, &c. The dear children, too, were remembered, with an encouraging invitation to yield their hearts a willing sacrifice unto Him who was calling, and not to fear the world's dread laugh; said it was this that kept so many precious ones on the back ground, &c. It was a favored meeting.

8th. Meeting morning. I fear a season of suffering, the enemy has been so busy last evening and this morning; if through meeting the ground is maintained, I know the struggle will be great; may there be a cleaving unto Him, who is alone able to help. Noon.—Our meeting just closed. How I desire a heart capable of returning that gratitude due unto Him who has been pleased once more to make bare his everlasting arm of power, and enable such a poor unworthy creature to approach his sacred footstool, and there to pour out my heart before Him, although I may have appeared as a very fool to many. Thou, dearest Father, knowest the sincerity of my heart; thou knowest the tears, and why they are poured forth! Let me be what I am unto thee, and not unto man.

11th. Through a little unwatchfulness, I was caused suffering. When there is the least stepping aside from the narrow path pointed out for me to walk in, O the sorrow and distress produced! things that many would esteem lawful, to me are not expedient.

15th. In looking back to the days of my childhood, and even later, I can but see how often I have grieved the Holy Spirit! Surely it is of the Lord's unutterable mercy that I am not consumed, or that his Spirit has not ceased striving with me. Purify me, if through deep and deeper sufferings.*

Seventh Mo. 2nd. Have felt a sincere desire throughout this day for preservation. Had the company of our dear friend Hannah Rhoads, at our morning and afternoon meetings; both of which were held in silence. I know not why my spirit is so united to this dear friend; think I never met with one whom my spirit travailed so with, not only by day but by night. O may I become more and more united to the true Israel! there are those who feel almost like bone of my bone.

6th. Although unworthy of the very least of the Lord's mercies, was permitted this day, in our silent sitting before Him, to approach his sacred footstool with fear and trembling, and there silently to pour out my heart; interceding for strength to cast out every thing which is defiling, every thing which is retarding my progress heavenward. Be pleased, O Heavenly Parent, to hasten thy work, if it only be perfected through suffering. Lay thy hand yet heavier and heavier, till every thing which is opposing thee and thy righteous cause, be removed.

13th. Meeting day. Be pleased, O Heavenly Father, to be near, and strengthen us acceptably to come before thee; and cause a travail and exercise to be felt, that thy precious life may rise into dominion. And, O! for the lambs, the precious lambs of thy flock, who are hungering and thirsting after Thee, (for there are of this number

[* Our Journalist very frequently records the provings, and painful experiences,—like to drinking of the waters of bitterness—through which it was her lot to pass; many of which are, for the sake of brevity, omitted in these selections. These were, no doubt, preparatory to the faithful occupancy of the talent or gift which, when the full time came, she was to use for the honor of the Great Name. The Lord's ways are not as our ways. "His judgments are a great deep," while ever "true and righteous." Judgments upon the transgressing nature—those afflictions and chastisements which the All-Wise brings upon his children for their instruction and safe-guidance—used to be cause for thanksgiving and rejoicing. Thus David says: "I will give thanks unto Thee, because of thy righteous judgments." Again, "Let Mount Zion rejoice, let the daughters of Judah be glad, because of Thy judgments." And where these are received as from his hand and improved to his honor, as no doubt was the case with our friend A. W. H., they bring to the living sacrifice of an obedient heart, and to the precious experience and acknowledgement: "This God is our God for ever and ever; He will be our guide even unto death."] among our dear children), be pleased to remember them with a little soul-sustaining bread, that they may be strengthened to hold fast their faith and confidence in thee.

17th. Had the company yesterday of dear Sarah Hillman, at both of our meetings and collections; she was engaged in testimony in our morning meeting. Our afternoon meeting was a silent one. At the close of our family reading below stairs, previous to retiring, a word of encouragement flowed through this dear instrument, "to a tried and proved state, who had been passing through a long, dark season;" believed if these continued the struggle, the day would yet break, for as in the outward creation, day followed the night, so it was in a spiritual sense. Revived this precious promise, "I will pour water on him who is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground."

Toad-stools and their Allies.—No. 4.

Among the specimens collected in my last walk, was a large, mushroom-shaped Fungus, with a dark drab or mouse-colored skin covering the top, and having cells or pores on the under surface. Desiring to examine more carefully the structure and appearance of these pores, I cut off a thin slice, in a vertical direction, so as to lay open a number of the parallel tubes, and placed it on a glass slide under the microscope. When I came to remove the slice from the slide, I found it had left on the glass multitudes of spores which had been loosened from the sides of the tubes and had adhered to the glass, giving a rough outline of the arrangement of the surfaces which had produced them. They were minute oval cells, in which the microscopic power at my command was not sufficient to reveal anything beyond the outside coating and the central cavity. What particularly impressed me was their multitude. On the small part of the surface of the glass slide which had been touched by the Fungus, there were thousands of them; and the whole plant must produce them by the hundred thousand.

It seems wonderful too, that these minute oval cells should possess the power of sending out inter-lacing threads, from which such noble Fungi should spring as the plant from which they were obtained. The mysterious principle of life with which they are endowed, is as admirable as it is incomprehensible. It cannot be regarded as a necessary quality of matter, but as a power or force superadded to it by the Great Author of all things. The words of the poet Cowper are true in a physical as well as spiritual sense—

"One Spirit—His

Who wore the platted tresses with bleeding brows—
Rules universal nature. Not a flower
But shows some touch, in freckle, streak, or stain,
Of his unrival'd pencil. He inspires
Their balmy odors, and imparts their hues,
And bathes their eyes with nectar, and includes,
In grains as countless as the sea-side sands,
The forms with which He sprinkles all the earth."

"He feeds the secret fire

By which the mighty process is maintain'd."

I placed under a glass tumbler a portion of the pear-shaped Fungus described in my last article, in order to observe the further growth of the Mould which had commenced to develop on it. On looking at it two days afterwards, I found a part of the surface thickly covered with a growth of brown-colored mould which closely resembled the fur of an animal with the individual hairs standing erect. On transferring some of these to a glass slide, and placing it under the microscope, I found they consisted of transparent tubes, as in the Mould first described, but less interlaced. As I watched them, I was much interested in noticing a fluid rapidly moving through their cavities. In one case the fluid seemed to leave a vacant space behind it; and its movement reminded me of the fall of the mercury in a thermometer tube; there was the same well defined line between the filled and the empty portion of the tube.

The poisonous white Toad Stool which formed part of the spoils of the last excursion had now commenced to decay; and at the point where the stem and the cap joined, a Mould was growing and was feeding on the substance of its cousin the Toad Stool. Under the microscope this Mould showed a similar system of transparent tubes branching and interlacing, as has before been described. But this had grown so far as to develop its ripe spores. These were little, round cells (not oval as in those previously seen) and clustered into round balls each of which was supported by a little footstalk. The whole reminded one of a vine, thickly studded with bunches of grapes; and was beautiful enough to kindle some enthusiastic feeling—even in the mind of one whose blood was beginning to be chilled by the advance of old age.

Since writing the above, in one of my walks, I observed a stalk of Indian Corn which had been attacked by smut, which had so altered the fruit, that it looked as if each grain of corn had been swelled to 25 or 50 times its former size, and had lengthened out into a sac of two or three inches in length filled with longitudinal threads which were thickly covered with a black pigment that freely came off on everything that touched them. These threads were part of the fungus that had destroyed the ear; and on placing a portion of the black material under the microscope, it proved to be a mass of countless multitudes of round black spores, similar in appearance to others with which I had lately become familiar.

Still more recently I found a fine toad-stool, somewhat firm in texture, springing from the base of an old stump, with a short thick footstalk, which was not like the stem of an umbrella, but attached more like the handle of a paddle, to a body of four inches in diameter. The leathery coat on top was a red brown; and the under surface, which in some parts rolled over so as apparently to form part of the top, was a tawny hue, and presented a vast multitude of minute projections, so as to resemble the condition of the skin which is called goose-flesh. Each little prominence was punctured by a very small opening, so that I classed this fungus among the Polyporei. The next day but one, I found it had deposited great multitudes of spores on the paper on which it had been placed. Besides this, in the shrinkage caused by the evaporation of the moisture of the plant, I noticed that the tubes or pores had separated from each other, and stood side by side like the separate and closely shorn hairs which form the nap or pile of velvet.

On turning to Berkeley's descriptions of British Fungi, I found that among the Polyporei, there is one genus (Fistulina) in which the under surface is at first pimply, but, in which these pimples at length lengthen out and form distinct tubes. To this genus, therefore, I suppose my plant belongs. It is fleshy, and juicy, like the British species, and like it may be fit for food.

Friends in Barbadoes.

The Island of Barbadoes was probably first settled by Europeans about the year 1625. The Society of Friends early obtained a foothold there, and flourished for some years. At its best period at least five meetings existed, and when it is remembered that the island is only fifty-five miles in circumference, and embraces an area of but about one hundred and fifty square miles, it will be seen that Friends must have been comparatively numerous.

Among the earliest, perhaps the very earliest, ministering Friends who went to the island were two women, Ann Austin and Mary Fisher, the latter well known for her remarkable visit to the Sultan Mahomet IV. These Friends, the former an elderly person and the latter about thirty-two years old, reached Barbadoes from England in the latter part of 1655. They took with them numerous Friends' books, which were extensively circulated and read, creating a profound impression. They were followed a short time afterwards by Henry Fell, a distant relative of Judge Fell, whose widow became the wife of George Fox. Henry Fell is described as having been a most zealous and earnest advocate of the religious principles of Friends from the time of his first acquaintance with them. Later in life he settled in Barbadoes, with the intention, however, of returning to his native land, an expectation which was never realized, as he is known to have died abroad.

John Rouse, who married Judge Fell's daughter Margaret, was a native of Barbadoes. He was son of Lieut. Col. Rouse, a wealthy planter of that island, and an intimate friend of Henry Fell. Both father and son became Friends, and John Rouse was a minister; at one time the only one in Barbadoes. He settled in England and died there.

George Fox visited Barbadoes in 1671. A number of other Friends accompanied him. He remained on the island about three months, and though suffering much of the time from illness, devoted himself to the cause of Friends, and took active steps for organizing the Society there. It was during this visit that he wrote the well-known address to the Governor and others in authority in Barbadoes, which has been so often quoted as enunciating the views of Friends in relation to the doctrine of the atonement. The sojourn of George Fox and his friends in the island, was marked by a wonderful revival. Many joined the Society, and the meetings "were very much enlarged and very quiet." It has been described as a heavenly visitation to many "even a true resurrection from the dead. The Lord heard and answered their desires; and they saw in measure the travail of their souls, and were satisfied."

Thomas Chalkley repeatedly visited Barbadoes during the early part of the last century. At the time of these visits there were meeting-houses at Bridgetown, Spightstown, the Spring, the Thicketts, Pumpkin Hill and Hethcott's Bay. In some or all of these meeting-houses, meetings were held which were "large and open;" but it is evident that the Society must have been, even then, in a declining condition in the island, for he informs that the Thicketts meeting-house had been used to dance in. This circumstance was the occasion of labor and some plain dealing.

It is known that there was a considerable emigration of Friends from Barbadoes to Philadelphia and other places on the North American continent. Some of the family names common in the island two centuries ago, are familiar to Friends here. Among the emigrants was William Callender, a Friend who was active in Society affairs in Philadelphia a century and a half ago, as well as a member of the Colonial Assembly. He settled in Philadelphia about 1730, and married Katharine Smith, of Burlington, afterwards as Katharine Callender, a worthy elder in this city, who was known as the patron and friend of Rebecca Jones, during the period of her experiences which ultimately drew her to membership in our religious Society.

Benjamin Buck was among the last survivors of the Society of Friends in Barbadoes. He emigrated to this country, and settled near Philadelphia toward the close of the last century, and married a second wife here.

These remarks are preliminary to introducing to the readers of "The Friend" some extracts from the diary of James Cresson, who paid a visit, in company with John Parrish, to Barbadoes in the early part of 1785. Unfortunately a fragment only of this journal has come down to us; but what has been preserved presents a clear view of the situation of what remained of Friends in that island a century ago. The ruined meeting-houses were there, the graveyards were there, the rock-hewn sepulchres of the Weekes family (once prominent in Society affairs) in the highlands of St. Philips were there—perhaps are there still—but Friends had for twenty years ceased to exist as an organized body. There were scattered individuals who claimed membership with Friends, and in one locality a handful who held a meeting in a private house; but this was all that was left of a body that once held meetings in five or six meeting-houses on this small island.

In collating the foregoing facts the writer has consulted the Fells of Swarthmore Hall, and the Journals of George Fox and Thomas Chalkley. He has also had the benefit of information handed down by tradition in his own family, as well as family memoranda. A few additional facts have been added derived from personal friends, one of whom is a native of Barbadoes.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 112.

DANGER OF DELAY IN THE PERFORMANCE OF DUTY.

A writer in the Christian Soldier gives the following incident, which was related to him by a Christian brother.

"Some few years ago, I was clerk in a store. One day a hired man of my employers, whom I knew to be destitute of religion, came into the store. I felt it my duty to speak to him on the subject of his soul's salvation; but my wicked heart invented a thousand excuses—He may not receive it kindly, thought I, since I am younger than he; I had better keep silence until a more favorable opportunity. Conscience told me, these excuses were vain, and a voice seemed to say, "Speak to the man;" but I refused to listen. But mark the result. The next day he was taken sick, became dangerous, and on the third day he died. Oh that I had listened to the voice of God's Spirit, and done my duty! Perhaps I might have been instrumental in the saving of his soul from perdition; at least I might have cleared my own skirts, and washed my own hands in innocence."

It is never safe to set aside a clear requisition of duty; for, as in this case, the opportunity may be gone forever; and even if, through the Lord's mercy and goodness, another call to the service and another opening may be presented, yet much loss and trial may have to be experienced. There is an interesting illustration of this in the case of Elizabeth N. Walker as related by herself to Samuel Gummere, Sr., and by him committed to writing.

She had been paying a religious visit in Upper Canada and, being about to return to the United States, came to Kingston to take boat across Lake Ontario. As she approached that town, she felt an intimation of duty to have a meeting with the people there. But it being the time for holding the Supreme Court, and the Chief Judge and a number of the great men being in town, she gave way to reasoning; thinking that if she were once on board the vessel and fairly off from shore, the concern might pass away. Accordingly in the morning, she came to the water's side to embark; the captain being the same with whom she had crossed before on her coming into Canada. At that time, the captain led one of the horses on to the sloop by his reins, and the other followed of its own accord; but now the horses refused to be led. After using considerable endeavors himself, and with the assistance of other men, to force the horse on, and all to no purpose, he enquired whether it was not the same animal which had been so remarkably tractable before. In relating the circumstance, Elizabeth said she stood in amazement; she saw the cause, and, to use her own expression, "I saw I was Jonah." However, having succeeded in hoisting a horse on board by means of tackles, they proceeded with a fair prospect a little way, when a friend asking the captain how long he thought it would take to reach the opposite shore, was answered,—"probably half an hour. Presently a tremendous storm arose, and they appeared to be in danger of being swallowed up in the waves. In this awful situation they remained about the space of four hours, from about 8 o'clock to 12. The captain said he had attended that ferry for about 30 years, and had never seen the like; that there must be some cause. The man friend then went to Elizabeth, who sat overwhelmed with confusion, and told her she must give up to return, their lives being every moment in jeopardy, she replied that she was now willing to do anything.

He then went to the captain and proposed his returning; but was answered that it was equally impossible to return to the place from whence they came as to go forward; that he might possibly reach the King's navy-yard, but that no American vessel was permitted to land there. The place being near, and the sentinel or guard in full view, Elizabeth recollected that she had been a subject to the King of England, and she did not know that she had done anything to forfeit her right; she therefore desired the captain to hail the sentinel with his trumpet and inform him that one of his Majesty's subjects was on board, and being in distress, desired permission to land. The Admiral being at the place was appealed to, and a sloop was sent out to bring them ashore.

Being landed, with their baggage, &c., they had an interview with the Admiral and some other of the chief men, including the Judge aforementioned. Elizabeth informed them of her desire to have a meeting, to which they readily assented. A large room was procured and prepared, notice was given, and at 3 o'clock, (about 2 hours after their landing) a large number assembled and a satisfactory meeting was held.

In the evening, after they had retired to their quarters, the Judge came to visit them, and in conversation informed them, that being an Englishman, and brought up in what is called high life, he had been in several considerable stations in government; and that with respect to religion, he had been an Episcopalian, a Catholic and a Presbyterian, but now he perceived he had all yet to learn. At this point he seemed inclined to give the conversation a different turn, but Elizabeth thought there was still something throbbing in his breast that had not come out. At length he said, he had been a great persecutor; that being colonel of the military, as well as a civil judge, he had been severe with Friends on account of their non-compliance with military requisitions. He had supposed their refusal proceeded from obstinacy, but now he was satisfied they acted from principle, and he was therefore determined to persecute them no more. As respected what had passed, all the restitution he saw it in his power to make, and which he was determined to fulfill, was, that when any Friends came that way with certificates, and desired to have meetings among them, it should be his part to endeavor to make way for it.

The next morning they came to the water to cross. The same men who had assisted the preceding day in getting the horse on board, again offered their assistance. "No," said the captain, the work is now done, and I can take them myself;" and taking hold of the bridle led them gently in.

Sometime after this, trouble arising between the two countries, Elizabeth was desirous of knowing whether this man kept his promise not to persecute Friends on account of their religious testimony; and she learned that only one member had suffered on that account within his jurisdiction and that he had not in due time given information that he was a member, neither had his conduct been such as to show that he was one.

In the Memoirs of Elizabeth Collins of Upper Evesham, N. J., she mentions that she was sitting in a meeting at her home, under exercise, a few words presented to express, but for want of attending singly to the opening, she gave way to reasoning and put off expressing them, until the meeting was nearly over; when the language was intelligibly spoken in her inward ear, "If thou art not more faithful, thy gift shall be taken from thee." She says, "The language was awful; I was brought to see the deplorable situation I should be left in, if after receiving so precious a gift, I should neglect to improve it, and it should be taken away, and I left, poor and distressed. I was led to cry for mercy and for strength to be more faithful; and in fear and trembling I arose and expressed what was before me."

Deciphering the Cuneiform Inscriptions.

"Cuneiform" describes the way in which the single strokes are made in this method of writing: just as we call a style of writing back-handed, or a style of type full-faced. It does not refer to the language, nor even to the alphabet, but (so to speak) to the penmanship. Each stroke of each letter in a "cuneiform" inscription is a cuneiform or wedge-shaped stroke. Instead of this word, these strokes have been termed nail-shaped, arrow-headed, dagger-shaped, swallow-tailed; all of which terms describe the same characteristic.

You can easily make a pen for cuneiform writing. Take a four-square and square-ended stick of wood, say eight inches long and three-quarters of an inch through—a four-square desk ruler will do—and use a corner of one end for writing; this is your pen. Instead of paper, take some softish, well-worked brick clay, and spread it on a board into a tablet or flat plate, say a foot square and an inch or two thick. Hold your pen at a low slope, nearly horizontal, with a corner of one end pointing downwards over the clay, and make strokes in the clay, say an inch long, with a dab, a slight lift, and a draw, hitting a light blow into the clay, and drawing the pen towards the right, and you will make "cuneiform" strokes. There seems to be reason to suppose that instead of this method by a dab and a draw, the strokes were (probably afterward) made by a direct stamp, like a type. In stone the strokes had, of course, to be cut.
